2765. EUROPE, Antagonism to America.—What is the whole system of Europe towards America but an atrocious and insulting tyranny? One hemisphere of the earth, separated from the other by wide seas on both sides, having a different system of interests flowing from different climates, different soils, different productions, different modes of existence, and its own local relations and duties, is made subservient to all the petty interests of the other, to their laws, their regulations, their passions and wars, and interdicted from social intercourse, from the interchange of mutual duties and comforts with their neighbors, enjoined on all men by the laws of nature. Happily these abuses of human rights are drawing to a close on both our continents, and are not likely to survive the present mad contest of the lions and tigers of the other.—To CLEMENT CAINE. vi, 13. FORD ED., ix, 329. (M., 1811.)

2766. EUROPE, Balance of power in.—We especially ought to pray that the powers of Europe may be so poised and counterpoised among themselves, that their own safety may require the presence of all their force at home, leaving the other quarters of the globe in undisturbed tranquillity.—To DR. CRAWFORD. vi, 33. (M., Jan. 1812.)

2767. EUROPE, Estimate of.—Behold me at length on the vaunted scene of Europe! * * * You are curious perhaps to know how this new scene has struck a savage of the mountains of America. Not advantageously, I assure you. I find the general fate of humanity here most deplorable. The truth of Voltaire's observation offers itself perpetually, that every man here must be either the hammer or the anvil. It is a true picture of that country to which they say we shall pass hereafter, and where we are to see God and his angels in splendor, and crowds of the damned trampled under their feet. While the great mass of the people are thus suffering under physical and moral oppression, I have endeavored to examine more nearly the condition of the great, to appreciate the true value of the circumstances in their situation, which dazzle the bulk of spectators, and, especially, to compare it with that degree of happiness which is enjoyed in America by every class of people. Intrigues of love occupy the younger, and those of ambition, the elder part of the great. Conjugal love having no existence among them. domestic happiness, of which that is the basis, is utterly unknown. In lieu of this, are substituted pursuits which nourish and invigorate all our bad passions, and which offer only moments of ecstasy amidst days and months of restlessness and torment. Much, very much inferior, this, to the tranquil, permanent felicity with which domestic society in America blesses most of its inhabitants; leaving them to follow steadily those pursuits which health and reason approve, and rendering truly delicious the intervals of those pursuits. In Science, the mass of the people are two centuries behind ours; their literati, half a dozen years before us. Books, really good, acquire just reputation in that time, and so become known to us, and communicate to us all their advances in knowledge. Is not this delay compensated by our being placed out of the reach of that swarm of nonsensical publications which issue daily from a thousand presses, and perish almost in issuing? With respect to what are termed polite manners, without sacrificing too much the sincerity of language, I would wish my countrymen to adopt just so much of European politeness, as to be ready to make all those little sacrifices of self, which really render European manners amiable, and relieve society from the disagreeable scenes to which rudeness often subjects it. Here, it seems that a man might pass a life without encountering a single rudeness. In the pleasures of the table, they are far before us, because, with good taste they unite temperance. They do not terminate the most sociable meals by transforming themselves into brutes. I have never yet seen a man drunk in France, even among the lowest of the people. Were I to proceed to tell you how much I enjoy their architecture, sculpture, painting, music, I should want words. It is in these arts they shine. The last of them, particularly, is an enjoyment, the deprivation of which with us, cannot be calculated.—To MR. BELLINI. i, 444. (P., 1785.)

2768. EUROPE, Exclusion from America.—We consider the interests of Cuba, Mexico and ours as the same, and that the object of both must be to exclude all European influence from this hemisphere.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 381. (W., Oct. 1808.) See MONROE DOCTRINE.

2769. EUROPE, Governments of.—Experience declares that man is the only animal which devours his own kind, for I can apply no milder term to the governments of Europe, and to the general prey of the rich on the poor.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 100. FORD ED., iv, 360. (P., 1787.)

2770. EUROPE, Ignorance in.—Ignorance, superstition, poverty, and oppression of body and mind, in every form, are so firmly settled on the mass of the people, that their redemption from them can never be hoped. If all the sovereigns of Europe were to set themselves to work to emancipate the minds of their subjects from their present ignorance and prejudices, and that, as zealously as they now endeavor the contrary, a thousand years would not place them on that high ground, on which our common people are now setting out. Ours could not have been so fairly placed under the control of the common sense of the people had they not been separated from their parent stock, and kept from contamination, either from them, or the other people of the old world, by the intervention of so wide an ocean. To know the worth of this, one must see the want of it here.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 7. (P., 1786.)

— EUROPE, Kings of.—See KINGS.

2772. EUROPE, Pretensions of.—In Europe, nothing but Europe is seen, or supposed to have any right in the affairs of nations.—To M. DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 436. (W., April 1802.)

2773. EUROPE, Republican Government in.—Whether the state of society in Europe can bear a republican government, I doubted, you know, when with you, and I do now. A hereditary chief, strictly limited, the right of war vested in the legislative body, a rigid economy of the public contributions, and absolute interdiction of all useless expenses, will go far towards keeping the government honest and unoppressive.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.)

2774. EUROPE, A world apart.—I consider Europe, at present, as a world apart from us, about which it is improper for us even to form opinions, or to indulge any wishes but the general one, that whatever is to take place in it, may be for its happiness.* —To JULIAN V. NIEMCEWIEZ. v, 69. (M., April 1807.)

2775. EUSTIS (William), Character.—Whether the head of the War Department is equal to his charge, I am not qualified to decide. I knew him only as a pleasant gentlemanly man in Society; and the indecision of his character added to the amenity of his conversation.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 81. FORD ED., ix, 368. (M., Oct. 1812.)

2776. EVILS, Choice of.—It is the melancholy law of human societies to be compelled sometimes to choose a great evil in order to ward off a greater.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 399. (M., 1814.)

2777. EVILS, Cure of.—It is a happy circumstance in human affairs that evils which are not cured in one way will cure themselves

* Niemcewicz was the assumed name of Kosciuszko when he left the United States for Europe in 1807.—EDITOR.

in some other.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. iii, 283. (Pa., 1791.)

2778. EVILS, Good from.—When great evils happen, I am in the habit of looking out for what good may arise from them as consolations to us, and Providence has in fact so established the order of things, as that most evils are the means of producing some good.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 335. FORD ED., vii, 458. (M., 1800.)

2779. EXAMPLE, Good and bad.—I have ever deemed it more honorable and more profitable, too, to set a good example than to follow a bad one.—To M. CORREA. vi, 405. (M., 1814.)

2780. EXCISE, Defined.—Impost is a duty paid on an imported article, in the moment of its importation, and of course it is collected in the seaports only. Excise is a duty on an article, whether imported or raised at home, and paid in the hands of the consumer or retailer. * * * These are the true definitions of these words as used in England, and in the greater part of the United States. But in Massachusetts, they have perverted the word excise to mean a tax on all liquors, whether paid in the moment of importation or at a later moment, and on nothing else. So that on reading the debates of the Massachusetts convention, you must give this last meaning to the word excise.—To J. SANSFIELD. iii, 17. (P., 1798.)

2781. EXCISE LAW, Enactment.—It is proposed to provide additional funds, to meet the additional debt [created by the Assumption], by a tax on spirituous liquors, foreign and home-made, so that the whole interest will be paid by taxes on consumption.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. v, 198. FORD ED., v, 250. (Pa., Nov. 1790.)

2782. EXCISE LAW, Infernal.—The excise law is an infernal one. The first error was to admit it by the Constitution; the second, to act on that admission; the third and last will be, to make it the instrument of dismembering the Union, and setting us all afloat to choose which part of it we will adhere to.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 112. FORD ED., vi, 518. (M., Dec. 1794.)

2784. — — — The excise law I have condemned uniformly from its first conception.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 563. FORD ED., vi, 261. (Pa., May 1793.)

2785. EXCISE LAW, Odious.—The accumulation of debt * * * [created by the Assumption] has obliged [us] * * * to resort to an excise law, of odious character with the people, partial in its operation, unproductive unless enforced by arbitrary and vexatious means, and committing the authority of the government in parts where resistance is most probable, and coercion least practicable.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 361. FORD ED., vi, 2. (Pa., May 1702.)

2786. EXCISE LAW, Resisted.—The people in the western parts of this State [Pennsylvania] have been to the excise officer, and threatened to burn his house, &c. They were blackened and otherwise disguised, so as to be unknown. He has resigned, and H [amilton] says there is no possibility of getting the law executed there, and that probably the evil will spread. A proclamation is to be issued, and another instance of my being forced to appear to approve what I have condemned uniformly from its first conception.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 563. FORD ED., vi, 261. (Pa., May 1793.)

2787. EXCISE LAW, Riots and.—With respect to the transactions against the excise law, it appears to me that you are all swept away in the torrent of governmental opinions, or that we do not know what these transactions have been. We know of none which, according to the definitions of the law, have been anything more than riotous. There was indeed a meeting to consult about a separation. But to consult on a question does not amount to a determination of that question in the affirmative, still less to the acting on such a determination; but we shall see, I suppose, what the court lawyers, and courtly judges and would-be ambassadors will make of it.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 111. FORD ED., vi, 517. (M., Dec. 1794.)

2788. EXCISE LAW Tea-act and.—Make friends with the trans-Alleganians. They are gone if you do not. Do not let false pride make a tea-act of your excise law.—To W. B. GILES. FORD ED., vi, 516. (Dec. 1794.)

2789. EXCISE LAW, Unnecessary.—The excise system, which I considered as prematurely and unnecessarily introduced, I was * * * glad to see fall. It was evident that our existing taxes were then equal to our existing debts. It was clearly foreseen also that the surplus from excise would only become alimient for useless offices, and would be swallowed in idleness by those whom it would withdraw from useful industry.—To SAMUEL SMITH. vii, 284. FORD ED., x, 251. (M., 1823.)

2790. EXCISE LAW, Unpopular.—The excessive unpopularity of the excise and bank bills in the South I apprehend will produce a stand against the Federal Government.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 296. (May 1791.)

2791. EXECUTIVE, Appointment of.—The Executive powers shall be exercised in manner following: One person, to be called the [Administrator], shall be annually appointed by the House of Representatives, on the second day of their first session, who, after having acted [one] year, shall be incapable of being again appointed to that office until he shall have been out of the same

[three] years.*—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 17. (June 1776.)

2792. — — — The Executive powers shall be exercised by a Governor, who shall be chosen by joint ballot of both houses of Assembly, and * * * shall remain in office five years, and be ineligible a second time.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. viii, 446. FORD ED., iii, 325. (1783.)

2793. — — — Render the Executive [of Virginia] a more desirable post to men of abilities by making it more independent of the Legislature. To wit, let him be chosen by other electors, for a longer time, and ineligible forever after. Responsibility is a tremendous engine in a free government. Let him feel the whole weight of it then, by taking away the shelter of his Executive Council. Experience both ways has already established the superiority of this measure.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.)

2794. — — — Submit the members of the Legislature to approbation or rejection at short intervals. Let the Executive be chosen in the same way, and for the same term, by those whose agent he is to be; and leave no screen of a Council behind which to skulk from responsibility.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 11. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

2796. — — — The Deputy-Administrator shall have session and suffrage with the Privy Council.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 20. (June 1776.)

2797. EXECUTIVE, Authority of.—The Administrator shall possess the power formerly held by the King; save only that he shall be bound by acts of the legislature, though not expressly named.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 18. (June 1776.)

2798. — — — The Administrator shall not possess the prerogative * * * of raising or introducing armed forces, building armed vessels, forts or strongholds.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

2799. — — — The Administrator [of Virginia] shall not possess the prerogative * * * of retaining or recalling a member of the State, but by legal process pro delicto vel contractu.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

*The brackets are in the text of the instrument as drawn by Jefferson. The quotation, with those that immediately follow it, marks the development of Jefferson's ideas on the subject of State executive power.—EDITOR.

2800. ——. All other* officers, civil and military, shall be appointed by the Administrator; but such appointment shall be subject to the negative of the Privy Council, saving, however, to the Legislature a power of transferring to any other persons the appointment of such officers, or any of them.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 21. (June 1776.)

2801. EXECUTIVE, Authority over.—The Administrator shall be liable to action, though not to personal restraint, for private duties or wrongs.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 18. (June 1776.)

2803. ——. I was in France when we heard of this schism and separation of our Committee, and, speaking with Dr. Franklin of this singular disposition of men to quarrel and divide into parties, he gave his sentiments, as usual, by way of apologue. He mentioned the Eddystone lighthouse in the British channel, as being built on a rock in the mid-channel, totally inaccessible in winter from the boisterous character of that sea, in that season; that, therefore, for the two keepers, employed to keep up the lights, all provisions for the winter were necessarily carried to them in autumn, as they could never be visited again till the return of the milder season; that, on the first practicable day in the spring a boat put off to them with fresh supplies. The boatmen met at the door one of the keepers and accosted him with a "How goes it, friend?" "Very well". "How is your companion?" "I do not know". "Don't know? Is he not here?" "I can't tell". "Have not you seen him to-day?" "No". "When did you see him?" "Not since last fall".

"You have killed him"? "Not I, indeed". They were about to lay hold of him, as having certainly murdered his companion: but he desired them to go upstairs and examine for themselves. They went up, and there found the other keeper. They had quarrelled, it seems, soon after being left there, had divided into two parties, assigned the cares below to one, and those above to the other, and had never spoken to, or seen one another since.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 54. FORD ED., i, 76. (1820.)

2804. ——. The idea of separating the executive business of the Confederacy from Congress, as the Judiciary is already in some degree, is just and necessary. I had frequently pressed on the members individually, while in Congress, the doing this by a resolution of Congress for appointing an Executive committee to act during the sessions of Congress, as the Committee of the States was to act during their vacations. But the referring to this Committee all executive business, as it should present itself, would require a more persevering self-denial than I suppose Congress to possess. It will be much better to make that separation by a Federal act.—TO JAMES MADISON. ii, 152. FORD ED., iv, 390. (P., June 1787.)

2805. EXECUTIVE, Control over.—The Executive [branch of the government], possessing the rights of self-government from nature, cannot be controlled in the exercise of them but by a law, passed in the forms of the Constitution.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 499. FORD ED., v, 209. (1790.)

2806. EXECUTIVE, Corruption of a plural.—All executive directories become mere sinks of corruption and faction.—TO JAMES MADISON. vii, 190. FORD ED., x, 169. (P.F., 1820.)

2807. EXECUTIVE, French Consulate.—Without much faith in Bonaparte's heart, I have so much in his head, as to indulge another train of reflection. The republican world has been long looking with anxiety on the two experiments going on of a single elective Executive here, and a plurality there. Opinions have been considerably divided on the event in both countries. The greater opinion there has seemed to be heretofore in favor of a plurality; here it has been very generally, though not universally, in favor of a single elective Executive. After eight or nine years' experience of perpetual broils and factions in their Directory, a standing division (under all changes) of three against two, which results in a government by a single opinion, it is possible they may think the experiment decided in favor of our form, and that Bonaparte may be for a single executive, limited in time and power, and flatter himself with the election to that office; and that to this change the nation may rally itself; perhaps it is the only one to which all parties could be rallied. In every case it is to be feared and deplored that that nation has yet to wade through half a century of disorder and convulsions.—TO HENRY INNES. iv, 315. FORD ED., vii, 412. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

2808. EXECUTIVE, French Directory.

—I fear the oligarchical Executive of the French will not do. We have always seen a small council get into cabals and quarrels, the more bitter and relentless the fewer they are. We saw this in our Committee of the States; and that they were from their bad passions, incapable of doing the business of their country. I think that for the prompt, clear and consistent action so necessary in an Executive, unity of person is necessary as with us. I am aware of the objection to this, that the office becoming more important may bring on serious discord in elections. In our country, I think it will be long first; not within our day, and we may safely trust to the wisdom of our successors the remedies of the evils to arise in theirs.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., vii, 56. (M., Feb. 1796.)

2809. ——. I had formerly looked with great interest to the experiment which was going on in France of an Executive Directory, while that of a single elective Executive was under trial here. I thought the issue of them might fairly decide the question between the two modes. But the untimely fate of that establishment cut short the experiment. I have not, however, been satisfied whether the dissensions of that Directory (and which I fear are incident to a plurality) were not the most effective cause of the successful usurpations which overthrew them. It is certainly one of the most interesting questions to a republican, and worthy of great consideration.—To JUDGE WOODWARD. v, 449. (M., May 1809.)

2810. EXECUTIVE, Jealousy of the.—

The Executive in our governments is not the sole, it is scarcely the principal object of my jealousy. The tyranny of the legislatures is the most formidable dread at present and will be for many years. That of the Executive will come in its turn, but it will be at a remote period.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 5. FORD ED., v, 83. (P., 1789.)

2811. EXECUTIVE, The people and.—

The people are not qualified to exercise themselves the Executive department; but they are qualified to name the person who shall exercise it. With us, therefore, they choose this officer every four years.—To M. L'ABBÉ ARNOLD. iii, 81. FORD ED., v, 103. (P., 1789.)

2813. EXECUTIVE, Republican and monarchical.—A monarchical head should confide the execution of its will to departments consisting each of a plurality of hands, who would warp that will as much as possible towards wisdom and moderation, the two qualities it generally wants. But a republican head, founding its decrees, originally, in these two qualities, should commit them to a single hand for execution, giving them, thereby, a

2814. EXECUTIVE, Single and plural.

—When our present government was first established, we had many doubts on this question, and many leanings towards a supreme executive council. It happened that at that time the experiment of such an one was commenced in France, while a single Executive was under trial here. We watched the motions and effects of these two rival plans, with an interest and anxiety proportioned to the importance of a choice between them. The experiment in France failed after a short course, and not from any circumstances peculiar to the times or nation, but from those internal jealousies and dissensions in the Directory, which will ever arise among men equal in power, without a principal to decide and control their differences. We had tried a similar experiment in 1784, by establishing a Committee of the States, composed of a member from every State, then thirteen, to exercise the executive functions during the recess of Congress. They fell immediately into schisms and dissensions, which became at length so inveterate as to render all cooperation among them impracticable; they dissolved themselves, abandoning the helm of government, and it continued without a head, until Congress met the ensuing winter. This was then imputed to the temper of two or three individuals; but the wise ascribed it to the nature of man. The failure of the French Directory, and from the same cause, seems to have authorized a belief that the form of a plurality, however promising in theory, is impracticable with men constituted with the ordinary passions. While the tranquil and steady tenor of our single Executive, during a course of twenty-two years of the most tempestuous times the history of the world has ever presented, gives a rational hope that this important problem is at length solved. Aided by the counsels of a cabinet of heads of departments, originally four, but now five, with whom the President consults, either singly or altogether, he has the benefit of their wisdom and information, brings their views to one centre, and produces an unity of action and direction in all the branches of the government. The excellence of this construction of the executive power has already manifested itself here under very opposite circumstances. During the administration of our first President, his cabinet of four members was equally divided by as marked an opposition of principle as monarchism and republicanism could bring into conflict. Had that cabinet been a Directory, like positive and negative quantities in algebra, the opposing wills would have balanced each other and produced a state of absolute inaction. But the President heard with calmness the opinions and reasons of each, decided the course to be pursued, and kept the government steadily in it, unaffected by the agitation. The public knew well the dissensions of the cabinet, but never had an uneasy thought on their account, because they knew also they had provided a regulating power which would keep the machine in steady movement. I speak with an intimate knowledge of these scenes, quorum pars fui; as I may of others of a character entirely opposite. The third administration, which was of eight years, presented an example of harmony in a cabinet of six persons, to which perhaps history has furnished no parallel. There never arose, during the whole time, an instance of an unpleasant thought or word between the members. We sometimes met under differences of opinion, but scarcely ever failed, by conversing and reasoning, so to modify each other's ideas, as to produce an unanimous result. Yet, able and amicable as these members were, I am not certain this would have been the case, had each possessed equal and independent powers. Ill-defined limits of their respective departments, jealousies, trifling at first, but nourished and strengthened by repetition of occasions, intrigues without doors of designing persons to build an importance to themselves on the divisions of others, might, from small beginnings, have produced persevering oppositions. But the power of decision in the President left no object for internal dissension, and external intrigue was stifled in embryo by the knowledge which incendiaries possessed, that no division they could foment would change the course of the executive power. I am not conscious that my participations in executive authority have produced any bias in favor of the single Executive; because the parts I have acted have been in the subordinate, as well as superior stations, and because, if I know myself, what I have felt, and what I have wished, I know that I have never been so well pleased, as when I could shift power from my own, on the shoulders of others; nor have I ever been able to conceive how any rational being could propose happiness to himself from the exercise of power over others. I am still, however, sensible of the solidity of your principle, that, to insure the safety of the public liberty, its depository should be subject to be changed with the greatest ease possible, and without suspending or disturbing for a moment the movements of the machine of government. You apprehend that a single Executive, with eminence of talent, and destitution of principle, equal to the object, might, by usurpation, render his powers hereditary. Yet I think history furnishes as many examples of a single usurper arising out of a government by a plurality, as of temporary trusts of power in a single hand rendered permanent by usurpation. I do not believe, therefore, that this danger is lessened in the hands of a plural Executive. Perhaps it is greatly increased, by the state of inefficiency to which they are liable from feuds and divisions among themselves. The conservative body you propose might be so constituted, as, while it would be an admirable sedative in a variety of smaller cases, might also be a valuable sentinel and check on the liberticide views of an ambitious individual. I am friendly to this idea. But the true barriers of our liberty in this country are our State governments; and the wisest conservative power ever contrived by man, is that of which our Revolution and present government found us possessed. Seventeen distinct States, amalgamated into one as to their foreign concerns, but single and independent as to their internal administration, regularly organized with a legislature and governor resting on the choice of the people, and enlightened by a free press, can never be so fascinated by the arts of one man, as to submit voluntarily to his usurpation. Nor can they be constrained to it by any force he can possess. While that may paralyze the single State in which it happens to be encamped, sixteen others, spread over a country of two thousand miles diameter, rise up on every side, ready organized for deliberation by a constitutional legislature, and for action by their governor, constitutionally the commander of the militia of the State, that is to say, of every man in it able to bear arms; and that militia, too, regularly formed into regiments and battalions, into infantry, cavalry and artillery, trained under officers general and subordinate, legally appointed, always in readiness, and to whom they are already in habits of obedience. The republican government of France was lost without a struggle because the party of "un et indivisible" had prevailed; no provisional organization existed to which the people might rally under authority of the laws, the seats of the Directory were virtually vacant, and a small force sufficed to turn the legislature out of their chamber, and to salute its leader chief of the nation. But with us, sixteen out of seventeen States rising in mass, under regular organization, and legal commanders, united in object and action by their Congress, or, if that be in duress, by a Special Convention, present such obstacles to an usurper as forever to stifle ambition in the first conception of that object. Dangers of another kind might more reasonably be apprehended from this perfect and distinct organization, civil and military, of the States; to wit, that certain States from local and occasional discontents, might attempt to secede from the Union. This is certainly possible; and would be befriended by this regular organization. But it is not probable that local discontents can spread to such an extent, as to be able to face the sound parts of so extensive an Union; and if ever they should reach the majority, they would then become the regular government, acquire the ascendancy in Congress, and be able to redress their own grievances by laws peaceably and constitutionally passed. And even the States in which local discontents might engender a commencement of fermentation, would be paralyzed and self-checked by that very division into parties into which we have fallen, into which all States must fall wherein men are at liberty to think, speak, and act freely, according to the diversities of their individual conformations, and which are, perhaps, essential to preserve the purity of the government, by the censorship which these parties habitually exercise over each other.—To M. DESTUTT TRACY. v, 567. FORD ED., ix, 306. (M., Jan. 1811.)

2815. ———. If experience has ever taught a truth, it is that a plurality in the Supreme Executive will forever split in the discordant factions, distract the nation, annihilate its energies, and force the nation, to rally under a single head, generally an usurper. We have, I think, fallen on the happiest of all modes of constituting the Executive, that of easing and aiding our President, by permitting him to choose Secretaries of State, of Finance, of War, and of the Navy, with whom he may advise, either separately or all together, and remedy their divisions by adopting or controlling their opinions at his discretion; this saves the nation from the evils of a divided will, and secures to it a steady march in the systematic course which the President may have adopted for that of his administration.—To M. CORAY. vii, 321. (M., 1823.) See PRESIDENT.

2816. EXERCISE, Amount of.—Not less than two hours a day should be devoted to exercise.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 294. (P., 1786.)

2817. ———. Give about two hours every day, to exercise; for health must not be sacrificed to learning. A strong body makes the mind strong.*—To PETER CARR. i, 397. (P., 1785.)

2818. ———. I give more time to exercise of the body than of the mind, believing it wholesome to both.—To DAVID HOWELL. v, 555. (M., 1810.)

2819. EXERCISE, Carriage.—A carriage is no better than a cradle.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 293. (P., 1786.)

2820. EXERCISE, The gun and.—As to the species of exercise, I advise the gun. While this gives a moderate exercise to the body, it gives boldness, enterprise, and independence to the mind. Games played with ball, and others of that nature, are too violent for the body, and stamp no character on the mind. Let your gun, therefore, be the constant companion of your walks.—To PETER CARR. i, 397. (P., 1785.)

2821. EXERCISE, Health and.—You are not to consider yourself as unemployed while taking exercise. That is necessary for your health, and health is the first of all objects.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 372. (1787.)

2822. ———. Exercise and recreation are as necessary as reading: I will say rather more necessary, because health is worth more than learning.—To JOHN GARLAND JEFFERSON. FORD ED., v, 180. (N.Y., 1790.)

2823. EXERCISE, Horseback.—A horse gives but a kind of half exercise.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 293. (P., 1786.) See HORSES.

2824. EXERCISE, Invigoration by.—The sovereign invigorator of the body is exercise.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 201. (P., 1786.)

* was Jefferson's nephew.—EDITOR.

2825. EXERCISE, Love of.—The loss of the power of taking exercise would be a sore affliction to me. It has been the delight of my retirement to be in constant bodily activity, looking after my affairs. It was never damped as the pleasures of reading are, by the question cui bono? * * * Your works show that of your mind. The habits of exercise which your calling has given to both, will tend long to preserve them. The sedentary character of my occupations sapped a constitution naturally strong and vigorous, and draws it to an earlier close.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 4. FORD ED., ix, 328. (P.F., 1811.)

2827. EXERCISE, Time for.—I would advise you to take your exercise in the afternoon; not because it is the best time for exercise, for certainly it is not, but because it is the best time to spare from your studies; and habit will soon reconcile it to health, and render it nearly as useful as if you gave to that the more precious hours of the day.—To PETER CARR. i, 398. (P., 1785.)

2828. ———. When you shall find yourself strong,* you may venture to take your walks in the evening, after the digestion of the dinner is pretty well over. This is making a compromise between health and study. The latter would be too much interrupted were you to take from it the early hours of the day, and habit will soon render the evening's exercise as salutary as that of the morning. I speak this from my own experience, having, from an early attachment to study, very early in life, made this arrangement of my time, having ever observed it, and still observing it, and always with perfect success.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 294. (P., 1786.)

2829. EXERCISE, Walking.—Of all exercises walking is the best. * * * No one knows, till he tries, how easily a habit of walking is acquired. A person who never walked three miles will in the course of a month become able to walk fifteen or twenty without fatigue. I have known some great walkers, and had particular accounts of many more; and I never knew or heard of one who was not healthy and long lived.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 293. (P., 1786.)

2830. ———. 'Walking is the best possible exercise. Habituate yourself to walk very far. The Europeans value themselves on having subdued the horse to the uses of man; but I doubt whether we have not lost more than we have gained, by the use of this animal. No one has occasioned so much the degeneracy of the human body. An Indian goes on foot nearly as far in a day, for a long journey, as an enfeebled white does on his horse: and he will tire the best horses. There is no habit you will value so much as that of walking far without fatigue.—To PETER CARR. i, 398. (P., 1785.)

2831. ———. Take a great deal of exercise and on foot.—To PETER CARR. ii, 241. FORD ED., iv, 433. (P., 1787.)

* Randolph was in feeble health, and while in that condition Jefferson recommended the middle of the day for walking.—EDITOR.

2832. EXERCISE, Weather and.—The weather should be little regarded. A person not sick will not be injured by getting wet. It is but taking a cold bath which never gives a cold to any one. Brute animals are the most healthy, and they are exposed to all weather and, of men, those are healthiest who are the most exposed. The recipe of these two descriptions of beings is simple diet, exercise and the open air, be its state what it will: and we may venture to say that this recipe will give health and vigor to every other description.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 294. (P., 1786.)

2833. EXILE, Punishment by.—Exile [is] the most rational of all punishments for meditated treason.—To LEVI LINCOLN. vi, 8. (M., 1811.)

2834. EXPANSION, Safety in.—I know that the acquisition of Louisiana has been disapproved by some, from a candid apprehension that the enlargement of territory would endanger its Union. But who can limit the extent to which the federative principle may operate effectively? The larger our association, the less will it be shaken by local passions.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 41. FORD ED., viii, 344. (1805.) See TERRITORY.

2835. EXPATRIATION, Assertion of the right.—Our ancestors, before their emigration to America, were the free inhabitants of the British dominions in Europe, and possessed a right, which nature has given to all men, of departing from the country in which chance, not choice, has placed them, of going in quest of new habitations, and of there establishing new societies, under such laws and regulations as, to them, shall seem most likely to promote public happiness. Their Saxon ancestors had, under this universal law, in like manner, left their native wilds and woods in the North of Europe, had possessed themselves of the Island of Britain, then less charged with inhabitants, and had established there that system of laws which has so long been the glory and protection of that country. Nor was ever any claim of superiority or dependence asserted over them by that mother country from which they had migrated; and were such a claim made, it is believed his Majesty's subjects in Great Britain have too firm a feeling of the rights derived to them from their ancestors, to bow down the sovereignty of their State before such visionary pretensions. And it is thought that no circumstance has occurred to distinguish, materially, the British from the Saxon emigration.*—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 125. FORD ED., i, 429. (1774.)

* Rayner in his Life of Jefferson (c. 3) says: "The correct definition and answer of the great question which formed the hinge of the American Revolution, to wit, of the right of taxation without representation, were original with Mr. Jefferson. He, following out the right of expatriation into all its legitimate consequences, advanced at once, to the necessary conclusion, and the only one which he deemed orthodox or tenable—that there was no political connection whatever between the Parliament of Great Britain and the Colonies: and consequently, that it had no right to tax them in any case—not even for the regulation of commerce. The other patriots, either not admitting the right of expatriation, or, which is most likely, not having pur-

2837. EXPATRIATION, A natural right.—I hold the right of expatriation to be inherent in every man by the laws of nature, and incapable of being rightfully taken from him even by the united will of every other person in the nation. If the laws have provided no particular mode by which the right of expatriation may be exercised, the individual may do it by any effectual and unequivocal act or declaration. The laws of Virginia have provided a mode; Mr. Cooper is said to have exercised his right solemnly and exactly according to that mode, and to have departed from the commonwealth; whereupon the law declares that "he shall henceforth be deemed no citizen". Returning afterwards he returns an alien, and must proceed to make himself a citizen if he desires it, as every other alien does. At present, he can hold no lands, receive nor transmit any inheritance, nor enjoy any other right peculiar to a citizen. The General Government has nothing to do with this question. Congress may, by the Constitution, "establish an uniform rule of naturalization", that is, by what rule an alien may become a citizen; but they cannot take from a citizen his natural right of divesting himself of the character of a citizen by expatriation.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 458. (W., June 1806.)

ever heard of one in which it was not. How it is among our savage neighbors, who have no law but that of Nature, we all know.—To DR. JOHN MANNERS. vii, 73. FORD ED., x, 87. (M., 1817.)

2840. ———. Early in the session [of the Virginia Assembly] of May, 1799, I prepared and obtained leave to bring in a bill declaring who should be deemed citizens, asserting the natural right of expatriation, and prescribing the mode of exercising it. 2843. EXPORTS, Taxation of.—Your pamphlet is replete with sound views, some of which will doubtless be adopted. Some may be checked by difficulties. None more likely to be so than the proposition to amend the Constitution, so as to authorize Congress to tax exports. The provision against this in the framing of that instrument, was a sine qua non with the States of peculiar productions, as rice, indigo, cotton and tobacco, to which may now be added sugar. A jealousy prevailing that to the few States producing these articles, the justice of the others might not be a sufficient protection in opposition to their interest, they moored themselves to this anchor. Since the hostile dispositions lately manifested by the Eastern States, they would be less willing than before to place themselves at their mercy; and the rather, as the Eastern States have no exports which can be taxed equivalently. It is possible, however, that this difficulty might be got over; but the subject looking forward beyond my time, I leave it to those to whom its burdens and benefits will belong, adding only my prayers for whatever may be best for our country.—To ANDREW G. MITCHELL. vi, 483. (M., 1815.)

2844. EXTRAVAGANCE, Deplored.—All my letters [from America] are filled with details of our extravagance. From these accounts, I look back to the time of the war as a time of happiness and enjoyment, when amidst the privation of many things not essential to happiness, we could not run in debt, because nobody would trust us; when we practiced by necessity the maxim of buying nothing but what we had money in our pockets to pay for; a maxim which, of all others, lays the broadest foundation for happiness.—To MR. SHIPWITH. ii, 191. (P., 1787.)

2845. EXTRAVAGANCE, Discontent and.—A continuation of inconsiderate expense seems to have raised the [French] nation to the highest pitch of discontent.—To M. DE CREVECEUR. ii, 234. (P., 1787.)

2846. EXTRAVAGANCE, Evil of.—I consider the extravagance which has seized [my countrymen] as a more baneful evil than toryism was during the war. It is the more so, as the example is set by the best and most amiable characters among us.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

2847. EXTRAVAGANCE, Governmental.—If we can prevent the government from wasting the labors of the people, under the pretence of taking care of them, they must become happy.—To THOMAS COOPER. iv, 453. FORD ED., viii, 178. (W., 1802.)

2848. ———. Private fortunes are destroyed by public as well as by private extravagance.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 14. FORD ED., x, 42. (M., 1816.)

2850. EXTRAVAGANCE, Wanton.—Our predecessors, in order to increase expense, debt, taxation, and patronage, tried always how much they could give.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 445. FORD ED., viii, 191. (W., 1803.)

2851. FACTION, Baleful.—In the present factions division of your State [Pennsylvania] an angel from heaven could do no good.—To W. T. FRANKLIN. i, 555. (P., 1786.)

2852. FACTION, Government and.—With respect to the schism among the republicans of your State [Pennsylvania] I have ever declared to both parties that I consider the General Government as bound to take no part in it, and I have carefully kept both my judgment, my affections, and my conduct, clear of all bias to either.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 182. (M., 1807.)

2853. FACTION, Violent.—I have seen with regret the violence of the dissensions in your quarter [Mississippi]. We have the same in the Territories of Louisiana and Michigan. It seems that the smaller the society the bitterer the dissensions into which it breaks. Perhaps this observation answers all the objections drawn by Mr. [John] Adams from the small republics of Italy. I believe ours is to owe its permanence to its great extent, and the smaller portion comparatively, which can ever be convulsed at one time by local passions.—To GOVERNOR ROBERT WILLIAMS. v, 209. FORD ED., ix, 166. (Nov. 1807.)

2854. FAITH (Good), Adherence to.—It is a great consolation to me that our government, as it cherishes most its duties to its own citizens, so is it the most exact in its moral conduct towards other nations. I do not believe that in the four Administrations which have taken place, there has been a single instance of departure from good faith towards other nations. We may sometimes have mistaken our rights, or made an erroneous estimate of the actions of others, but no voluntary wrong can be imputed to us.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x, 68. (P.F., Nov. 1816.)

2856. FAITH (Good), The surest guide.—Good faith is every man's surest guide.*—PEACE PROCLAMATION. FORD ED., iii, 377. (1784.)

2857. FAITH (Public), Breach of impossible.—The separation of these troops (British prisoners in Virginia) would be a breach of public faith, therefore, I suppose it is impossible.—To GOVERNOR HENRY. i, 221. FORD ED., ii, 179. (1779.)

2858. FAITH (Public), Cherishing.—I think it very certain that a decided majority of the next Congress will be actuated by a very different spirit from that which governed the two preceding Congresses. Public faith will be cherished equally, I would say more, because it will be on purer principles; and the tone and proceedings of the government will be brought back to the true spirit of the Constitution, without disorganizing the machine in its essential parts.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. FORD ED., vi, 214. (Pa., April 1793.)

2859. FAITH (Public), Preservation of.—[The] sacred preservation of the public faith. I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

public debt will be ever sacredly good. The public faith is bound for this, and no change of system will ever be permitted to touch this; but no other paper stands on ground equally sure.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 343. FORD ED., v, 460. (Pa., March 1792.)

2862. FAITH (Public), Respect for.—A respect for public faith, though it was engaged by false brethren, must protect the funding phalanx.—To C. D. ESELING. FORD ED., vii, 47. (1795.)

2863. FALSEHOOD, Truth and.—He who knows nothing is nearer the truth than he whose mind is filled with falsehoods and errors.—To JOHN NORVELL. v, 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

2864. FAMILY, Affection.—The circle of our nearest connections is the only one in which a faithful and lasting affection can be found, one which will adhere to us under all changes and chances. It is, therefore, the only soil on which it is worth while to bestow much culture. Of this truth you will become more convinced every day you advance into life.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. D. L. J. 255. (Pa., 1799.)

2865. FAMILY, Complications in.—If the lady has anything difficult in her disposition, avoid what is rough, and attach her good qualities to you.* Consider what are otherwise as a bad stop in your harpsichord, and do not touch on it, but make yourself happy with the good ones. Every human being must thus be viewed, according to what it is good for; for none of us, no not one, is perfect; and were we to love none who had imperfections, this world would be a desert for our love. All we can do is to make the best of our friends, love and cherish what is good in them, and keep out of the way of what is bad; but no more think of rejecting them for it, than of throwing away a piece of music for a flat passage or two. Your situation will require peculiar attentions and respect to both parties. Let no proof be too much for either your patience or acquiescence. Be you the link of love, union, and peace for the whole family. The world will give you the more credit for it, in proportion to the difficulty of the task, and your own happiness will be the greater as you perceive that you promote that of others.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J. 187. (N.Y., 1790.)

2866. FAMILY, A happy.—I now see our fireside formed into a group no one member of which has a fibre in their composition which can ever produce any jarring or jealousies among us. No irregular passions, no dangerous bias, which may render problematical the future fortunes and happiness of our descendants. We are quieted as to their condition for at least one generation more.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J. 245. (Pa., 1797.)

*Jefferson was advising his daughter respecting her demeanor towards a young wife whom her father-in-law had married.—EDITOR.

2867. FAMILY, Love of.—It is in the love of one's family only that heartfelt happiness is known.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. D. L. J. 281. (W., 1801.)

2868. FAMILY, Society.—When I look to the ineffable pleasure of my family society. I become more and more disgusted with the jealousies, the hatred, and the rancorous and malignant passions of this scene [the Capital], and lament my having ever again been drawn into public view. Tranquillity is now my object.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J. 245. (Pa., 1797.)

2870. FAMILY TIES.—I find myself detaching very fast, perhaps too fast, from everything but yourself, your sister, and those who are identified with you. These form the last hold the world will have on me, the cords which will be cut only when I am loosened from this state of being.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J. 248. (Pa., 1798.)

2871. — — — My attachments to the world, and whatever it can offer, are daily wearing off; but you are one of the links which hold to my existence, and can only break off with that.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. D. L. J. 263. (Pa., 1800.)

2872. FAMILY, Unhappiness without.—By a law of our nature, we cannot be happy without the endearing connections of a family.—To W. CLARKE. v, 468. (M., 1809.)

2873. FAMINE, Anarchy and.—The first thing to be feared for the French Republic is famine. This will infallibly produce anarchy. Indeed, that joined to a draft of soldiers, has already produced some serious insurrections.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 570. (Pa., June 1793.)

2874. FAMINE, Insurrection and.—We are in danger of hourly insurrection [in Paris] for want of bread; and an insurrection once begun for that cause, may associate itself with those discontented for other causes, and produce incalculable events.—To E. RUTLEDGE. iii, 111. (P., Sep. 1789.)

2875. FANATICISM, Education and.—The atmosphere of our country is unquestionably charged with a threatening cloud of fanaticism, lighter in some parts, denser in others, but too heavy in all. * * * The diffusion of instruction * * * will be the * * * remedy for this fever of fanaticism.—To THOMAS COOPER. vii, 266. FORD ED., x, 242. (M., 1822.)

2876. FANATICISM, Growth and decline.—I hope and believe you are mistaken in supposing the reign of fanaticism to be on the advance. I think it certainly declining. It was first excited artificially by the sovereigns of Europe as an engine of opposition to Bonaparte and to France. It rose to a great height there, and became, indeed, a powerful engine of loyalism, and of support to their governments. But that loyalism is giving way to very different dispositions, and its prompter, fanaticism, is vanishing with it. In the meantime, it had been wafted across the Atlantic, and chiefly from England, with their other fashions, but it is here also on the wane.—To THOMAS COOPER. vii, 170. (M., 1820.)

2877. FANEUIL HALL, Sedition and.—What mischief is this which is brewing anew between Faneuil Hall and the nation of God-dem-meas? Will that focus of sedition be never extinguished?—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., iv, 68. (P., July 1785.)

2878. FARMER, Jefferson as a.—When I first entered on the stage of public life (now twenty-four years ago). I came to a resolution never * * * to wear any other character than that of a farmer.—To — — — iii, 527. (Pa., 1793.)

2879. — — — To keep a Virginia estate together requires in the owner both skill and attention. Skill, I never had, and attention I could not have; and, really, when I reflect on all circumstances, my wonder is that I should have been so long as sixty years in reaching the result to which I am now reduced.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., x, 383. (M., 1826.)

2880. FARMERS, Americanism of.—Farmers, whose interests are entirely agricultural, are the true representatives of the great American interests, and are alone to be relied on for expressing the proper American sentiments.—To ARTHUR CAMPBELL. iv, 198. FORD ED., vii, 170. (M., 1797.)

2881. FARMERS, Barter and.—The truth is that farmers, as we all are, have no command of money. Our necessities are supplied, either from our farms, or a neighboring store. Our produce, at the end of the year, is delivered to the merchant, and thus the business of the year is done by barter, without the intervention of scarcely a dollar; and thus, also, we live with a plenty of everything except money.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 576. FORD ED., ix, 312. (M., 1811.)

2882. FARMERS, As citizens.—Cultivators of the earth are the most valuable citizens. They are the most vigorous, the most independent, the most virtuous, and they are tied to their country, and wedded to its liberty and interests, by the most lasting bonds. As long, therefore, as they can find employment in this line. I would not convert them into mariners, artisans, or anything else.—To JOHN JAY. i, 403. FORD ED., iv, 88. (P., 1785.)

2883. — — — Cultivators of the earth are the most virtuous citizens and possess most of the amor patriæ.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 288. FORD ED., iv, 143. (P., 1786.)

2884. ——. The proportion which the aggregate of the other classes of citizens bears in any State to that of its husbandmen, is, generally speaking, the proportion of its unsound to its healthy parts, and is a good enough barometer whereby to measure its degree of corruption.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 405. FORD ED., iii, 269. 2885. ——. Cultivators of the earth are the most virtuous and independent citizens.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 413. FORD ED., iii, 279. (1782.)

2886. FARMERS, Education of.—The agriculturist needs ethics, mathematics, chemistry and natural philosophy. To them the languages are but ornament and comfort.—TO JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 133. (P.F., 1819.)

2887. FARMERS, Happiness of Virginia.—I know no condition happier than that of a Virginia farmer might be, conducting himself as he did during the war [of the Revolution]. His estate supplies a good table, clothes himself and his family with their ordinary apparel, furnishes a small surplus to buy salt, sugar, coffee, and a little finery for his wife and daughters, enables him to receive and to visit his friends and furnishes him pleasing and healthy occupation. To secure all this, he needs the one act of self-denial, to put off buying anything till he has the money to pay for it.—TO DR. CURRIE. ii, 219. (P., 1787.)

2888. FARMERS, Morals of.—Corruption of morals in the mass of cultivators is a phenomenon of which no age nor nation has furnished an example. It is the mark set on those, who, not looking up to heaven, to their own soil and industry, as does the husbandman, for their subsistence, depend for it on casualties and caprice of customers.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 405. FORD ED., iii, 268. (1782.)

2889. FARMERS, Neglected.—Here [Philadelphia, the seat of government], the unmoneied farmer, as he is termed, his cattle and crops, are no more thought of than if they did not feed us. Scrip and stock are food and raiment here.—TO T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 455. (Pa., 1792.)

— FARMERS, Plundered.—See 2589.

2890. FARMERS, Prices and.—Our farmers are cheerful in the expectation of a good price for wheat in autumn. Their pulse will be regulated by this, and not by the successes or disasters of the war.—TO PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 78. (M., Aug. 1812.)

2891. FARMERS, Sacrificing.—Shall the whole mass of our farmers be sacrificed to the class of shipwrights?—OPINION ON SHIP PASSPORTS. vii, 625. (May, 1793.)

2892. FARMERS, Virtues of.—Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people or God, if He ever had a chosen people, whose breasts He has made His peculiar deposit for substantial and genuine virtue. It is the focus in which he keeps alive that sa-

2893. FARMING, Absorbed in.—If you visit me as a farmer, it must be as a co-disciple; for I am but a learner; an eager one indeed, but yet desperate, being too old now to learn a new art. However, I am as much delighted and occupied with it, as if I was the greatest adept. I shall talk with you about it from morning till night, and put you on very short allowance as to political aliment. Now and then a pious ejaculation for the French and Dutch republicans, returning with due dispatch to clover, potatoes, wheat, &c.—TO W. B. GILES, iv, 118. FORD ED., vii, 12. (M., 1795.)

2894. FARMING, Ardor for.—I return to farming with an ardor which I scarcely knew in my youth, and which has got the better entirely of my love of study.—TO JOHN ADAMS. iv, 103. FORD ED., vi, 505. (M., April 1794.)

2895. FARMING, Beauty and.—In Virginia we are all farmers, but not in a pleasing style. We have so little labor in proportion to our land that, although perhaps we make more profit from the same labor, we cannot give to our grounds that style of beauty which satisfies the eye of the amateur.—TO C. W. PEALE. vi, 6. (P.F., 1811.)

2896. FARMING, Delight in.—No occupation is so delightful to me as the culture of the earth.—TO C. W. PEALE. vi, 6. (P.F., 1811.)

2897. FARMING, Management.—A farm, however large, is not more difficult to direct than a garden, and does not call for more attention or skill.—TO J. B. STUART. vii, 64. (M., 1817.)

2898. FARMING, Theory and practice.—Attached to agriculture by inclination, as well as by a conviction that it is the most useful of the occupations of man, my course of life has not permitted me to add to its theories the lessons of practice.—TO M. SILVESTRE. v, 83. (W., 1807.)

2899. FASHION, Revolution and.—I have hopes that the majority of the nobles are already disposed to join the Tiers Etat in deciding that the vote [in the States General] shall be by persons. This is the opinion a la mode at present, and mode has acted a wonderful part in the present instance. All the handsome young women, for example, are for the Tiers Etat, and this is an army more powerful in France, than the 200,000 men of the King.—TO DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 11. FORD ED., v, 87. (1789.)

ple from the lethargy into which they had fallen as to passing events; and thought that the appointment of a day of general fasting and prayer would be most likely to call up and alarm their attention. No example of such a solemnity had existed since the days of our distresses in the war of 1755, since which a new generation had grown up. With the help, therefore, of Rushworth, whom we rummaged over for the revolutionary precedents and forms of the Puritans of that day, preserved by him, we cooked up a resolution, somewhat modernizing their phrases, for appointing the 1st day of June, on which the Port-bill was to commence, for a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, to implore Heaven to avert from us the evils of civil war, to inspire us with firmness in support of our rights, and to turn the hearts of the King and Parliament to moderation and justice. To give greater emphasis to our proposition, we agreed to wait the next morning on Mr. [Robert Carter] Nicholas, whose grave and religious character was more in unison with the tone of our resolution, and to solicit him to move it. We accordingly went to him in the morning. He moved it the same day; the 1st of June was proposed; and it passed without opposition. The Governor dissolved us as usual. * * * We returned home, and in our several counties invited the clergy to meet assemblies of the people on the 1st of June, to perform the ceremonies of the day, and to address to them discourses suited to the occasion. The people met generally, with anxiety and alarm in their countenances, and the effect of the day through the whole Colony, was like a shock of electricity, arousing every man, and placing him erect and solidly on his centre.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 6. FORD ED., i, 9. (1820.)

2901. FAST-DAYS, Federal Government and.—I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling in religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises. This results not only from the provision that no law shall be made respecting the establishment or free exercise of religion, but from that also which reserves to the States the powers not delegated to the United States. Certainly, no power to prescribe any religious exercise, or to assume authority in religious discipline, has been delegated to the General Government. It must, then, rest with the States, so far as it can be in any human authority. But it is only proposed that I should recommend, not prescribe, a day of fasting and prayer. That is, that I should indirectly assume to the United States an authority over religious exercises, which the Constitution has directly precluded them from. It must be meant, too, that this recommendation is to carry some authority, and to be sanctioned by some penalty on those who disregard it; not indeed of fine and imprisonment, but of some degree of proscription perhaps in public opinion. And does the change in the nature of the penalty make the recommendation less a law of conduct for those to whom it is directed? I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercises, its discipline, or its doctrines; nor of the religious societies, that the civil Government should be invested with power of effecting any uniformity of time or matter among them. Fasting and prayer are religious exercises; the enjoining them an act of discipline. Every religious society has a right to determine for itself the times for these exercises, and the objects proper for them, according to their own particular tenets; and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it. I am aware that the practice of my predecessors may be quoted. But I have ever believed that the example of State executives led to the assumption of that authority by the General Government, without due examination, which would have discovered that what might be a right in a State government, was a violation of that right when assumed by another. Be this as it may, every one must act according to the dictates of his own reason, and mine tells me that civil powers alone have been given to the President of the United States, and no authority to direct the religious exercises of his constituents.—TO REV. SAMUEL MILLER. v, 236. FORD ED., ix, 174. (W., 1808.)

2902. ——. In matters of religion, I have considered that its free exercise is placed by the Constitution independent of the power of the General Government. I have, therefore, undertaken on no occasion to prescribe the religious exercises suited to it; but have left them as the Constitution found them, under the direction and discipline of State or Church authorities acknowledged by the several religious societies.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 42. FORD ED., vii, 344. 2912. FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, Formation of.—I find by the public papers, that your commercial convention [at Annapolis] failed in point of representation. If it should produce a full meeting in May, and a broader reformation, it will still be well. To make us one nation, as to foreign concerns, and keep us distinct in domestic ones, gives the outline of the proper division of powers between the general and particular governments. But, to enable the federal head to exercise the powers given it to best advantage, it should be organized, as the particular ones are, into legislative, executive and judiciary. The first and last are already separated. The second should also be. When last with Congress, I often proposed to members to do this, by making of the Committee of the States, an Executive Committee during the recess, of Congress, and, during its sessions, to appoint a committee to receive and despatch all executive business, so that Congress itself should meddle only with what should be legislative. But I question if any Congress (much less all successively) can have self-denial enough to go through with this distribution. The distribution, then, should be imposed on them.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 65. FORD ED., iv, 332. (P., Dec. 16, 1786.)

ecutive and legislative powers, as the judiciary already are in some degree. * * * The want of it has been the source of more evil than we have experienced from any other cause. Nothing is so embarrassing nor so mischievous in a great assembly as the details of execution. The smallest trifle of that kind occupies as long as the most important act of legislation, and takes place of everything else. Let any man recollect, or look over the files of [the Confederation] Congress; he will observe the most important propositions hanging over, from week to week, and month to month, till the occasions have passed them, and the thing never done. I have ever viewed the executive details as the greatest cause of evil to us, because they, in fact, place us as if we had no federal head, by diverting the attention of that head from great to small objects; and should this division of power not be recommended by the convention, it is my opinion Congress should make it itself, by establishing an Executive Committee.—To E. 2808. EXECUTIVE, French Directory.

—I fear the oligarchical Executive of the French will not do. We have always seen a small council get into cabals and quarrels, the more bitter and relentless the fewer they are. We saw this in our Committee of the States; and that they were from their bad passions, incapable of doing the business of their country. I think that for the prompt, clear and consistent action so necessary in an Executive, unity of person is necessary as with us. I am aware of the objection to this, that the office becoming more important may bring on serious discord in elections. In our country, I think it will be long first; not within our day, and we may safely trust to the wisdom of our successors the remedies of the evils to arise in theirs.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., vii, 56. (M., Feb. 1796.)

2809. ——. I had formerly looked with great interest to the experiment which was going on in France of an Executive Directory, while that of a single elective Executive was under trial here. I thought the issue of them might fairly decide the question between the two modes. But the untimely fate of that establishment cut short the experiment. I have not, however, been satisfied whether the dissensions of that Directory (and which I fear are incident to a plurality) were not the most effective cause of the successful usurpations which overthrew them. It is certainly one of the most interesting questions to a republican, and worthy of great consideration.—To JUDGE WOODWARD. v, 449. (M., May 1809.)

2810. EXECUTIVE, Jealousy of the.

The Executive in our governments is not the sole, it is scarcely the principal object of my jealousy. The tyranny of the legislatures is the most formidable dread at present and will be for many years. That of the Executive will come in its turn, but it will be at a remote period.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 5. FORD ED., v, 83. (P., 1789.)

2811. EXECUTIVE, The people and.

The people are not qualified to exercise themselves the Executive department; but they are qualified to name the person who shall exercise it. With us, therefore, they choose this officer every four years.—To M. L'ABBÉ ARNOLD. iii, 81. FORD ED., v, 103. (P., 1789.)

2813. EXECUTIVE, Republican and monarchical.—A monarchical head should confide the execution of its will to departments consisting each of a plurality of hands, who would warp that will as much as possible towards wisdom and moderation, the two qualities it generally wants. But a republican head, founding its decrees, originally, in these two qualities, should commit them to a single hand for execution, giving them, thereby, a

2814. EXECUTIVE, Single and plural.

—When our present government was first established, we had many doubts on this question, and many leanings towards a supreme executive council. It happened that at that time the experiment of such an one was commenced in France, while a single Executive was under trial here. We watched the motions and effects of these two rival plans, with an interest and anxiety proportioned to the importance of a choice between them. The experiment in France failed after a short course, and not from any circumstances peculiar to the times or nation, but from those internal jealousies and dissensions in the Directory, which will ever arise among men equal in power, without a principal to decide and control their differences. We had tried a similar experiment in 1784, by establishing a Committee of the States, composed of a member from every State, then thirteen, to exercise the executive functions during the recess of Congress. They fell immediately into schisms and dissensions, which became at length so inveterate as to render all cooperation among them impracticable; they dissolved themselves, abandoning the helm of government, and it continued without a head, until Congress met the ensuing winter. This was then imputed to the temper of two or three individuals; but the wise ascribed it to the nature of man. The failure of the French Directory, and from the same cause, seems to have authorized a belief that the form of a plurality, however promising in theory, is impracticable with men constituted with the ordinary passions. While the tranquil and steady tenor of our single Executive, during a course of twenty-two years of the most tempestuous times the history of the world has ever presented, gives a rational hope that this important problem is at length solved. Aided by the counsels of a cabinet of heads of departments, originally four, but now five, with whom the President consults, either singly or altogether, he has the benefit of their wisdom and information, brings their views to one centre, and produces an unity of action and direction in all the branches of the government. The excellence of this construction of the executive power has already manifested itself here under very opposite circumstances. During the administration of our first President, his cabinet of four members was equally divided by as marked an opposition of principle as monarchism and republicanism could bring into conflict. Had that cabinet been a Directory, like positive and negative quantities in algebra, the opposing wills would have balanced each other and produced a state of absolute inaction. But the President heard with calmness the opinions and reasons of each, decided the course to be pursued, and kept the government steadily in it, unaffected by the agitation. The public knew well the dissensions of the cabinet, but never had an uneasy thought on their account, because they knew also they had provided a regulating power which would keep the machine in steady movement. I speak with an intimate knowledge of these scenes, quorum pars fui; as I may of others of a character entirely opposite. The third administration, which was of eight years, presented an example of harmony in a cabinet of six persons, to which perhaps history has furnished no parallel. There never arose, during the whole time, an instance of an unpleasant thought or word between the members. We sometimes met under differences of opinion, but scarcely ever failed, by conversing and reasoning, so to modify each other's ideas, as to produce an unanimous result. Yet, able and amicable as these members were, I am not certain this would have been the case, had each possessed equal and independent powers. Ill-defined limits of their respective departments, jealousies, trifling at first, but nourished and strengthened by repetition of occasions, intrigues without doors of designing persons to build an importance to themselves on the divisions of others, might, from small beginnings, have produced persevering oppositions. But the power of decision in the President left no object for internal dissension, and external intrigue was stifled in embryo by the knowledge which incendiaries possessed, that no division they could foment would change the course of the executive power. I am not conscious that my participations in executive authority have produced any bias in favor of the single Executive; because the parts I have acted have been in the subordinate, as well as superior stations, and because, if I know myself, what I have felt, and what I have wished, I know that I have never been so well pleased, as when I could shift power from my own, on the shoulders of others; nor have I ever been able to conceive how any rational being could propose happiness to himself from the exercise of power over others. I am still, however, sensible of the solidity of your principle, that, to insure the safety of the public liberty, its depository should be subject to be changed with the greatest ease possible, and without suspending or disturbing for a moment the movements of the machine of government. You apprehend that a single Executive, with eminence of talent, and destitution of principle, equal to the object, might, by usurpation, render his powers hereditary. Yet I think history furnishes as many examples of a single usurper arising out of a government by a plurality, as of temporary trusts of power in a single hand rendered permanent by usurpation. I do not believe, therefore, that this danger is lessened in the hands of a plural Executive. Perhaps it is greatly increased, by the state of inefficiency to which they are liable from feuds and divisions among themselves. The conservative body you propose might be so constituted, as, while it would be an admirable sedative in a variety of smaller cases, might also be a valuable sentinel and check on the liberticide views of an ambitious individual. I am friendly to this idea. But the true barriers of our liberty in this country are our State governments; and the wisest conservative power ever contrived by man, is that of which our Revolution and present government found us possessed. Seventeen distinct States, amalgamated into one as to their foreign concerns, but single and independent as to their internal administration, regularly organized with a legislature and governor resting on the choice of the people, and enlightened by a free press, can never be so fascinated by the arts of one man, as to submit voluntarily to his usurpation. Nor can they be constrained to it by any force he can possess. While that may paralyze the single State in which it happens to be encamped, sixteen others, spread over a country of two thousand miles diameter, rise up on every side, ready organized for deliberation by a constitutional legislature, and for action by their governor, constitutionally the commander of the militia of the State, that is to say, of every man in it able to bear arms; and that militia, too, regularly formed into regiments and battalions, into infantry, cavalry and artillery, trained under officers general and subordinate, legally appointed, always in readiness, and to whom they are already in habits of obedience. The republican government of France was lost without a struggle because the party of "un et indivisible" had prevailed; no provisional organization existed to which the people might rally under authority of the laws, the seats of the Directory were virtually vacant, and a small force sufficed to turn the legislature out of their chamber, and to salute its leader chief of the nation. But with us, sixteen out of seventeen States rising in mass, under regular organization, and legal commanders, united in object and action by their Congress, or, if that be in duress, by a Special Convention, present such obstacles to an usurper as forever to stifle ambition in the first conception of that object. Dangers of another kind might more reasonably be apprehended from this perfect and distinct organization, civil and military, of the States; to wit, that certain States from local and occasional discontents, might attempt to secede from the Union. This is certainly possible; and would be befriended by this regular organization. But it is not probable that local discontents can spread to such an extent, as to be able to face the sound parts of so extensive an Union; and if ever they should reach the majority, they would then become the regular government, acquire the ascendancy in Congress, and be able to redress their own grievances by laws peaceably and constitutionally passed. And even the States in which local discontents might engender a commencement of fermentation, would be paralyzed and self-checked by that very division into parties into which we have fallen, into which all States must fall wherein men are at liberty to think, speak, and act freely, according to the diversities of their individual conformations, and which are, perhaps, essential to preserve the purity of the gov-

As independent, in fact, as different nations, a spirit of forbearance and compromise, therefore, and not of encroachment and usurpation, is the healing balm of such a Constitution; and each party should prudently shrink from all approach to the line of demarcation, instead of rashly overleaping it, or throwing grapples ahead to haul to hereafter. But, finally, the peculiar happiness of our blessed system is, that in differences of opinion between these different sets of servants, the appeal is to neither, but to their employers peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention. This is more rational than the jus fortioris, or the cannon's mouth, the ultima et sola ratio regum.—To SPENCER ROANE, vii, 213. FORD ED., x, 190. (M., 1821.)

2938. — — Maintain the line of power marked by the Constitution between the two coordinate governments, each sovereign and independent in its department; the States as to everything relating to themselves and their State; the General Government as to everything relating to things or persons out of a particular State. The one may be strictly called the domestic branch of government, which is sectional but sovereign; the other, the foreign branch of government, coordinate with the other domestic, and equally sovereign on its own side of the line.—To SAMUEL H. SMITH. FORD ED., x, 263. (M., 1823.)

2939. — — The best general key for the solution of questions of power between our governments, is the fact that "every foreign and federal power is given to the Federal Government, and to the States every power purely domestic." I recollect but one instance of control vested in the Federal, over the State authorities, in a matter purely domestic, which is that of metallic tenders. The Federal is, in truth, our foreign government, which department alone is taken from the sovereignty of the separate States.—To ROBERT J. GARNETT, vii, 336. FORD ED., x, 295. (M., 1824.)

2940. — — The radical idea of the character of the Constitution of our government, which I have adopted as a key in cases of doubtful construction, is, that the whole field of government is divided into two departments, domestic and foreign (the States in their mutual relations being of the latter); that the former department is reserved exclusively to the respective States within their own limits, and the latter assigned to a separate set of functionaries, constituting what may be called the foreign branch, which, instead of a federal basis, is established as a distinct government quoad hoc, acting as the domestic branch does on the citizens directly and coercively; that these departments have distinct directories, coordinate and equally independent and supreme, each in its own sphere of action. Whenever a doubt arises to which of these branches a power belongs, I try it by this test. I recollect no case where a question simply between citizens of the same State, has been transferred to the foreign department, except that of inhibiting tenders but of metallic money, and ex post facto legislation.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON, vii, 342. FORD ED., x, 300. (M., 1824.)

2941. — — With respect to our State and Federal governments, I do not think their relations correctly understood by foreigners.* They generally suppose the former subordinate to the latter. But this is not the case. They are coordinate departments of one simple and integral whole. To the State governments are reserved all legislation and administration, in affairs which concern their own citizens only, and to the Federal Government is given whatever concerns foreigners, or the citizens of other States; these functions alone being made Federal. The one is the domestic, the other the foreign branch of the same government; neither having control over the other, but within its own department. There are one or two exceptions only to this partition of power.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT, vii, 358. (M., 1824.)

2942. FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, Success of.—Our experience so far, has satisfactorily manifested the competence of a republican government to maintain and promote the best interests of its citizens; and every future year, I doubt not, will contribute to settle a question on which reason, and a knowledge of the character and circumstances of our fellow citizens, could never admit a doubt, and much less condemn them as fit subjects to be consigned to the dominion of wealth and force.—R. To A. CONNECTICUT REPUBLICANS, viii, 140. (1808.)

2943. FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, Watchfulness over.—Our political machine is now pretty well wound up, but are the spirits of our people sufficiently wound down to let it work glibly. I trust it is too soon for that, and that we have many centuries to come yet before my countrymen cease to bear their government hard in hand.—To W. S. SMITH, ii, 448. (P., 1788.)

2944. — — We, I hope, shall adhere to our republican government, and keep it to its original principles by narrowly watching it.—To — —, iii, 527. (Pa., 1793.)

2945. FEDERALISM, Consolidation.—Consolidation is the form in which federalism now arrays itself, and is the present principle of distinction between republicans and the pseudo-republicans but real federalists.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON, vii, 278. FORD ED., x, 248. (M., 1823.) See CENTRALIZATION.

2946. FEDERALISM, Dead.—Excepting in the north-eastern and your south-western corner of the Union, monarchism, which has been so falsely miscalled federalism, is dead and buried, and no day of resurrection will ever dawn upon it. It has retired to the two extreme and opposite angles of our land, whence it will have ultimately and shortly to take its final flight.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE, iv, 488. (W., 1803.)

* Cartwright was an Englishman.—EDITOR.

2947. — — Federalism is dead, without even the hope of a day of resurrection. The quondam leaders, indeed, retain their rancor and principles; but their followers are amalgamated with us in sentiment, if not in name.—To RICHARD M. JOHNSON. v, 257. (W., March 1808.)

2949. FEDERALISM, Monarchism and.—Federalism, stripped as it now nearly is, of its landed and laboring support, is monarchism and Anglicism, and whenever our own dissensions shall let these in upon us, the last ray of free government closes on the horizon of the world.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 602. (M., 1811.) See MONARCHY.

2950. FEDERALISM, Odious.—The name of federalism is become so odious that no party can rise under it.—To JOEL BARLOW. iv, 438. FORD ED., viii, 150. (W., May 1802.)

2951. FEDERALISM, Prostrated.—The Hartford Convention, the victory of Orleans, the peace of Ghent, prostrated the name of federalism. Its votaries abandoned it through shame and mortification and now call themselves republicans. But the name alone is changed, the principles are the same. * * * The line of division now, is the preservation of State rights as reserved in the Constitution, or by strained constructions of that instrument, to merge all into a consolidated government.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 281. (M., 1823.)

2952. FEDERALISM, Virginia and.—There is so little federalism in Virginia that it is not feared, nor attended to, nor a principle of voting. What little we have is in the string of Presbyterian counties in the valley between the Blue Ridge and North Mountain, where the clergy are as bitter as they are in Connecticut.—To GIDEON GRANGER. FORD ED., viii, 233. (W., May 1803.)

2953. FEDERALISTS, Anglomaniacs.—A party has risen among us, or rather has come among us, which is endeavoring to separate us from all friendly connection with France, to unite our destinies with those of Great Britain, and to assimilate our government to theirs. Our lenity in permitting the return of the old Tories, gave the first body to this party; they have increased by large importations of British merchants and factors, by American merchants dealing on British capital, and by stock dealers and banking companies, who, by the aid of a paper system, are enriching themselves to the ruin of the country. And swaying the government by their possession of the printing presses, which their wealth commands, and by other means, not always honorable to the character of our countrymen. Hitherto, their influence and their system have been irresistible, and they have raised up an Executive power which is too strong for the Legislature. But I flatter myself they have passed their zenith. The people, while these things were doing, were lulled into rest and security from a cause which no longer exists. No prepossessions now will shut their ears to truth. They begin to see to what part their leaders were steering during their slumbers, and there is yet time to haul in, if we can avoid a war with France.—To ARTHUR CAMPBELL. iv, 197. FORD ED., vii, 169. (M., Sep. 1797.)

— FEDERALISTS, Callender and.—See 1063.

2954. FEDERALISTS, Centralization and.—Consolidation becomes the fourth chapter of the next book of their history. But this opens with a vast accession of strength from their younger recruits, who, having nothing in them of the feelings or principles of '76, now look to a single and splendid government of an aristocracy, founded on banking institutions, and moneyed incorporations under the guise and cloak of their favored branches of manufactures, commerce and navigation, riding and ruling over the plundered ploughman and beggared yeomanry. This will be to them a next best blessing to the monarchy of their first aim, and perhaps the surest stepping stone to it.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. vii, 428. FORD ED., x, 356. (M., Dec. 1825.) See CENTRALIZATION.

2955. FEDERALISTS, Defeated.—Tell my old friend, Governor Gerry, that I give him glory for the rasping with which he rubbed down his herd of traitors. Let them have justice and protection against personal violence, but no favor. Powers and preeminences conferred on them are daggers put into the hands of assassins, to be plunged into our own bosoms in the moment the thrust can go home to the heart. Moderation can never reclaim them. They deem it timidity, and despise without fearing the tameness from which it flows. Backed by England, they never lose the hope that their day is to come, when the terrorism of their earlier power is to be merged in the more gratifying system of deportation and the guillotine.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 608. (P.F., Aug. 1811.)

2956. FEDERALISTS, Divisions among.—Among that section of our citizens called federalists, there are three shades of opinion. Distinguishing between the leaders and people who compose it, the leaders consider the English constitution as a model of perfection, some, with a correction of its vices, others, with all its corruptions and abuses. This last was Alexander Hamilton's opinion, which others, as well as myself, have often heard him declare, and that a correction of what are called its vices, would render the English an impracticable government. This government they wished to have established here, and only accepted and held fast at first, to the present Constitution, as a stepping stone to the final establishment of their favorite model. This party has, therefore, always clung to England as their prototype, and great auxiliary in promoting and effecting this change. A weighty MINORITY, however, of these leaders, considering the voluntary conversion of our government into a monarchy as too distant, if not desperate, wish to break off from our Union its eastern fragment, as being, in truth, the hotbed of American monarchism, with a view to a commencement of their favorite government, from whence the other States, may gangrene by degrees, and the whole be thus brought finally to the desired point. For Massachusetts, the prime mover in this enterprise, is the last State in the Union to mean a final separation, as being of all the most dependent on the others. Not raising bread for the sustenance of her own inhabitants, not having a stick of timber for the construction of vessels, her principal occupation, nor an article to export in them, where would she be, excluded from the ports of the other States, and thrown into dependence on England, her direct, and natural, but now insidious rival? At the head of this MINORITY is what is called the Essex Junto of Massachusetts. But the MAJORITY of these leaders do not aim at separation. In this, they adhere to the known principle of General Hamilton, never, under any views, to break the Union. Anglomany, monarchy and separation, then, are the principles of the Essex federalists. Anglomany and monarchy, those of the Hamiltonians, and Anglomany alone, that of the portion among the people who call themselves federalists. These last are as good republicans as the brethren whom they oppose, and differ from them only in their devotion to England and hatred of France, which they have imbibed from their leaders. The moment that these leaders should avowedly propose a separation of the Union, or the establishment of regal government, their popular adherents would quit them to a man, and join the republican standard; and the partisans of this change, even in Massachusetts, would thus find themselves an army of officers without a soldier. The party called republican is steadily for the support of the present Constitution. They obtained at its commencement, all the amendments to it they desired. These reconciled them to it perfectly, and if they have any ulterior view, it is only, perhaps, to popularize it further, by shortening the senatorial term, and devising a process for the responsibility of judges, more practicable than that of impeachment. They esteem the people of England and France equally, and equally detest the governing powers of both. This I verily believe, after an intimacy of forty years with the public councils and characters, is a true statement of the grounds on which they are at present divided. and that it is not merely an ambition for power.—To JOHN MELLISH. vi, 95. FORD ED., ix, 374. (M., Jan. 1813.)

— FEDERALISTS, Embargo and.—See EMBARGO.

2957. FEDERALISTS, Extinguishment of.—The Hartford Convention and the battle of New Orleans extinguished the name of federalists.—To HENRY DEARBORN. FORD ED., x, 237. (M., Oct. 1822.)

2959. FEDERALISTS, Impotent.—The federalists have not been able to carry a single strong measure in the lower House the whole session [of Congress]. When they met, it was believed they had a majority of twenty; but many of these were new and moderate men, and soon saw the true character of the party to which they had been well disposed while at a distance. The tide, too, of public opinion sets so strongly against the federal proceedings, that this melted off their majority, and discouraged the heroes of the party.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 329. FORD ED., vii, 446. (Pa., May 1800.)

2960. FEDERALISTS, Jay's Treaty and.—Though the Anglomans have in the end got their treaty through, and so far triumphed over the cause of republicanism, yet it has been to them a dear-bought victory. It has given the most radical shock to their party it has ever received; and there is no doubt, they would be glad to be replaced on the ground they possessed the instant before Jay's nomination extraordinary. They see that nothing can support them but the colossus of the President's merits with the people, and the moment he retires, that his successor, if a monocrat, will be overborne by the republican sense of his constituents; if a republican, he will, of course, give fair play to that sense, and lead things into the channel of harmony between the governors and governed. In the meantime, patience.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 148. FORD ED., vii, 89. (M., July 1796.) See JAY TREATY.

2961. FEDERALISTS, Judiciary and.—They have retired into the judiciary as a stronghold. There the remains of federalism are to be preserved and fed from the treasury, and from that battery all the works of republicanism are to be beaten down and erased. By a fraudulent use of the Constitution, which has made judges irremovable, they have multiplied useless judges merely to strengthen their phalanx.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 424. (W., 1801.) See JUDICIARY.

2962. FEDERALISTS, Justice to.—I never did them an act of injustice, nor failed in any duty to them imposed by my office.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., ix, 51. (W., May 1807.)

2963. FEDERALISTS, Leaders of.—The quondam leaders of the people infuriated with the sense of their impotence, will soon be seen or heard only in the newspapers, which serve as chimneys to carry off noxious vapors and smoke.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSCO. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

2965. — —. Though the people in mass have joined us, their leaders had committed themselves too far to retract. Pride keeps them hostile; they brood over their angry passions, and give them vent in the newspapers which they maintain. They still make as much noise as if they were the whole nation. Unfortunately, these being the mercantile papers, published chiefly in the seaports, are the only ones which find their way to Europe, and make very false impressions there.—To C. F. VOLNEY. iv, 573. (W., 1805.)

2966. — —. I hope that my retirement will abate some of their [federalists'] disaffection to the government of their country.—To RICHARD M. JOHNSON. v, 257. (W., 1808.)

2967. — —. Contented with our government, elective as it is in three of its principal branches, I wish not, on Hamilton's plan, to see two of them for life; and still less, hereditary, as others desire. I believe that the yeomanry of the federalists think on this subject with me. They are substantially republican. But some of their leaders, who get into the public councils, would prefer Hamilton's government, and still more the hereditary one. Hinc illæ lachrymæ. I wish them no harm, but that they may never get into power, not for their harm, but for the good of our country.—To W. D. G. WORTHINGTON. v, 504. (M., 1810.)

2968. FEDERALISTS, Madness of.—I am entirely confident that ultimately the great body of the people are passing over from the federalists. * * * The madness and extravagance of their career are what ensure it.—To E. LIVINGSTON. iv, 328. FORD ED., vii, 443. (Pa., April 1800.)

2969. — —. A little more prudence and moderation in those [federal leaders] who had mounted themselves on the fears [of the people], and it would have been long and difficult to unhorse them. Their madness had done in three years what reason alone, acting against them, would not have effected in many; and the more, as they might have gone on forming new entrenchments for themselves from year to year.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 424. (W., 1801.)

2970. FEDERALISTS, Objects of.—I have been ever opposed to the party so falsely called federalists, because I believe them desirous of introducing into our government authorities, hereditary or otherwise, independent of the national will.—To DAVID HOWELL. v, 554. (M., 1810.)

2971. — —. The original objects of the federalists were, 1st, to warp our government more to the form and principles of monarchy; and 2d, to weaken the barriers of the State governments as coordinate powers. In the first they have been so completely foiled by the universal spirit of the nation that they have abandoned the enterprise, shrunk from the odium of their old appellation, taken to themselves a participation of ours, and under the pseudo-republican mask, are now aiming at their second object, and strengthened by unsuspecting or apostate recruits from our ranks, are advancing fast towards an ascendancy.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 293. FORD ED., x, 228. (M., 1823.) See MONARCHY.

2972. FEDERALISTS, Opposition of.—Though we may obtain, and I believe shall obtain, a majority in the Legislature of the United States, attached to the preservation of the Federal Constitution according to its obvious principles, and those on which it was known to be received; attached equally to the preservation to the States of those rights unquestionably remaining with them; friends to the freedom of religion, freedom of the press, trial by jury, and to economical government; opposed to standing armies, paper systems, war, and all connection, other than commerce, with any foreign nation; in short, a majority firm in all those principles which we have espoused and the federalists have opposed uniformly; still, should the whole body of New England continue in opposition to these principles of government, either knowingly or through delusion, our government will be a very uneasy one. It can never be harmonious and solid, while so respectable a portion of its citizens support principles which go directly to a change of the Federal Constitution, to sink the State governments, consolidate them into one and monarchize that.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 330. FORD ED., vii, 450. (M., Aug. 1800.)

2973. FEDERALISTS, Proposed coalition.—In our last conversation you mentioned a federal scheme afloat, of forming a coalition between the federalists and republicans, of what they called the seven eastern States. The idea was new to me, and after time for reflection I had no opportunity of conversing with you again. The federalists know, that, eo nomine, they are gone forever. Their object, therefore, is, how to return into power under some other form. Undoubtedly they have but one means, which is to divide the republicans, join the minority, and barter with them for the cloak of their name. I say, join the minority; because the majority of the republicans not needing them, will not buy them. The minority, having no other means of ruling the majority, will give a price for auxiliaries, and that price must be principle. It is true that the federalists, needing their numbers also, must also give a price, and principle is the coin they must pay in. Thus a bastard system of federo-republicanism will rise on the ruins of the true principles of our revolution. And when this party is formed, who will constitute the majority of it, which majority is then to dictate? Certainly the federalists. Thus their proposition of putting themselves into gear with the republican minority, is exactly like Roger Sherman's proposition to add Connecticut to Rhode Island. The idea of forming seven eastern States is moreover clearly to form the basis of a separation of the Union. Is it possible that real republicans can be gulled by such a bait? And for what? What do they wish that they have not? Federal measures? That is impossible. Republican measures? Have they them not? Can any one deny, that in all important questions of principle, republicanism prevails? But do they want that their individual will shall govern the majority? They may purchase the gratification of this unjust wish, for a little time, at a great price; but the federalists must not have the passions of other men, if, after getting thus into the seat of power, they suffer themselves to be governed by their minority. This minority may say, that whenever they relapse into their own principles, they will quit them, and draw the seat from under them. They may quit them, indeed, but, in the meantime, all the venal will have become associated with them, and will give them a majority sufficient to keep them in place, and to enable them to eject the heterogeneous friends by whose aid they get again into power. I cannot believe any portion of real republicans will enter into this trap; and if they do, I do not believe they can carry with them the mass of their States, advancing so steadily as we see them, to an union of principle with their brethren. It will be found in this, as in all other similar cases, that crooked schemes will end by overwhelming their authors and coadjutors in disgrace, and that he alone who walks strict and upright, and who, in matters of opinion, will be contented that others should be as free as himself, and acquiesce when his opinion is freely overruled, will attain his object in the end.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 542. FORD ED., viii, 298. (M., April 1804.)

2974. FEDERALISTS, Pusillanimous.

—The federalists * * * wish to rub through this fragment of a year as they have through the four preceding ones, opposing patience to insult, and interest to honor. * * * This is, indeed, a most humiliating state of things, but it commenced in 1793. Causes have been adding to causes, and effects accumulating on effects, from that time to this. We had, in 1793, the most respectable character in the universe. What the neutral nations think of us now, I know not; but we are low indeed with the belligerents. Their kicks and cuffs prove their contempt.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 191. FORD ED., vii, 154. (Pa., June 1797.)

2975. FEDERALISTS, Republicans and.—My hope is that the distinction between republican and federalist will be soon lost, or at most that it will be only of republican and monarchist; that the body of the nation, even that part which French excesses forced over to the federal side, will rejoin the republicans, leaving only those who were pure monarchists, and who will be too few to form a sect.—To DR. B. S. BARTON. iv, 353. FORD ED., vii, 489. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2976. — — — I entertain real hope that the whole body of our citizens (many of whom had been carried away by the X. Y. Z. business), will shortly be consolidated * * *. When they examine the real principles of both parties, I think they will find little to differ about. I know, indeed, that there are some of their leaders who have so committed themselves, that pride, if no other passion, will prevent their coalescing. We must be easy with them.—To MOSES ROBINSON. iv, 379. (March 1801.)

2977. — — — The manœuvres of the year X. Y. Z. carried over from us a great body of the people, real republicans, and honest men under virtuous motives. The delusion lasted a while. At length the poor arts of tub plots, &c., were repeated till the designs of the party became suspected. From that moment those who had left us began to come back. It was by their return to us that we gained the victory in November, 1800, which we should not have gained in November, 1799. But during the suspension of the public mind, from the 11th to the 17th of February [last], and the anxiety and alarm lest there should be no election, and anarchy ensue, a wonderful effect was produced on the mass of federalists who had not before come over. Those who had before become sensible of their error in the former change, and only wanted a decent excuse for coming back, seized that occasion for doing so. Another body, and a large one it is, who from timidity of constitution had gone with those who wished for a strong executive, were induced by the same timidity to come over to us rather than risk anarchy: so that, according to the evidence we receive from every direction, we may say that the whole of that portion of the people which were called federalists, were made to desire anxiously the very event they had just before opposed with all their energies, and to receive the election which was made, as an object of their earnest wishes, a child of their own. These people (I always exclude their leaders) are now aggregated with us. They look with a certain degree of affection and confidence to the administration, ready to become attached to it, if it avoids in the outset acts which might revolt and throw them off. To give time for a perfect consolidation seems prudent.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 367. FORD ED., viii, 9. (W., March 1801.)

2978. ——. The revolutionary movements in Europe had, by industry and artifice, been wrought into objects of terror even to this country, and had really involved a great portion of our well-meaning citizens in a panic which was perfectly unaccountable, and during the prevalence of which they were led to support measures the most insane. They are now pretty thoroughly recovered from it, and sensible of the mischief which was done, and preparing to be done, had their minds continued a little longer under that derangement. The recovery bids fair to be complete, and to obliterate entirely the line of party division which had been so strongly drawn. Not that their late leaders have come over, or even can come over. But they stand, at present, almost without followers. The principal of them have retreated into the judiciary as a stronghold, the tenure of which renders it difficult to dislodge them. To JOEL BARLOW. iv, 369. (W., March 1801.)

2979. ——. I was always satisfied that the great body of those called federalists were real republicans as well as federalists.—To GENERAL HENRY KNOX. iv, 386. FORD ED., viii, 36. (W., March 1801.)

2981. ——. My idea is that the mass of our countrymen, even of those who call them federalists, are republicans. They differ from us but in a shade of more or less of power to be given to the Executive or Legislative organ. They were decoyed into the net of monarchists by the X. Y. Z. contrivance, but they are come or are coming back. So much moderation in our proceedings as not to revolt them, while doubting or newly joined with us, and they will coalesce and grow to us as one flesh. But any violence against their quondam leaders before they are thoroughly weaned from them, would carry them back again.—To THOMAS MCKEAN. FORD ED., viii, 78. (W., July 1801.)

2982. ——. I consider the pure federalist as a republican who would prefer a somewhat stronger Executive; and the republican as one more willing to trust the legislature as a broader representation of the people, and a safer deposit of power for many reasons. But both sects are republican, entitled to the confidence of their fellow citizens. Not so their quondam leaders, covering under the mask of federalism hearts devoted to monarchy. The Hamiltonians, the Essexmen, the Revolutionaries, &c. They have a right to tolerance, but neither to confidence nor power.—To JOHN DICKINSON. FORD ED., viii, 76. (W., July 1801.)

2983. FEDERALISTS, Republican schisms and.—I consider the federalists as completely vanquished, and never more to take the field under their own banners. They will now reserve themselves to profit by the schisms among republicans, and to earn favors from minorities, whom they will enable to triumph over their more numerous antagonists. So long as republican minorities barely accept their votes, no great harm will be done; because it will only place in power one shade of republicanism, instead of another. But when they purchase the votes of the federalists, by giving them a participation of office, trust and power, it is a proof that anti-monarchism is not their strongest passion.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 101. FORD ED., ix, 77. (W., June 1807.)

2984. FEDERALISTS, Self-government and.—The leaders of federalism say that man cannot be trusted with his own government. We must do no act which shall replace them in the direction of the experiment.—To GOVERNOR HALL. FORD ED., viii, 157. (W., 1802.)

2985. FEDERALISTS, States' rights and.—The federalists, baffled in their schemes to monarchize us, have given up their name, which the Hartford Convention had made odious, and have taken shelter among us and under our name. But they have only changed the point of attack. On every question of the usurpation of State powers by the Foreign or General Government, the same men rally together, force the line of demarcation and consolidate the government. The judges are at their head as heretofore, and are their entering wedge. The true old republicans stand to the line, and will I hope die on it if necessary.—To SAMUEL H. SMITH. FORD ED., x, 263. (M., Aug. 1823.)

2986. FEDERALISTS, Terrorism and treason.—When General Washington was withdrawn, these energumeni of royalism. [the federal leaders], kept in check hitherto by the dread of his honesty, his firmness, his patriotism, and the authority of his name, now mounted on the car of State and free from control, like Phæton on that of the sun, drove headlong and wild, looking neither to right nor left, nor regarding anything but the objects they were driving at; until, displaying these fully, the eyes of the nation were opened, and a general disbandment of them from the public councils took place. * * * But no man who did not witness it can form an idea of their unbridled madness, and the terrorism with which they surrounded themselves. The horrors of the French Revolution, then raging, aided them mainly, and using that as a rawhead and bloody-bones, they were enabled by their stratagems of X. Y. Z. in which this historian [Judge Marshall] was a leading mountebank, their tales of tub-plots, ocean massacres, bloody buoys, and pulpit lyings, and slanderings, and maniacal ravings of their Gardiners, their Osmonds and Parishes, to spread alarm into all but the firmest breasts. Their Attorney-General had the impudence to say to a republican member, that deportation must be resorted to, of which, said he, "you republicans have set the example," thus daring to identify us with the murderous Jacobins of France. These transactions, now [1818] recollected, but as dreams of the night, were then sad realities; and nothing rescued us from their liberticide effect, but the unyielding opposition of those firm spirits who sternly maintained their post, in defiance of terror, until their fellow citizens could be aroused to their own danger, and rally, and rescue the standard of the Constitution. This has been happily done. Federalism and monarchism have languished from that moment until their reasonable combinations with the enemies of their country during the late war, their plots of dismembering the Union, and their Hartford Convention, have consigned them to the tomb of the dead; and I fondly hope we may now truly say, "we are all republicans, all federalists," and that the motto of the standard to which our country will forever rally, will be "Federal Union and Republican Government"; and sure I am we may say that, we are indebted for the preservation of this point of ralliance, to that opposition of which so injurious an idea is so artfully insinuated and excited in this history [MARSHALL'S LIFE OF WASHINGTON].—THE ANAS. ix, 97. FORD ED., i, 166. (1818.)

2987. FEDERALISTS, Unprogressive.—What a satisfaction have we in the contemplation of the benevolent effects of our efforts, compared with those of the leaders on the other side, who have discountenanced all advances in science as dangerous innovations, have endeavored to render philosophy and republicanism terms of reproach, to persuade us that man cannot be governed but by the rod. I shall have the happiness of living and dying in the contrary hope.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 366. FORD ED., viii, 8. (W., March 1801.)

2988. FEDERALISTS, Violations of Constitution.—Their usurpations and violations of the Constitution at that period [the administration of John Adams] and their majority in both Houses of Congress, were so great, so decided, and so daring, that after combating their aggressions, inch by inch, without being able in the least to check their career, the republican leaders thought it would be best for them to give up their useless efforts there, go home, get into their respective Legislatures, embody whatever of resistance they could be formed into, and if ineffectual, to perish there as in the last ditch. All, therefore, retired, leaving Mr. Gallatin alone in the House of Representatives, and myself in the Senate, where I then presided as Vice-President. Remaining at our posts, and bidding defiance to the brow-beatings and insults by which they endeavored to drive us off also, we kept the mass of republicans in phalanx together, until the Legislature could be brought up to the charge; and nothing on earth is more certain, than that if myself particularly, placed by my office of Vice-President at the head of the republicans, had given way and withdrawn from my post, the republicans throughout the Union would have given up in despair, and the cause would have been lost forever. By holding on, we obtained time for the Legislatures to come up with their weight; and those of Virginia and Kentucky particularly, but more especially the former, by their celebrated resolutions, saved the Constitution at its last gasp. No person who was not a witness of the scenes of that gloomy period, can form any idea of the afflicting persecutions and personal indignities we had to brook. They saved our country however. The spirits of the people were so much subdued and reduced to despair by the X. Y. Z. imposture, and other stratagems and machinations, that they would have sunk into apathy and monarchy, as the only form of government which could maintain itself.*—MISCELLANEOUS PAPERS. ix, 507. FORD ED., x, 368. (1826.)

2989. FEDERALISTS, Worthy and unworthy.—With respect to the federalists, I believe we think alike; for when speaking of them, we never mean to include a worthy portion of our fellow citizens, who consider themselves as in duty bound to support the constituted authorities of every branch, and to reserve their opposition to the period of election. Those having acquired the appellation of federalists, while a federal administration was in place, have not cared about throwing off their name, but adhering to their principle, are the supporters of the present order of things. The other branch of the federalists, those who are so in principle as well as in name, disapprove of the republican principles and features of our Constitution, and would, I believe, welcome any public calamity (war with England excepted) which might lessen the confidence of our country in those principles and forms. I have generally considered them rather as subjects for a madhouse. But they are now playing a game of the most mischievous tendency, without perhaps being themselves aware of it. They are endeavoring to convince England that we suffer more by the Embargo than they do, and that if they will but hold out awhile, we must abandon it. It is true, the time will come when we must abandon it. But if this is before the repeal of the orders of council, we must abandon it only for a state of war. The day is not distant, when that will be preferable to a longer continuance of the Embargo. But we can never remove that, and let our vessels go out and be taken under these orders, without making reprisal. Yet this is the very state of things which these federal monarchists are endeavoring to bring about; and in this it is but too possible they may succeed. But the fact is, that if we have war with England it will be solely produced by their inaneuvres.—To DR. THOMAS LEIB, v, 304. FORD ED., ix, 196. (W., June 1808.) See PARTIES, REPUBLICANISM and REPUBLICANS.

2990. FENNER (James), Character of.—No one was more sensible than myself, while Governor Fenner was in the senate, of the soundness of his political principles, and rectitude of his conduct. Among those of my fellow laborers of whom I had a distinguished opinion, he was one.—To DAVID HOWELL, v, 554. (M., 1810.)

2991. FENNO (John), Gazette of.—[Fenno's Gazette] is a paper of pure torism, disseminating the doctrines of monarchy, aristocracy, and the exclusion of the influence of the people.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 334. (Pa., 1791.)

2992. ———. The tory paper of Fenno rarely admits anything which defends the present form of government in opposition to his desire of subverting it to make way for a king, lords and commons.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 361. (1791.)

— FEVER.—See YELLOW FEVER.

2993. FICTION, Education and.—A great obstacle to good education is the inordinate passion prevalent for novels, and the time lost in that reading which should be instructively employed. When this poison infects the mind, it destroys its tone and revolts it against wholesome reading. Reason and fact, plain and unadorned, are rejected. Nothing can engage attention unless dressed in all the figments of fancy, and nothing so bedecked comes amiss. The result is a bloated imagination, sickly judgment, and disgust towards all the real businesses of life.*—To N. BURWELL, vii, 102. FORD ED., x, 104. (M., 1818.)

an exercise of our virtuous dispositions, and dispositions of the mind, like limbs of the body, acquire strength by practice. But exercise produces habit, and in the instance of which we speak, the exercise being of the moral feelings, produces a habit of thinking and acting virtuously. We never reflect whether the story we read be truth or fiction. If the painting be lively, and a tolerable picture of nature, we are thrown into a reverie, from which if we awaken it is the fault of the writer. I appeal to every reader of feeling and sentiment whether the fictitious murder of Duncan by Macbeth, in Shakespeare, does not excite in him as great a horror of villainy, as the real one of Henry IV. by Ravaillac, as related by Davila? And whether the fidelity of Nelson and generosity of Blandford, in Marmontel, do not dilate his breast and elevate his sentiments as much as any similar incident which real history can furnish? Does he not in fact feel himself a better man while reading them, and privately covenant to copy the fair example? We neither know nor care whether Laurence Sterne really went to France, whether he was there accosted by the Franciscan, at first rebuked him unkindly, and then gave him a peace offering; or whether the whole be not fiction. In either case, we equally are sorrowful at the rebuke, and secretly resolve we will never do so: we are pleased with the subsequent atonement, and view with emulation a soul candidly acknowledging its fault and making a just reparation. Considering history as a moral exercise, her lessons would be too infrequent if confined to real life. Of those recorded by historians few incidents have been attended with such circumstances as to excite in any high degree this sympathetic emotion of virtue. We are, therefore, wisely framed to be as warmly interested for a fictitious as for a real personage. The field of imagination is thus laid open to our use and lessons may be formed to illustrate and carry home to the heart every moral rule of life. Thus a lively and lasting sense of filial duty is more effectually impressed on the mind of a son or daughter by reading King Lear, than by all the dry volumes of ethics and divinity that ever were written. This is my idea of well written Romance, of Tragedy, Comedy and Epic poetry.—To ROBERT SKIPWITH. FORD ED., i, 396. (M., 1771.)

2995. FILIBUSTERISM, Prevention.—If you will * * * give me such information as to persons and places as may indicate to what points the vigilance of the officers is to be directed, proper measures will be immediately taken for preventing every attempt to make any hostile expedition from these States against any of the dominions of France. The stronger the proofs you can produce, and the more pointed as to persons, the stronger will be the means of coercion which the laws will allow to be used.—To E. C. GENET. FORD ED., vi, 426. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

strain our citizens from embarking individually in a war* in which their country takes no part; to punish severely those persons, citizen or alien, who shall usurp the cover of our flag for vessels not entitled to it, infecting thereby with suspicion those of real Americans, and committing us into controversies for the redress of wrongs not our own.—THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 28. FORD ED., viii, 272. (1803.)

2997. ——. I am sorry to learn that a banditti from our country are taking part in the domestic contests of the country adjoining you; and the more so as from the known laxity of execution in our laws, they cannot be punished. It will give a wrongful hue to a rightful act of taking possession of Mobile, and will be imputed to the national authority, as Miranda's enterprise was, because not punished by it.—To DR. SAMUEL BROWN. vi, 165. (M., 1813.)

2998. FILIBUSTERISM, Restraining.—That individuals should undertake to wage private war, independently of the authority of their country, cannot be permitted in a well ordered society. Its tendency to produce aggression on the laws and rights of other nations, and to endanger the peace of our own is so obvious, that I doubt not you will adopt measures for restraining it effectually in future.—FOURTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 34. FORD ED., viii, 326. (1804.)

2999. FILIBUSTERISM, Suppression.—Having received information that a great number of private individuals were combining together, arming and organizing themselves contrary to law, to carry on military expeditions against the territories of Spain. I thought it necessary, by proclamations, as well as by special orders, to take measures for preventing and suppressing this enterprise, for seizing the vessels, arms, and other means provided for it, and for arresting and bringing to justice its authors and abettors. It was due to that good faith which ought ever to be the rule of action in public as well as in private transactions; it was due to good order and regular government, that while the public force was strictly on the defensive and merely to protect our citizens from aggression, the criminal attempts of private individuals to decide for their country the question of peace or war, by commencing active and unauthorized hostilities, should be promptly and efficaciously suppressed.—SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 63. FORD ED., viii, 489. (Dec. 1806.)

3000. ——. The late piratical depredations which your commerce has suffered as well as ours, and that of other nations. seem to have been committed by renegade rovers of several nations, French, English, American, which they as well as we have not been careful enough to suppress. I hope our Congress * * * will strengthen the measures of suppression. Of their disposition to do it there can be no doubt; for all men of moral principle must be shocked at these atrocities. I had repeated conversations on this subject with the President * * *. No man can abhor these enormities more deeply. I trust it will not have been in the power of abandoned rovers, nor yet of negligent functionaries, to disturb the harmony of two nations so much disposed to mutual friendship, and interested in it.—To J. CORREA. vii, 184. FORD ED., x, 164. (M., 1820.)

3001. FINANCES, Disordered.—I do not at all wonder at the condition in which the finances of the United States are found. Hamilton's object from the beginning, was to throw them into forms which should be utterly undecipherable. I ever said he did not understand their condition himself, nor was able to give a clear view of the excess of our debts beyond our credits, nor whether we were diminishing or increasing the debt. My own opinion was, that from the commencement of this government to the time I ceased to attend to the subject, we had been increasing our debt about a million of dollars annually. If Mr. Gallatin would undertake to reduce this chaos to order, present us with a clear view of our finances, and put them into a form as simple as they will admit, he will merit immortal honor. The accounts of the United States ought to be, and may be made as simple as those of a common farmer, and capable of being understood by common farmers.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 131. FORD ED., vii, 61. (M., March 1796.)

3002. ——. The finances are said to have been left by the late financier in the utmost derangement, and his tools are urging the funding the new debts they have contracted. Thus posterity is to be left to pay the ordinary expenses of our government in time of peace.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 60. (M., March 1796.)

3003. ——. I had always conjectured, from such facts as I could get hold of, that our public debt was increasing about a million of dollars a year. You will see by Gallatin's speeches that the thing is proved.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 140. FORD ED., vii, 80. (M., June 1796.)

3004. FINANCES, Misapplied.—The finances are now under such a course of application as nothing could derange but war or federalism. The gripe of the latter has shown itself as deadly as have the jaws of the former. Our adversaries say we are indebted to their providence for the means of paying the public debt. We never charged them with the want of foresight in providing money, but with the misapplication of it after they had levied it. We say they raised not only enough, but too much; and that, after giving back the surplus, we do more with a part than they did with the whole.—To THOMAS COOPER. iv, 453. FORD ED., viii, 178. (W., 1802.)

3005. FINANCES, Simplification of.—I think it an object of great importance. * * * to simplify our system of finance, and bring it within the comprehension of every member of Congress.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 428. FORD ED., viii, 139. (W., April 1802.) See 39.

3006. FINANCES, Sound system of.—

The other great and indispensable object [in prosecuting the war] is to enter on such a system of finance, as can be permanently pursued to any length of time whatever. Let us be allured by no projects of banks, public or private, or ephemeral expedients, which, enabling us to gasp and flounder a little longer, only increase, by protracting the agonies of death.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 395. FORD ED., ix, 492. (M., Oct. 1814.)

3007. ——. The British ministers found some hopes [of success in the war] on the state of our finances. It is true that the excess of our banking institutions, and their present discredit, have shut us out from the best source of credit we could ever command with certainty. But the foundations of credit still remain to us, and need but skill which experience will soon produce, to marshal them into an order which may carry us through any length of war.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vi, 425. FORD ED., ix, 508. (M., 1815.) See BANKS and DEBT.

3008. FISHERIES, British acts against.

—To show they [Parliament] mean no discontinuance of injury, they pass acts, at the very time of holding out this proposition, for restraining * * * the fisheries of the province of New England.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 480. (July 1775.)

3009. FISHERIES, British rivalry in.

—England fears no rivals in the whale fishery but America; or rather, it is the whale fishery of America, of which she is endeavoring to possess herself. It is for this object she is making the present extraordinary efforts, by bounties and other encouragements; and her success, so far, is very flattering. Before the war, she had not one hundred vessels in the whale trade, while America employed three hundred and nine. In 1786, Great Britain employed one hundred and fifty-one vessels; in 1787, two hundred and eighty-six; in 1788, three hundred and fourteen, nearly the ancient American number; while the latter has fallen to about eighty. They have just changed places then; England having gained exactly what America has lost. France, by her ports and markets, holds the balance between the two contending parties, and gives the victory, by opening and shutting them, to which she pleases.—To COMTE MONTMORIN. ii 523. (P., 1788.)

3010. FISHERIES, Competition in.—

There is no other nation in present condition to maintain a competition with Great Britain in the whale fishery. The expense at which it is supported on her part seems enormous. Two hundred and fifty-five vessels, of seventy-five thousand four hundred and thirty-six tons, employed by her this year in the northern fishery, at forty-two men each; and fifty-nine in the southern at eighteen men each, make eleven thousand seven hundred and seventy-two men. These are known to have cost the government fifteen pounds each, or one hundred and seventy-six thousand five hundred and eighty pounds, in the whole; and that, to employ the principal part of them, from three to four months only. The northern ships have brought home twenty, and the southern sixty tons of oil, on an average; making eighty-six hundred and forty tons. Every ton of oil, then, has cost the government twenty pounds in bounty. Still, if they can beat us out of the field and have it to themselves, they will think their money well employed.—To COMTE DE MONTMORIN. ii, 524. (P., 1788.)

the disadvantages opposed to us [in the Fisheries] those which depend on ourselves, are: Tonnage and naval duties on the vessels employed in the fishery; impost duties on salt; on tea, rum, sugar, molasses, hooks, lines and leads, duck, cordage and cables, iron, hemp and twine, used in the fishery; coarse woollens, worn by the fishermen, and the poll tax levied by the State on their persons. * * * The amount of these, exclusive of the State tax and drawback on the fish exported * * * [is] $5.25 per man, or $57.75 per vessel of sixty-five tons. When a business is so nearly in equilibrio that one can hardly discern whether the profit be sufficient to continue it or not, smaller sums than these suffice to turn the scale against it. To these disadvantages, add ineffectual duties on the importation of foreign fish. In justification of these last, it is urged that the foreign fish received, is in exchange for the produce of agriculture. To which it may be answered, that the thing given, is more merchantable than that received in exchange, and agriculture has too many markets to be allowed to take away those of the fisheries.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 543. (1791.)

3012. FISHERIES, Encouragement of.

—The encouragement of our fishery abridges that of a rival nation, whose power on the ocean has long threatened the loss of all balance on that element.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 541. (1791.)

3013. FISHERIES, Fostering.—To foster

our fisheries and nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ED., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

3014. FISHERIES, Massachusetts and.

—I fear there is foundation for the design intimated in the public papers, of demanding a cession of our rights in the fisheries. What will Massachusetts say to this? I mean her majority, which must be considered as speaking through the organs it has appointed itself, as the index of its will. She chose to sacrifice the liberties of our sea-faring citizens, in which we were all interested, and with them her obligations to the co-States, rather than war with England. Will she now sacrifice the fisheries to the same partialities? This question is interesting to her alone; for to the middle, the southern and western States, they are of no direct concern; of no more than the culture of tobacco, rice and cotton, to Massachusetts. I am really at a loss to conjecture what our refractory sister will say on this occasion. I know what, as a citizen of the Union, I would say to her. "Take this question ad referendum. It concerns you alone. If you would rather give up the fisheries than war with England, we give them up. If you had rather fight for them, we will defend your interests to the last drop of our blood, choosing rather to set a good example than follow a bad one." And I hope she will determine to fight for them.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 353. FORD ED., ix, 462. (M., July 1814.)

3015. FISHERIES, Preservation of.—

As to the fisheries, England was urgent to retain them exclusively, France neutral, and I believe, that had they been ultimately made a sine quâ non, our commissioners (Mr. Adams excepted) would have relinquished them, rather than have broken off the treaty. [Of peace with Great Britain.] To Mr. Adams's perseverance alone, on that point, I have always understood we were indebted for their reservation.—To ROBERT WALSH. vii, 108. FORD ED., x, 117. (M., 1818.)

3016. FISHERIES, Prostrated.—The fisheries of the United States, annihilated during the war [of the Revolution], their vessels, utensils, and fishermen destroyed; their markets in the Mediterranean and British America lost, and their produce duties in those of France; their competitors enabled by bounties to meet and undersell them at the few markets remaining open, without any public aid, and, indeed paying aids to the public;—such were the hopeless auspices under which this important business was to be resumed.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 542. (1791.)

3017. FISHERIES, Protection of.—It will rest with the wisdom of the Legislature to decide, whether prohibition should not be opposed to prohibition, and high duty to high duty, on the fish of other nations; whether any, and which, of the naval and other duties may be remitted, or an equivalent given to the fisherman, in the form of a drawback, or bounty; and whether the loss of markets abroad, may not, in some degree, be compensated, by creating markets at home; to which might contribute the constituting fish a part of the military ration, in stations not too distant from navigation, a part of the necessary sea stores of vessels, and the encouraging private individuals to let the fishermen share with the cultivator, in furnishing the supplies of the table. A habit introduced from motives of patriotism, would soon be followed from motives of taste; and who will undertake to the limits to this demand, if it can be excited, with a nation which doubles, ill continue to double, at very short periods.—REPORT ON FISHERIES. vii, 544. (1791.)

3018. ——. The ex parte regulations which the English have begun for mounting their navigation on the ruins of ours, can only be opposed by counter regulations on our part. And the loss of seamen, the natural consequence of lost and obstructed markets for our fish and oil, calls in the first place, for serious and timely attention. It will be too late when the seaman shall have changed his vocation, or gone over to another interest. If we cannot recover and secure for him these important branches of employment, it behooves us to replace them by others equivalent.—REPORT ON FISHERIES. vii, 552. (1791.)

3019. FISHERIES, Relief of.—What relief does the condition of the whale fishery require? 1. A remission of duties on the articles used for their calling. 2. A retaliating duty on foreign oils, coming to seek a competition with them in or from our ports. 3. Free markets abroad. * * * The only nation whose oil is brought hither for competition with our own, makes ours pay a duty of about eighty-two dollars the ton, in their ports. Theirs is brought here, too, to be reshipped fraudulently, under our flag, and ought not to be covered by ours, if we mean to preserve our own admission into them.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 551. (1791.)

3020. ——. The historical view we have taken of these fisheries, proves they are so poor in themselves, as to come to nothing with distant nations, who do not support them from their own treasury. We have seen that the advantages of our position place our fisheries on a ground somewhat higher, such as to relieve our treasury from giving them support; but not to permit it to draw support from them, nor to dispense the government from the obligation of effectuating free markets for them; that, from the great proportion of our salted fish, for our common oil, and a part of our spermaceti oil, markets may perhaps be preserved, by friendly arrangements towards those nations whose arrangements are friendly to us, and the residue be compensated by giving to the seamen, thrown out of business, the certainty of employment in another branch, of which we have the sole disposal (the carrying trade).—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 538. (1791.)

3021. FISHERIES, Whale.—In 1715, the Americans began their whale fishery. They were led to it at first by the whales which presented themselves on their coasts. They attacked them there in small vessels of forty tons. As the whale, being infested, retired from the coast, they followed him farther and farther into the ocean, still enlarging their vessels with their adventures, to sixty, one hundred, and two hundred tons. Having extended their pursuit to the Western Islands, they fell in, accidentally, with the spermaceti whale, of a different species from that of Greenland, which alone had hitherto been known in commerce; more fierce and active, and whose oil and head matter were found to be more valuable, as it might be used in the interior of houses without offending the smell. The distinction now first arose between the Northern and Southern fisheries; the object of the former being the Greenland whale, which frequents the Northern coasts and seas of Europe and America; that of the latter being the spermaceti whale, which was found in the Southern seas, from the Western Islands and coast of Africa, to that of Brazil, and still on to the Falkland Islands. Here, again, within soundings, on the coast of Brazil, they found a third species of whale, which they called the black or Brazil whale, smaller than the Greenland, yielding a still less valuable oil, fit only for summer use, as it becomes opaque at 50 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, while that of the spermaceti whale is limpid to 41, and of the Greenland whale to 36, of the same thermometer. It is only worth taking, therefore, when it falls in the way of the fishermen, but not worth seeking, except when they have failed of success against the spermaceti whale, in which case, this kind, easily found and taken, serves to moderate their loss.—REPORT ON FISHERIES. vii. 545. (1791.)

3022. FLAG, Neutrality of.—The neutrality of our flag would render the carriage for belligerents an incalculable source of profit.—REPORT ON FISHERIES. vii, 554. (1791.) See NAVIGATION and NEUTRALITY.

3023. FLAG, Usurpation of.—It will be necessary for all our public agents to exert themselves with vigilance * * * to prevent the vessels of other nations from usurping our flag. This usurpation tends to commit us with the belligerent powers, to draw on those vessels truly ours, vigorous visitations to distinguish them from the counterfeits, and to take business from us.—TO C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 535. (Pa., 1793.)

3024. ———. Present appearances in Europe render a general war there probable. * * * In the * * * event * * * give no countenance to the usurpation of our flag by foreign vessels, but * * * aid in detecting it, as without bringing to us any advantage, the usurpation will tend to commit us with the belligerent powers, and to subject those vessels, which are truly ours, to harassing scrutinies in order to distinguish them from the counterfeits.—TO SAMUEL SHAW. iii, 530. (Pa., March 1793.)

3025. ———. It is impossible to detest more than I do the fraudulent and injurious practice of covering foreign vessels and cargoes under the American flag; and I sincerely wish a systematic and severe course of punishment could be established.—TO MR. GALLATIN. v, 223. FORD ED., x, 170. (W., 1807.)

3026. FLAG, Reception of.—If British officers set the example of refusing to receive a flag, let ours then follow it by never sending or receiving another.—TO W. H. CABELL. v, 201. (W., Oct. 1807.)

3027. ———. In answering [Minister Erskine's] last [letter], should he not be reminded how strange it is he should consider as a hostility our refusing to receive but under a flag, persons from vessels remaining and acting in our waters in defiance of the authority of the country?—TO JAMES MADISON. v, 197. FORD ED., ix, 141. (M., Sep. 1807.)

3028. FLATTERY, Un-American.—Let those flatter who fear: it is not an American art.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

3029. ———. According to the ideas of our country, we do not permit ourselves to speak even truths, when they may have the air of flattery.—TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. ii, 136. (1787.)

3030. FLETCHER OF SALTOUN, Principles of.—The political principles of that patriot were worthy of the purest periods of the British constitution; They are those which were in vigor at the epoch of the American emigration. Our ancestors brought them here, and they needed little strengthening to make us what we are. But in the weakened condition of English whiggism at this day, it requires more firmness to publish and advocate them than it then did to act on them. This merit is peculiarly your Lordships; and no one honors it more than myself.—TO EARL OF BUCHAN. iv, 493. (W., 1803.)

3031. FLORIDA, Acquisition of.—Governor Quesada, by order of his court, is inviting foreigners to go and settle in Florida. This is meant for our people. * * * I wish a hundred thousand of our inhabitants would accept the invitation. It will be the means of delivering to us peaceably what may otherwise cost us a war. In the meantime, we may complain of this seduction of our inhabitants just enough to make them believe we think it very wise policy for them, and confirm them in it.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 235. FORD ED., v, 316. (Pa., 1791.)

3032. FLORIDA, Buying.—It was agreed at a cabinet meeting that] Monroe be instructed to endeavor to purchase both Floridas if he can; West [Florida] if he cannot East, at the prices before agreed on; but if neither can be procured, then to stipulate a plenary right to use all the rivers rising within our limits and passing through theirs. * * * We are more indifferent about pressing the purchase of the Floridas, because of the money we have to provide for Louisiana, and because we think they cannot fail to fall into our hands.—THE ANAS. FORD ED., i, 300. (Oct. 1803.)

3033. ———. The extension of the war in Europe leaving us without danger of a sudden peace, depriving us of the chance of an ally, I proposed [in cabinet] that we should address ourselves to France, informing her it was a last effort at amicable settlement with Spain, and offer to her or through her, 1. a sum of money for the rights of Spain east of Iberville, say the Floridas. 2. To cede the part of Louisiana from the Rio Bravo to the Guadaloupe. 3. Spain to pay within a certain time spoiliations under her own flag, agreed to by the convention (which we guess to be one hundred vessels worth two million dollars); and those subsequent (worth as much more), and to hypothecate to us for those payments the country from Guadalupe to Rio Bravo. Armstrong was to be employed. The 1st was to be the exciting motive with France to whom Spain is in arrears for subsidies, and who will be glad also to secure us from going into the scale of England. The 2d. the soothing motive with Spain, which France would press bona fide, because she claimed to the Rio Bravo. The 3d. to quiet our merchants. It was agreed to unanimously, and the sum to be offered fixed not to exceed five million dollars. Mr. Gallatin did not like purchasing Florida under an apprehension of war, lest we should be thought, in fact, to purchase peace. We thought this over-weighed by taking advantage of an opportunity, which might not occur again, of getting a country essential to our peace, and to the security of the commerce of the Mississippi.—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 308. (Nov. 12, 1805.)

3034. ——. Since our [the Cabinet's] last meeting, we have received a letter from General Armstrong, containing Talleyrand's propositions, which are equivalent to ours nearly, except as to the sum, he requiring seven million dollars. He advises that we alarm the fears of Spain by a vigorous language and conduct, in order to induce her to join us in appealing to the interference of the Emperor. We now agree to modify our propositions, so as to accommodate them to his as much as possible. We agree to pay five million dollars for the Floridas as soon as the treaty is ratified by Spain, a vote of credit obtained from Congress, and orders delivered us for the surrender of the country. We agree to his proposition that the Colorado shall be our Western boundary, and a belt of thirty leagues on each side of it be kept unsettled. We agree that joint commissioners shall settle all spoiliations, and to take payment from Spain by bills on her colonies. We agree to say nothing about the French spoliators in Spanish ports which broke off the former convention. We propose to pay the five millions, after a simple vote of credit, by stock redeemable in three years, within which time we can pay it.—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 300. (Nov. 19, 1805.)

3035. ——. If you can succeed in procuring us Florida, and a good Western boundary, it will fill the American mind with joy. It will secure to our fellow citizens one of their most ardent wishes, a long peace with Spain and France. For be assured, the object of war with them and alliance with England, which, at the last session of Congress, drew off from the republican band about half a dozen of its members, is universally reprobated by our native citizens from north to south. I have never seen the nation stand more firmly to its principles, or rally so firmly to its constituted authorities, and in reprobation of the opposition to them.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 18. (W., 1806.)

3036. FLORIDA, England and.—England will immediately seize on the Floridas as a point d'appui to annoy us. What are we to do in that case? I think she will find that there is no nation on the globe which can gall her so much as we can.—To JOHN ARMSTRONG. v, 135. FORD ED., ix, 117. (W., July 1807.) See 298.

3037. FLORIDA, France and.—That Bonaparte would give us the Floridas to withhold intercourse with the residue of the [Spanish] colonies cannot be doubted. But that is no price; because they are ours in the first moment of the first war; and until a war they are of no particular necessity to us.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 444. (M., April 1809.)

3038. FLORIDA, Reprisal and.—As soon as we have all the proofs of the Western intrigues [of Spain], let us make a remonstrance and demand of satisfaction, and, if Congress approves, we may in the same instant make reprisals on the Floridas, until satisfaction for that and for spoiliations, and until a settlement of boundary.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 164. FORD ED., ix, 124. (M., Aug. 1807.)

3039. ——. If England should be disposed to continue peace with us, and Spain gives to Bonaparte the occupation she promises, will not the interval be favorable for our reprisals on the Floridas for the indemnifications withheld?—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 335. (M., Aug. 1808.)

3040. ——. The situation of affairs in Spain * * * may produce a favorable occasion of doing ourselves justice in the South. We must certainly so dispose of our southern recruits and armed vessels as to be ready for the occasion.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 336. (M., Aug. 1808.)

3041. ——. Should England get to rights with us, while Bonaparte is at war with Spain, the moment may be favorable to take possession of our own territory held by Spain, and so much more as may make a proper reprisal for her spoiliations. We ought, therefore, to direct the rendezvous of our southern recruits and gunboats so as to be in proper position for striking * * * in an instant, when Congress shall will it.—To ROBERT SMITH. v, 337. (M., Aug. 1808.)

3042. ——. Should England make up with us, while Bonaparte continues at war with Spain, a moment may occur when we may without danger of commitment with either France or England seize to our own limits of Louisiana as of right, and the residue of the Floridas as reprisal for spoiliations. It is our duty to have an eye to this in rendezvousing and stationing our new recruits and our armed vessels, so as to be ready, if Congress authorizes it, to strike in a moment.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 338. (M., Aug. 1808.)

3043. ——. Should the conference [with Canning] announced in Mr. Pinckney's letter of June 5th, settle friendship between England and us, and Bonaparte continue at war with Spain, a moment may occur favorable, without compromising us with either France or England, for seizing our own from the Rio Bravo to Perdido, as of right, and the residue of Florida, as a reprisal for spoiliations. I have thought it proper to suggest this possibility to General Dearborn and Mr. Smith, and to recommend an eye to it in their rendezvousing and stationing the new southern recruits and gunboats, so that we may strike in a moment when Congress says so.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 339. FORD ED., ix, 204. (M., Aug. 1808.)

3044. FLORIDA, Right to.—Florida, moreover, is ours. Every nation in Europe considers it such a right. We need not care for its occupation in time of peace and, in war, the first cannon makes it ours without offence to anybody. * * * The cession of the Floridas in exchange for Texas imports an acknowledgment of our right to it. This province, moreover, the Floridas and possibly Cuba, will join us on the acknowledgment of their independence, a measure to which their new government will probably accede voluntarily.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 160. FORD ED., x, 159. (M., 1820.)

3045. FLORIDA, Seizure of.—[I wish you [Congress] would authorize the President to take possession of East Florida immediately. The seizing West Florida will be a signal to England to take Pensacola and St. Augustine; and be assured it will be done as soon as the order can return after they hear of our taking Baton Rouge, and we shall never get it from them but by a war, which may be prevented by anticipation. There never was a case where the adage was more true, "in for a penny, in for a pound"; and no more offence will be taken by France and Spain at our seizure of both than of one.—To J. W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 290. (M., Jan. 1811.)

3046. ——. The English will take East Florida, pretendingly for Spain. We should take it with a declaration; 1, that it is a reprisal for indemnities Spain has acknowledged due to us; 2, to keep it from falling into hands in which it would essentially endanger our safety; 3, that in our hands it will still be held as a subject of negotiation. The leading republican members should come to an understanding, close the doors, and determine not to separate till the vote is carried, and all the secrecy you can enjoin should be aimed at until the measure is executed.—To J. W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 291. (M., Jan. 1811.)

3047. ——. We are in a state of semi-warfare with your adjoining colonies, the Floridas. We do not consider this as affecting our peace with Spain, or any other of her former possessions. We wish her and them well; and under her present difficulties at home, and her doubtful future relations with her colonies, both wisdom and interest will, I presume, induce her to leave them to settle themselves the quarrels they draw on themselves from their neighbors. The commanding officers in the Floridas have excited and armed the neighboring savages to war against us, and to murder and scalp many of our women and children as well as men, taken by surprise—poor creatures! They have paid for it with the loss of the flower of their strength, and have given us the right, as we possess the power, to exterminate or to expatriate them beyond the Mississippi. This conduct of the Spanish officers will probably oblige us to take possession of the Floridas, and the rather as we believe the English will otherwise seize them, and use them as stations to distract and annoy us. But should we possess ourselves of them, and Spain retain her other colonies in this hemisphere, I presume we shall consider them in our hands as subjects of negotiation.—To DON V. TORANDA CORUNA. vi, 274. (M., Dec. 1813.)

3048. FLORIDA, Spain and.—Some fear our envelopment in the wars engendering from the unsettled state of our affairs with Spain, and therefore are anxious for a ratification of our treaty with her. I fear no such thing, and hope that if ratified by Spain it will be rejected here. We may justly say to Spain, "when this negotiation commenced, twenty years ago, your authority was acknowledged by those you are selling to us. That authority is now renounced, and their right of self-disposal asserted. In buying them from you, then, we buy but a war-tittle, a right to subdue them, which you can neither convey nor we acquire. This is a family quarrel in which we have no right to meddle. Settle it between yourselves, and we will then treat with the party whose right is acknowledged." With whom that will be, no doubt can be entertained. And why should we revolt them by purchasing them as cattle, rather than receiving them as fellow-men? Spain has held off until she sees they are lost to her, and now thinks it better to get something than nothing for them. When she shall see South America equally desperate, she will be wise to sell that also.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 194. FORD ED., x, 179. (M., 1820.)

3049. ——. I am not sorry for the non-ratification of the Spanish treaty. Our assent to it has proved our desire to be on friendly terms with Spain; their dissent, the imbecility and malignity of their government towards us, have placed them in the wrong in the eyes of the world, and that is well; but to us the province of Techas will be the richest State of our Union, without any exception. Its southern part will make more sugar than we can consume, and the Red River, on its North, is the most luxuriant country on earth. Florida, moreover, is ours. Every nation in Europe considers it such a right. We need not care for its occupation in time of peace, and, in war, the first cannon makes it ours without offence to anybody. The friendly advisements, too, of Russia and France, as well as the change of government in Spain, now ensured, require a further and respectful forbearance. While their request will rebut the plea of proscriptive possession, it will give us a right to their approbation when taken in the maturity of circumstances. I really think, too, that neither the state of our finances, the condition of our country, nor the public opinion, urges us to precipitation into war. The treaty has had the valuable effect of strengthening our title to the Techas, because the cession of the Floridas in exchange for Techas imports an acknowledgment of our right to it. This province moreover, the Floridas and possibly Cuba, will join us on the acknowledgment of their independence, a measure to which their new government will probably accede voluntarily.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 160. FORD ED., x, 158. (M., May 1820.) See LOUISIANA, MONROE DOCTRINE, and SPAIN.

3050. FOLLY, National.—We, too, shall encounter follies; but if great, they will be short; if long, they will be light, and the vigor of our country will get the better of them.—To MR. DIGGES. v, 14. (W., 1806.)

3051. ——. We shall have our follies without doubt. Some one or more of them will always be afloat. But ours will be the follies of enthusiasm, not of bigotry * * *. —To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 27. (M., 1816.)

3052. FONTAINEBLEAU, Description.—This is a village of about 5000 inhabitants when the Court is not here, and 20,000 inhabitants when they are; occupying a valley through which runs a brook, and on each side of it a ridge of small mountains most of which are naked rock. The King comes here, in the fall always, to hunt. His court attend him, as do also the foreign diplomatic corps. But as this is not indispensably required, and my finances do not admit the expense of a continued residence here, I propose to come occasionally to attend the King's levees, returning again to Paris, distant forty miles.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 33. (P., 1785.)

3053. FOPPERY, Admiration of.—As for admiration, I am sure the man who powders most, perfumes most, embroiders most, and talks most nonsense, is most admired. Though to be candid, there are some who have too much good sense to esteem such monkey-like animals as these, in whose formation, as the saying is, the tailors and barbers go halves with God Almighty.*—To JOHN PAGE. i, 183. FORD ED., i, 344. (1762.)

3054. FORCE, Despotism and.—Force [is] the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

3055. FORCE, Government and.—That nature has formed man insusceptible of any other government than that of force, is a conclusion not founded in truth nor experience.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 104. FORD ED., iv, 362. (P., 1787.)

3056. FORCE, Money and.—The want of money cramps every effort. This will be supplied by the most unpalatable of all substitutes, force.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 242. FORD ED., ii, 309. (Wg., 1780.)

3057. FORCE, Politics and.—Force is not the kind of opposition the American people will permit.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 287. FORD ED., vii, 356. (Pa., 1799.)

3058. FORCE, Reason vs.—The friends of reform, while they remain firm, [should] avoid every act and threat against the peace of the Union. That would check the favorable sentiments of the middle States, and rally them again around the measures which are ruining us. Reason, not rashness, is the only means of bringing our fellow citizens to their true minds.—To N. LEWIS. iv, 278. (1799.)

3059. FORCE, Right and.—Force cannot give right.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 445. (1774.)

3060. — — — With respect to America. Europeans in general, have been too long in the habit of confounding force with right.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 276. FORD ED., v, 364. (Pa., 1791.)

3061. — — — Force cannot change right.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 355. (M., 1824.)

3062. FORCE, Wisdom and.—It is the multitude which possesses force, and wisdom must yield to that.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 592. FORD ED., x, 25. (P.F., 1816.)

3063. FOREIGN AGENTS, Authorization.—The sending an agent within our limits, we presume has been done without the authority or knowledge of the Spanish government. It has certainly been the usage, where one nation has wished to employ agents of any kind within the limits of another, to obtain the permission of that other, and even to regulate by convention, and on principles of reciprocity, the functions to be exercised by such agents.†—To THE SPANISH COMMISSIONERS. FORD ED., vi, 99. (Pa., 1792.)

* Jefferson was 19 years of age in 1762.—EDITOR.

† The Government of West Florida had established an agent within the Creek territory.—EDITOR.

3064. — — — I consider the keeping by Spain of an agent in the Indian Country as a circumstance which requires serious interference on our part; and I submit to your decision whether it does not furnish a proper occasion to us to * * * insist on a mutual and formal stipulation to forbear employing agents, or pensioning any persons, within each other's limits; and if this be refused, to propose the contrary stipulation, to wit, that each party may freely keep agents within the Indian territories of the other, in which case we might soon sicken them of the license.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 101. (M., 1792.)

3065. — — — It is a general rule, that no nation has a right to keep an agent within the limits of another, without the consent of that other, and we are satisfied it would be best for both Spain and us, to abstain from having agents or other persons in our employ, or pay, among the savages inhabiting our respective territories, whether as subjects or independent. You are, therefore, desired to propose and press a stipulation to that effect. Should they absolutely decline it, it may be proper to let them perceive, that as the right of keeping agents exists on both sides, or on neither, it will rest with us to reciprocate their own measures.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT. iii, 475. FORD ED., vi, 119. (Pa., 1792.)

3066. FOREIGN AGENTS, Conciliation of.—I think it of real value to produce favorable dispositions in the agents of foreign nations here. Cordiality among nations depends very much on the representations of their agents mutually, and cordiality once established, is of immense value, even counted in money, from the favors it produces in commerce, and the good understanding it preserves in matters merely political.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 152. (Pa., 1793.)

3067. FOREIGN AGENTS, Duty of.—The President of the United States being the only channel of communication between this country and foreign nations, it is from him alone that foreign nations or their agents are to learn what is or has been the will of the nation, and whatever he communicates as such, they have a right and are bound to consider as the expression of the nation, and no foreign agent can be allowed to question it, to interpose between him and any other branch of government, under the pretext of either's transgressing their functions, nor to make himself the umpire and final judge between them. I am, therefore, not authorized to enter into any discussions with you on the meaning of our Constitution in any part of it, or to prove to you that it has ascribed to him alone the admission or interdiction of foreign agents. I inform you of the fact by authority from the President.—To EDMOND CHARLES GENET. iv, 84. FORD ED., vi, 451. (G., Nov. 1793.)

3068. FOREIGN AGENTS, Intermeddling.—For a foreign agent, addressed to the Executive, to embody himself with the lawyers of a faction whose sole object is to embarrass and defeat all the measures of the country, and by their opinions, known to be always in opposition, to endeavor to influence our proceedings, is a conduct not to be permitted.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 368. (M., 1808.)

3069. FOREIGN AGENTS, Secret.—We want an intelligent, prudent native, who will go to reside at New Orleans, as a secret correspondent, for $1000 a year. He might do a little business, merely to cover his real office. Do point out such a one. Virginia ought to offer more loungers equal to this, and ready for it, than any other State.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 269. (Pa., 1793.)

3070. FOREIGN INFLUENCE, Deplored.—I do sincerely wish that we could take our stand on a ground perfectly neutral and independent towards all nations. It has been my constant object through my public life; and with respect to the English and French, particularly, I have too often expressed to the former my wishes, and made to them propositions, verbally and in writing, officially and privately. To official and private characters, for them to doubt of my views, if they would be content with equality. Of this they are in possession of several written and formal proofs, in my own hand-writing. But they have wished a monopoly of commerce and influence with us; and they have in fact obtained it. When we take notice that theirs is the workshop to which we go for all we want; that with them centre either immediately or ultimately all the labors of our hands and lands; that to them belongs, either openly or secretly, the great mass of our navigation; that even the factorage of their affairs here, is kept to themselves by factitious citizenships; that these foreign and false citizens now constitute the great body of what are called our merchants, fill our seaports, are planted in every little town and district of the interior country, sway everything in the former places, by their own votes, and those of their dependents, in the latter, by their insinuations and the influence of their ledgers; that they are advancing rapidly to a monopoly of our banks and public funds, and thereby placing our public finances under their control; that they have in their alliance the most influential characters in and out of office; when they have shown that by all these bearings on the different branches of the government, they can force it to proceed in whatever direction they dictate, and bend the interests of this country entirely to the will of another; when all this, I say, is attended to, it is impossible for us to say we stand on independent ground, impossible for a free mind not to see and to groan under the bondage in which it is bound. If anything after this could excite surprise, it would be that they have been able so far to throw dust in the eyes of our own citizens, as to fix on those who wish merely to recover self-government the charge of observing one foreign influence because they resist submission to another. But they possess our printing presses, a powerful engine in their government of us. At this very moment they would have drawn us into a war on the side of England, had it not been for the failure of her bank. Such was their open and loud cry, and that of their gazettes, till this event. After plunging us in all the broils of the European nations, there would remain but one act to close our tragedy, that is, to break up our Union; and even this they have ventured seriously and solemnly to propose and maintain by arguments in a Connecticut paper. I have been happy, however, in believing from the stifling of this effort, that that dose was found too strong, and excited as much repugnance there as it did horror in other parts of our country, and that whatever follies we may be led into as to foreign nations, we shall never give up our Union, the last anchor of our hope, and that alone which is to prevent this heavenly country from becoming an arena of gladiators. Much as I abhor war, and view it as the greatest scourge of mankind, and anxiously as I wish to keep out of the broils of Europe, I would yet go with my brethren into these, rather than separate from them. But I hope we may still keep clear of them, notwithstanding our present thralldom, and that time may be given us to reflect on the awful crisis we have passed through, and to find some means of shielding ourselves in future from foreign influence, political, commercial, or in whatever other form it may be attempted. I can scarcely withhold myself from joining in the wish of Silas Deane, that there were an ocean of fire between us and the old world.*—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 172. FORD ED., vii, 121. (Pa., May 1797.)

3071. FOREIGN INFLUENCE, English.—The proof England exhibited on that occasion [the repeal of the Embargo] that she can exercise such an influence in this country as to control the will of its government and three-fourths of its people, and oblige the three-fourths to submit to one-fourth, is to me the most mortifying circumstance which has occurred since the establishment of our government. The only prospect I see of lessening that influence, is in her own conduct, and not from anything in our power.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 530. FORD ED., ix, 278. (M., July 1810.)

3072. FOREIGN INFLUENCE, Exclusion.—Our countrymen have divided themselves by such strong affections, to the French and the English, that nothing will secure us

*In the draft of the letter this paragraph was changed to the form above printed. Before the alteration it read: "I shall never forget the prediction of the Count de Vergennes, that we shall exhibit the singular phenomenon of a fruit rotten before it is ripe, nor cease to join in the wish of Silas Deane, that there were an ocean of fire between us and the old world. Indeed, my dear friend, I am so disgusted with this entire subjection to a foreign power, that if it were in the end to appear to be the wish of the body of my countrymen to remain in that vassalage, I should feel my unfitness to be an agent in their affairs, and seek in retirement that personal independence without which this world has nothing I value. I am confident you set the same store by it which I do; but perhaps your situation may not give you the same conviction of its existence."—FORD ED., vii, 123.

internally but a divorce from both nations.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 188. FORD ED., vii, 149. (Pa., 1797.)

3073. ——. We consider their [Cuba's and Mexico's] interests and ours as the same, and that the object of both must be to exclude all European influence from this hemisphere.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 381. FORD ED., ix, 213. (W., October 1808.)

3074. FOREIGN INFLUENCE, French.—Foreign influence is the present and just object of public hue and cry, and, as often happens, the most guilty are foremost and loudest in the cry. If those who are truly independent can so trim our vessel as to beat through the waves now agitating us, they will merit a glory the greater as it seems less possible.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 176. FORD ED., vii, 128. (Pa., May 1797.)

3075. ——. Those [members of Congress] who have no wish but for the peace of their country, and its independence of all foreign influence, have a hard struggle indeed, overwhelmed by a cry as loud and imposing as if it were true, of being under French influence, and this raised by a faction composed of English subjects residing among us, or such as are English in all their relations and sentiments. However, patience will bring all to rights, and we shall both live to see the mask taken from their faces, and our citizens sensible on which side true liberty and independence are sought.—To HORATIO GATES. iv, 178. FORD ED., vii, 131. (Pa., May 1797.)

3076. FOREIGN INFLUENCE, Mercantile.—The commerce of England has spread its roots over the whole face of our country. This is the real source of all the obliquities of the public mind.—To A. H. ROWAN. iv, 257. FORD ED., vii, 280. (M., 1798.)

3077. FOREIGN INTERVENTION, Evils of.—Wretched, indeed, is the nation in whose affairs foreign powers are once permitted to intermeddle.—To B. VAUGHAN. ii, 167. (P., 1787.)

3078. FOREIGN INTERVENTION, Exclude.—What a crowd of lessons do the present miseries of Holland teach us? * * * Never to call in foreign nations to settle domestic differences; * * *.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 283. FORD ED., iv, 455. (P., 1787.) See ALLIANCES, HEREDITARY BODIES, WAR.

3079. ——. Our young Republic * * * should never call on foreign powers to settle their differences.—To COLONEL HUMPHREYS. ii, 253. (P., 1787.)

3080. FOREIGN INTERVENTION, United States and.—We wish not to meddle with the internal affairs of any country, nor with the general affairs of Europe.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 535. (Pa., 1793.)

—FOREIGNERS.—See ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, ALIENS, ASYLUM, CITIZENS and EXPATRIATION.

3081. FORMALITIES, Business and.—I have ever thought that forms should yield to whatever should facilitate business.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 401. FORD ED., viii, 59. (W., 1801.)

3082. FORMALITIES, Dispensing with.—There are situations when form must be dispensed with. A man attacked by assassins will call for help to those nearest him, and will not think himself bound to silence till a magistrate may come to his aid.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 305. FORD ED., v, 306. (Pa., 1791.)

3083. FORMALITIES, Insisting upon.—I noticed to you * * * that the commission of consul to M. Dannery ought to have been addressed to the President of the United States. * * * [As] we were persuaded * * * that the error in the address had proceeded from no intention in the Executive Council of France to question the functions of the President, * * * no difficulty was made in issuing the commission. We are still under the same persuasion. But in your letter of the 14th instant, you personally question the authority of the President, and, in consequence of that, have not addressed to him the commission of Messrs. Pennevert and Chervi. Making a point of this formality on your part, it becomes necessary to make a point of it on ours also; and I am therefore charged to return you those commissions, and to inform you, that bound to enforce respect to the order of things established by our Constitution, the President will issue no esquatur to any consul or vice-consul, not directed to him in the usual form, after the party from whom it comes, has been apprised that such should be the address.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 84. FORD ED., vi, 451. (G., Nov. 1793.)

3084. FORMALITIES, International.—I am of opinion that all communications between nations should pass through the channels of their Executives. However, in the instance of condolence on the death of Dr. Franklin, the letter from our General Government was addressed to the President of the National Assembly; so was a letter from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, containing congratulations on the achievement of liberty to the French nation. I have not heard that, in either instance, their Executive took it amiss that they were not made the channel of communication.—To GOVERNOR LEE. iii, 456. (M., 1792.)

3085. FORMALITIES, Jefferson and.—General Phillips * * * having * * * taken great offence at a [recent] threat of retaliation in the treatment of prisoners, enclosed his answer to my letter [with respect to a passport for a supply vessel] under this address, "To Thomas Jefferson, Esq., American Governor of Virginia". I paused on receiving the letter, and for some time would not open it; however, when the miserable condition of our brethren in Charleston occurred to me, I could not determine that they should be left without the necessities of life, while a punctilio should be discussing between the British General and myself; and, knowing that I had an opportunity of returning the compliment to Mr. Phillips in a case perfectly corresponding, I opened the letter. Very shortly after, I received, as I expected, the permission of the Board of War for the British vessel, then in Hampton Roads with clothing and refreshments, to proceed to Alexandria, I enclosed and addressed it, "To William Phillips, Esq., commanding the British forces in the Commonwealth of Virginia". Personally knowing Phillips to be the proudest man of the proudest nation on earth, I well know he will not open this letter; but having occasion at the same time, to write to Captain Gerbach, the flag-master, I informed him that the Convention troops in this State should perish for want of necessities, before any should be carried to them through this State, till General Phillips either swallowed this pill of retaliation, or made an apology for his rudeness. And in this, should the matter come ultimately to Congress, we hope for their support.*—To THE VIRGINIA DELEGATION IN CONGRESS. i, 308. (R., 1781.)

3086. FORMALITIES, Principles and.—No government can disregard formalities more than ours. But when formalities are attacked with a view to change principles, * * * it becomes material to defend formalities. They would be no longer trifles, if they could, in defiance of the national will, continue a foreign agent among us whatever might be his course of action.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 92. FORD ED., vi, 464. (Pa., 1793.)

3087. FORTIFICATIONS, The Administration of Washington and.—[Among the heads of the [President's] speech [considered in cabinet] was a proposition to Congress to fortify the principal harbors. I opposed the expediency of the General Government's undertaking it, and the expediency of the President's proposing it. It was amended, by substituting a proposition to adopt means for enforcing respect to the jurisdiction of the United States within its waters. * * * The President acknowledged he had doubted the expediency of undertaking it. * * * The clause recommending the fortifications was left out of the speech.—ANAS. ix, 182. FORD ED., i, 269. (Nov. 1793.)

3088. ——. The putting the several harbors of the United States into a state of defence, having never yet been the subject of deliberation and decision with the Legislature, and consequently, the necessary moneys not having been appropriated or levied, the President does not find himself

* General Howe, in June 1776, sent a letter under a flag of truce to General Washington addressed to "George Washington, Esq." It was returned, unopened. Howe sent a second letter, and it also was sent back. A third one addressed to "George Washington, Esq., &c., &c." was also refused. The fourth one was addressed to General George Washington and accepted. General Washington, in writing to Congress on the subject said: "I would not, on any occasion, sacrifice essentials to punctilio; but, in this instance, I deemed it my duty to my country, and to my appointment, to insist upon that respect, which, in any other than a public view, I would willingly have waived." General Howe said that he had adopted this style of address to save himself from censure by his own government.—EDITOR.

in a situation competent to comply with the proposition on the subject of Norfolk.—To THE GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA. iii, 564. (Pa., May 1793.)

3089. FORTIFICATIONS, Adequate.—Some of [the injuries of the belligerent powers] are of a nature to be met by force only, and all of them may lead to it. I cannot, therefore, but recommend such preparations as circumstances call for. The first object is to place our seaport towns out of the danger of insult. Measures have been already taken for furnishing them with heavy cannon for the service of such land batteries as may make a part of their defence against armed vessels approaching them. In aid of these it is desirable that we should have a competent number of gun-boats; and the number, to be competent, must be considerable.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 49. FORD ED., viii, 391. (1805.)

3090. ——. I think it would make an honorable close of your term as well as mine, to leave our country in a state of substantial defence, which we found quite unprepared for it. Indeed, it would for me be a joyful annunciation to the next meeting of Congress, that the operations of defence are all complete.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 295. FORD ED., ix, 171. (M., May 1808.)

3091. FORTIFICATIONS, New York.—I wish you would stay long enough at New York to settle * * * the plan of defence for that place; and I am in hopes you will also see Fulton's [torpedo] experiments tried, and see how far his means may enter into your plan.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. v, 117. FORD ED., ix, 101. (W., July 1807.)

3092. ——. Among the objects of our care, New York stands foremost in the points of importance and exposure; and if permitted we shall provide such defences for it as, in our opinion, will render it secure against attacks by sea.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. v, 283. (W., 1808.)

3093. ——. The Legislature of New York may be assured that every exertion will be used to put the United States in the best condition of defence, that we may be fully prepared to meet the dangers which menace the peace of our country.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. viii, 154. (1800.)

3094. FORTIFICATIONS, St. Lawrence.—Should our present differences [with England] be amicably settled, it will be a question for consideration whether we should not establish a strong post on the St. Lawrence, as near our northern boundary as a good position can be found. To do this at present would only produce a greater accumulation of hostile force in that quarter.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. v, 239. (W., Jan. 1808.)

3095. ——. It appears to me that it would be well to have a post on the St. Lawrence, as near our line as a commanding position could be found, that it might afford some cover for our most advanced inhabitants.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. v. 284. (W., 1808.)

3096. FORTIFICATIONS, Sites for.—I do not see that we can avoid agreeing to estimates made by worthy men of our own choice for the sites of fortifications, or that we could leave an important place undefended because too much is asked for the site. And, therefore, we must pay what the sites at Boston have been valued at. At the same time, I do not know on what principles of reasoning it is that good men think the public ought to pay more for a thing than they would themselves if they wanted it.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v. 293. (M., 1808.)

3097. — In proceeding to carry into execution the act [providing for the public defence], it is found that the sites most advantageous for the defence of our harbors and rivers, and sometimes the only sites competent to that defence, are in some cases the property of minors, incapable of giving a valid assent to their alienation; in others belong to persons who on no terms will alienate; and in others the proprietors demand such exaggerated compensation as, however liberally the public ought to compensate in such cases, would exceed all bounds of justice or liberality. From this cause the defence of our seaboard, so necessary to be pressed during the present session will in various parts be defeated, unless the national Legislature can apply a constitutional remedy. The power of repelling invasions, and making laws necessary for carrying that power into execution, seem to include that of occupying those sites which are necessary to repel an enemy; observing only the amendment to the Constitution which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. I submit, therefore, to the consideration of Congress, where the necessary sites cannot be obtained by the joint and valid consent of parties, whether provision should be made by a process of ad quod damnum, or any other eligible means for authorizing the sites which are necessary for the public defence to be appropriated to that purpose. I am aware that as the consent of the Legislature of the State to the purchase of the site may not, in some instances have been previously obtained, exclusive legislation cannot be exercised therein by Congress until that consent is given. But, in the meantime, it will be held under the same laws which protect the property of individuals in that State, and other property of the United States, and the Legislatures at their next meetings will have opportunities of doing what will be so evidently called for by the interest of their own State.—MESSAGE ON PUBLIC DEFENCE. FORD ED., ix, 187. (March 1808.)

3098. FORTIFICATIONS, System of.—Whether we have peace or war, I think the present Legislature will authorize a complete system of defensive works, on such a scale as they think they ought to adopt. The state of our finances now permits this.—To W. H. CABELL. v. 208. FORD ED., ix, 97. (W., Nov. 1807.)

3099. — The surplus may partly, indeed, be applied towards completing the defence of the exposed points of our country, on such a scale as shall be adapted to our principles and circumstances. This object is doubtless among the first entitled to attention, in such a state of our finances, and it is one which, whether we have peace or war, will provide security where it is due.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 88. FORD ED., ix, 165. (1807.)

3100. — I hope, that this summer we shall get our whole seaports put into that state of defence, which Congress has thought proportioned to our circumstances and situation; that is to say, put hors d'insulte from a maritime attack, by a moderate squadron.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. v. 266. (W., March 1808.) See DEFENCE.

3101. FORTITUDE, Virtue of.—Fortitude teaches us to meet and surmount difficulties; not to fly from them, like cowards; and to fly, too, in vain, for they will meet and arrest us at every turn of our road. Fortitude is one of the four cardinal virtues of Epicurus.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 140. FORD ED., x, 145. (M., 1819.)

3102. FORTUNE, Injured.—I should have been much wealthier had I remained in that private condition which renders it lawful and even laudable to use proper efforts to better it.—To —. iii, 527. (Pa., 1793.)

3103. FORTUNE, Public Service and.—When I first entered on the stage of public life (now twenty-four years ago), I came to a resolution never to engage while in public office in any kind of enterprise for the improvement of my fortune, [and] I have never departed from it in a single instance.—To —. iii, 527. (Pa., 1793.)

3104. — I have the consolation of having added nothing to my private fortune, during my public service, and of retiring with hands as clean as they are empty.—To COMTE DIODATI. v, 62. (W., 1807.) See DISINTERESTEDNESS.

3105. FORTUNES, Imperilled.—Private fortunes, in the present state of our circulation, are at the mercy of those self-created money-lenders, and are prostrated by the floods of nominal money with which their avarice deluges us.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 142. FORD ED., ix, 394. (M., 1813.)

3107. FOURTH OF JULY, Despotism and.—The flames kindled on the Fourth of * Congress inserted after Declaration, "with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence." —EDITOR.

July, 1776, have spread over too much of the globe to be extinguished by the feeble engines of despotism; on the contrary, they will consume these engines and all who work them.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 218. (M., Sep. 1821.)

3108. FOURTH OF JULY, Europe and.—The Fourth of July * * * divorced us from the follies and crimes of Europe.—To MR. DIGGES. v, 14. (W., 1806.) See BIRTHDAY and DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

3109. ——. The light which has been shed on the mind of man through the civilized world, has given it a new direction from which no human power can divert it. The sovereigns of Europe who are wise, or have wise counsellors, see this, and bend to the breeze which blows; the unwise alone stiffen and meet its inevitable crush.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 193. FORD ED., x, 179. (1820.)

3110. FOX (Charles James), Character.—In Mr. Fox, personally, I have more confidence than in any man in England, and it is founded in what, through unquestionable channels, I have had opportunities of knowing of his honesty and his good sense. While he shall be in the administration, my reliance on that government will be solid.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 11. FORD ED., viii, 449. (W., May 1806.)

3111. FOX (Charles James), Statesmanship.—His sound judgment saw that political interest could never be separated in the long run from moral right, and his frank and great mind would have made a short business of a just treaty with you.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 477. (W., Oct. 1806.)

3112. FRANCE, Affection for.—It is very much our interest to keep up the affection of this country [France] for us, which is considerable.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 346. FORD ED., iv, 50. (P., 1785.)

3113. ——. A sincere affection between the two peoples is the broadest basis on which their peace can be built.—To COMTE DE VERGENNES. i, 456. (P., 1785.)

3114. ——. Nobody [is] more sensible than you are of the motives, both moral and political, which should induce us to bind the two countries together by as many ties as possible of interest and affection.—To DR. RAMSAY. ii, 49. (P., 1786.)

3115. ——. I am happy in concurring with you * * * in the sentiment, that as the principles of our governments become more congenial, the links of affection are multiplied between us. It is impossible that they should multiply beyond our wishes.—To J. B. TERNANT. iii, 516. FORD ED., vi, 189. (Pa., 1793.)

3116. ——. Mutual good offices, mutual affection, and similar principles of government seem to destine the two nations for the most intimate communion.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 522. FORD ED., vi, 200. (Pa., 1793.) See PEOPLE (FRENCH).

3117. FRANCE, Affronted by Adams.—Mr. Adams's speech to Congress in May [1798] is deemed such a national affront, that no explanation on other topics can be entered on till that, as a preliminary, is wiped away by humiliating disavowals or acknowledgments. This working hard with our Envoys, and indeed seeming impracticable for want of that sort of authority, submission to a heavy amercement (upwards of a million sterling) was, * * *, suggested as an alternative, which might be admitted if proposed by us. These overtures had been through informal agents; and both the alternatives bringing the Envoys to their ne plus, they resolve to have no more communication through unofficial characters, but to address a letter directly to the government, to bring forward their pretensions.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 232. FORD ED., vii, 234. (Pa., April 1798.) See X. Y. Z. PLOT.

3118. FRANCE, The Allied Powers and.—The sufferings of France. I sincerely deplore, and what is to be their term? The will of the Allies. There is no more moderation, forbearance, or even honesty in theirs, than in that of Bonaparte. They have proved that their object, like his, is plunder. They, like him, are shuffling nations together, or into their own hands, as if all were right which they feel a power to do. In the exhausted state in which Bonaparte has left France, I see no period to her sufferings, until this combination of robbers fall together by the ears. The French may then rise up and choose their side. And I trust they will finally establish for themselves a government of rational and well-tempered liberty. So much science cannot be lost; so much light shed over them can never fail to produce to them some good, in the end.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 500. (M., Oct. 1815.)

3119. FRANCE, American politics and.—It is still a comfort to see by the address of Dumouriez * * *, that the constitution of 1791 is the worst thing which is to be forced on the French. But even the falling back to that would give wonderful vigor to our monocrats, and unquestionably affect the tone of administering our government. Indeed, I fear that if this summer should prove disastrous to the French, it will damp that energy of republicanism in our new Congress, from which I had hoped so much reformation.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 571. (Pa., June 1793.)

3120. FRANCE, Attraction of.—France, freed from that monster, Bonaparte, must again become the most agreeable country on earth. It would be the second choice of all whose ties of family and fortune give a preference to some other one, and the first choice of all not under those ties.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 402. (M., 1814.)

— FRANCE, Bill of Rights for.—See BILL OF RIGHTS (FRENCH).

— FRANCE, Bonaparte and.—See BONAPARTE.

3121. FRANCE, Cabinet of Washington and.—The doubts I entertained that the offers of the French republic would be declined, will pretty certainly be realized. One person [Hamilton] represents them as a snare into which he hopes we shall not fall. His second [Knox] is of the same sentiment of course. He [Randolph] whose vote for the most part, or say always, is casting, has by two or three private conversations or rather disputes with me, shown his opinion to be against doing what would be a mark of predilection to one of the parties, though not a breach of neutrality in form. And an opinion of still more importance is still in the same way. I do not know what line will be adopted, but probably a procrastination, which will be immediately seen through.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 268. (Pa., May 1793.) See NEUTRALITY.

— FRANCE, Cherbourg.—See CHERBOURG.

3122. FRANCE, Commerce with.—The mutual extension of their commerce was among the fairest advantages to be derived to France and the United States, from the independence of the latter. An exportation of eighty millions, chiefly in raw materials, is supposed to constitute the present limits of the commerce of the United States with the nations of Europe; limits, however, which extend as their population increases. To draw the best proportion of this into the ports of France, rather than of any other nation, is believed to be the wish and interest of both.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 186. (P., 1787.)

3123. — —. The French [in their recent treaty with England] have clearly reserved a right of favoring, specially, any nation not European; and there is no nation out of Europe, who could so probably have been in their eye at that time, as ours. They are wise. They must see it probable at least, that any concert with England, will be but of short duration; and they could hardly propose to sacrifice for that, a connection with us, which may be perpetual.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 112. (P., 1787.)

3124. — —. The system of the United States is to use neither prohibitions nor premiums. Where a government finds itself under the necessity of undertaking that regulation, it would seem that it should conduct it as an intelligent merchant would; that is to say, invite customers to purchase by facilitating their means of payment, and by adapting goods to their taste. If this idea be just, government here [France] has two operations to attend to with respect to the commerce of the United States: 1. to do away, or to moderate, as much as possible, the prohibitions and monopolies of their materials for payment; 2. to encourage the institution of the principal manufactures, which the necessities or the habits of their customers call for.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 529. (P., 1788.)

3125. — —. I am happy to learn that the [people of Alexandria, Va.] have felt a benefit from the encouragements to our commerce, which have been given by an allied nation. But truth and candor oblige me. at the same time, to declare you are indebted for these encouragements solely to the friendly dispositions of that nation, which has shown itself ready on every occasion to adopt all arrangements which might strengthen our ties of mutual interest and friendship.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iii, 127. FORD ED., v, 146. (1790.)

3126. — —. With respect to the reformation of the unfriendly restrictions on our commerce and navigation, we cannot be too pressing for its attainment, as every day's continuance gives it additional firmness, and endangers its taking root in their habits and constitution. Indeed, I think the French government should be told, that as soon as they are in a condition to act, if they do not revoke the late innovations, we must lay additional and equivalent burthens on French Ships, by name.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 489. FORD ED., vi, 131. (Nov. 1792.)

3127. — —. I cannot too much press it on you, to improve every opportunity * * * for placing our commerce with France and its dependencies, on the freest and most encouraging footing possible.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 522. FORD ED., vi, 200. (Pa., 1793.)

3128. — —. I was a sincere well-wisher to the success of the French Revolution, * * * but I have not been insensible under the atrocious depredations they have committed on our commerce.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 269. FORD ED., vii, 329. (Pa., 1799.)

3129. — —. [In the negotiation of commercial treaties with France] I must say, in justice, that I found the government entirely disposed to befriend us on all occasions, and to yield us every indulgence not absolutely injurious to themselves.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 64. FORD ED., i, 90. (1821.) See TREATIES.

3130. FRANCE, The Consulate.—They have established Bonaparte, Sieyès, and Ducós into an executive, or rather Dictatorial Consulate, [and] given them a committee of between twenty and thirty from each council. Thus the Constitution of the Third year, which was getting consistency and firmness from time, is demolished in an instant, and nothing is said about a new one. How the nation will bear it is yet unknown.—To JOHN BRECKENRIDGE. FORD ED., vii, 417. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

— FRANCE, Consuls of.—See CONSULS.

3131. FRANCE, Debt to.—Besides endeavoring on all occasions to multiply the points of contact and connection with France, * * * I have had it much at heart to remove from between us every subject of misunderstanding or irritation. Our debts to the King, to the Officers, to the Farmers, are of this description. The having complied with no part of our engagements in these, draws on us a great deal of censure, and occasioned a language in the Assemblée des Notables very likely to produce dissatisfaction between us.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 163. FORD ED., iv, 398. (P., 1787.)

3132. ——. I told [President Washington] I had meant on that day to take his orders for removing the suspension of payments to France, which had been imposed by my last letter to Gouverneur Morris, but was meant, as I supposed, only for the interval between the abolition of the late constitution by the dethronement of the King, and the meeting of some other body, invested by the will of the nation with powers to transact their affairs; that I considered the National Convention, then assembled, as such a body; and that, therefore, we ought to go on with the payments to them, or to any government they should establish.*—THE ANAS. ix, 128. FORD ED., i, 213. (Dec. 27, 1792.) See DEBTS (FRENCH).

3133. FRANCE, Den of Robbers.—As for France and England, with all their pre-eminence in science, the one is a den of robbers, and the other of pirates.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 37. FORD ED., ix, 333. (M., 1812.)

— FRANCE, Directory.—See EXECUTIVES.

3135. FRANCE, Federalist Hostility to.—Nothing less than the miraculous string of events which have taken place, to wit, the victories of the Rhine and Italy, peace with Austria, bankruptcy of England, mutiny in her fleet, and King's writing letters recommending peace, could have cooled the fury of the British faction. Even that will not

* There had been a consultation at the President's (about the first week in November) on the expediency of suspending payments to France under her present situation. I had admitted that the late constitution was dissolved by the dethronement of the King; and the management of affairs surviving to the National Assembly only, this was not an integral legislature, and, therefore, not competent to give a legitimate discharge for our payments: that I thought, consequently, that none should be made till some legitimate body came into place, and that I should consider the National Convention called, but not met as we had yet heard, to be a legitimate body. Hamilton doubted whether it would be a legitimate body, and whether, if the King should be reestablished, he might not disallow such payments on good grounds. Knox, for once, dared to differ from Hamilton, and to express, very submissively, an opinion that a convention named by the whole body of the nation, would be competent to do anything. It ended by agreeing that I should write to Gouverneur Morris, to suspend payment generally, till further orders.—NOTE BY JEFFERSON. ix, 128. FORD ED., i, 208. (1792.) prevent considerable efforts still in both Houses to show our teeth to France.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 143. (Pa., June 1797.)

3137. ——. The threatening propositions founded in the address [of Congress to the President], are abandoned one by one, and the cry begins now to be that we have been called together to do nothing. The truth is, there is nothing to do, the idea of war being scouted by the events of Europe; but this only proves that war was the object for which we were called. It proves that the Executive temper was for war; and that the convocation of the Representatives was an experiment of the temper of the nation, to see if it was in unison. Efforts at negotiation indeed were promised; but such a promise was as difficult to withhold, as easy to render nugatory. If negotiation alone had been meant, that might have been pursued without so much delay, and without calling the Representatives; and if strong and earnest negotiation had been meant, the additional nomination would have been of persons strongly and earnestly attached to the alliance of 1778. War then was intended.—To AARON BURR. iv, 185. FORD ED., vii, 146. (Pa., June 1797.)

3138. ——. President [Adams] has appointed, and the Senate approved Rufus King, to enter into a treaty of commerce with the Russians, at London, and William Smith (Phocian) Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to go to Constantinople to make one with the Turks. So that as soon as there is a coalition of Turks, Russians and English, against France, we seize that moment to countenance it as openly as we dare by treaties, which we never had with them before. All this helps to fill up the measure of provocation towards France, and to get from them a declaration of war, which we are afraid to be the first in making.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 289. FORD ED., vii, 358. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

— FRANCE, Free Ports.—See FREE PORTS.

3139. FRANCE, Friendship.—I cannot pretend to affirm that this country will stand by us on every just occasion, but I am sure, if this will not, there is no other that will.—To DR. RAMSAY. ii, 49. (P., 1786.)

* President Adams's message to Congress at the special session in May 1797.—EDITOR.

3140. ———. Nothing should be spared on our part to attach this country to us. It is the only one on which we can rely for support under every event. Its inhabitants love us more. I think, than they do any other nation on earth. This is very much the effect of the good dispositions with which the French officers returned.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 109. FORD ED., iv, 367. (P., 1787.)

3141. ———. I consider France as our surest mainstay under every event.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 163. FORD ED., iv, 398. (P., 1787.)

3142. ———. Among the circumstances which will reconcile me to my new position [Secretary of State] the most powerful are the opportunities it will give me of cementing the friendship between our two nations.—To LA DUCHESSE D'AVUILLE. iii, 135. FORD ED., iii, 153. (N.Y., 1790.)

3143. ———. May this union of interests forever be the patriot's creed in both countries.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. iii, 137. (M., 1790.)

3144. ———. There is a fund of friendship and attachment between the mass of the two nations * * *. The present administration of this country have these feelings of their constituents, and will be true to them. We shall act steadily on the desire of cementing our interests and affections; and of this you cannot go too far in assuring them.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. FORD ED., viii, 138. (W., March 1802.)

— FRANCE, Genet.—See GENET.

3145. FRANCE, Government.—France is the wealthiest but worst governed country on earth.—To JOSEPH JONES. i, 353. (P., 1785.) See GOVERNMENT (FRENCH) and GOVERNMENT (RECOGNITION).

3146. FRANCE, Gratitude to.—Every American owes her gratitude, as our sole ally during the war of Independence.—To M. DE NEUVILLE. vii, 110. (M., 1818.)

3147. FRANCE, Honesty of.—A wise man, if nature has not formed him honest, will yet act as if he were honest; because he will find it the most advantageous and wise part in the long run. I have believed that this Court possesses this high species of wisdom even if its new faith be ostensible only. If they trip on any occasion it will be warning to us. I do not expect they will, but it is our business to be on the watch.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 40. (P., 1785.)

3148. ———. There are great numbers of well enlightened men in this nation. The ministry is such. The King has an honest heart. The line of policy hitherto pursued by them has been such as virtue would dictate and wisdom approve. Relying on their wisdom only, I think they would not accept the bribe suppose it would be to relinquish that honorable character of disinterestedness and new faith which they have acquired by many sacrifices and which has put in their hands the government, as it were, of Europe.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 39. (P., 1785.)

3149. FRANCE, Influence of.—This summer is of immense importance to the future condition of mankind all over the earth, and not a little so to ours. For though its issue should not be marked by any direct change in our Constitution, it will influence the tone and principles of its administration so as to lead it to something very different in the one event from what it would be in the other.—To H. INNES. FORD ED., vi, 266. (Pa., May 1793.)

3150. FRANCE, Injuries by.—Nobody denies but that France has given just cause of war, but so has Great Britain, and she is now capturing our vessels as much as France, but the question was one merely of prudence, whether seeing that both powers in order to injure one another, bear down everything in their way, without regard to the rights of others, spoliating equally Danes, Swedes and Americans, it would not be more prudent in us to bear with it as the Danes and Swedes do, curtailing our commerce, and waiting for the moment of peace, when it is probable both nations would for their own interest and honor retribute for their wrongs.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. FORD ED., vii, 270. (Pa., June 1798.)

— FRANCE, Louisiana Purchase.—See LOUISIANA.

3151. FRANCE, Manufactures of.—It is the interest of France as well as our interest to multiply the means of payment [for her manufactures]. These must be found in the catalogue of our exports, and among these will be seen neither gold nor silver. We have no mines of either of these metals. Produce, therefore, is all we can offer. Some articles of our produce will be found very convenient to France for her own consumption. Others will be convenient, as being more commerciable in her hands than those she will give in exchange for them.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. i, 596. FORD ED., iv, 256. (P., 1786.)

3152. ———. A century's experience has shown that we double our numbers every twenty or twenty-five years. No circumstance can be foreseen at this moment, which will lessen our rate of multiplication for centuries to come. For every article of the productions and manufactures of France, then, which can be introduced into the habit there, the demand will double every twenty or twenty-five years. And to introduce the habit, we have only to let the merchants alone.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 190. (1787.) See MANUFACTURES.

3153. FRANCE, Murray's Mission.—

The President [John Adams] nominated to the Senate yesterday William Vans Murray, Minister Plenipotentiary to the French Republic, and added, that he shall be instructed not to go to France, without direct and unequivocal assurances from the French government that he shall be received in character, enjoy the due privileges, and a minister of equal rank, title and power, be appointed to discuss and conclude our controversy by a new treaty. This had evidently been kept secret from the federalists of both Houses, as appeared by their dismay. The Senate have passed over this day without taking it up. It is said they are gravelled and divided; some are for opposing, others do not know what to do. But, in the meantime, they have been permitted to go on with all the measures of war and patronage, and when the close of the session is at hand, it is made known. However, it silences all arguments against the sincerity of France, and renders desperate every further effort towards war.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 292. FORD ED., vii, 362. (Pa., Feb. 19, 1799.)

3154. ———. We were for a moment flattered with the hope of a friendly accommodation of our differences with France, by the President's nomination of Mr. Murray, our Minister at the Hague, to proceed to Paris for that purpose. But our hopes have been entirely dashed by his revoking that, and naming Mr. Ellsworth, Mr. Patrick Henry and Murray. * * * The effect of the new nomination is completely to parry the advances made by France towards a reconciliation.—To BISHOP JAMES MADISON. iv, 299. FORD ED., vii, 372. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

3155. ———. The face the federalists will put on this business is that they have frightened France into a respectful treatment. Whereas, in truth, France has been sensible that her measures to prevent the scandalous spectacle of war between the two republics, from the known impossibility of our injuring her, would not be imputed to her as a humiliation.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 294. FORD ED., vii, 365. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

— FRANCE, Navigation and.— See NAVIGATION.

3156. FRANCE, Neutral rights and.— The French have behaved atrociously towards neutral nations, and us particularly; and though we might be disposed not to charge them with all the enormities committed in their name in the West Indies, yet they are to be blamed for not doing more to prevent them. A just and rational censure ought to be expressed on them, while we disapprove the constant billingsgate poured on them officially.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 289. FORD ED., vii, 358. (Pa., Feb. 1799.) See NEUTRALITY.

3157. ———. You have seen that the French Directory had published an arret declaring they would treat as pirates any neutrals they should take in the ships of their enemies. The President [Adams] communicated this to Congress as soon as he received it. A bill was brought into the Senate reciting that arret, and authorizing retaliation. The President received information almost the same instant that the Directory had suspended the arret (which fact was privately declared by the Secretary of State to two of the Senate), and, though it was known we were passing an act founded on that arret, yet the President has never communicated the suspension.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iv, 286. FORD ED., vii, 353. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

3158. FRANCE, Peace with.— It was with infinite joy to me, that you [Elbridge Gerry] were yesterday announced to the Senate, as Envoy Extraordinary, jointly with General [Charles Cotesworth] Pinckney and Mr. [John] Marshall, to the French Republic. It gave me certain assurance that there would be a preponderance in the mission, sincerely disposed to be at peace with the French government and nation. Peace is undoubtedly at present the first object of our nation. Interest and honor are also national considerations. But interest, duly weighed, is in favor of peace even at the expense of spoiliations past and future; and honor cannot now be an object. The insults and injuries committed on us by both the belligerent parties, from the beginning of 1793 to this day, and still continuing, cannot now be wiped off by engaging in war with one of them. As there is great reason to expect this is the last campaign in Europe, it would certainly be better for us to rub through this year, as we have done through the four preceding ones, and hope that on the restoration of peace, we may be able to establish some plan for our foreign connections more likely to secure our peace, interest and honor in future. Our countrymen have divided themselves by such strong affections, to the French and the English, that nothing will secure us internally but a divorce from both nations; and this must be the object of every real American, and its attainment is practicable without much self-denial. But for this, peace is necessary. Be assured of this that if we engage in a war during our present passions, and our present weakness in some quarters, our Union runs the greatest risk of not coming out of that war in the shape in which it enters it. My reliance for our preservation is in your acceptance of this mission. I know the tender circumstances which will oppose themselves to it. But its duration will be short, and its reward long. You have it in your power, by accepting and determining the character of the mission, to secure the present peace and eternal union of your country. If you decline, on motives of private pain, a substitute may be named who has enlisted his passions in the present contest, and by the preponderance of his vote in the mission may entail on us calamities, your share in which, and your feelings, will far outweigh whatever pain a temporary absence from your family could give you. The sacrifice will be short, the remorse would be never-ending. Let me, then, conjure your acceptance, and that you will, by this act, seal the mission with the confidence of all parties. Your nomination has given a spring to hope, which was dead before.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 187. FORD ED., vii, 149. (Pa., June 21, 1797.)

3159. ——. I know that both France and England have given, and are daily giving, sufficient cause of war; that in defiance of the laws of nations, they are every day trampling on the rights of the neutral powers, whenever they can thereby do the least injury, either to the other. But as I view a peace between France and England the ensuing winter to be certain, I have thought it would have been better for us to continue to bear from France through the present summer, what we have been bearing both from her and England these four years, and still continue to bear from England, and to have required indemnification in the hour of peace, when I verily believe it would have been yielded by both. This seems to have been the plan of the other neutral nations; and whether this, or the commencing war on one of them, as we have done, would have been wiser, time and events must decide.—To SAMUEL SMITH. iv, 254. FORD ED., vii, 277. (M., Aug. 1798.)

3160. ——. All which the advocates of peace can now attempt, is to prevent war measures externally, consenting to every rational measure of internal defence and preparation. Great expenses will be incurred; and it will be left to those whose measures render them necessary, to provide to meet them.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 234. FORD ED., vii, 237. (Pa., April 1798.)

3161. ——. I have not been insensible under the atrocious depredations they [the French] have committed on our commerce. * * * But though deeply feeling the injuries of France, I did not think war the surest means of redressing them. I did believe, that a mission sincerely disposed to preserve peace, would obtain for us a peaceable and honorable settlement and restitution; and I appeal to you to say, whether this might not have been obtained, if either of your colleagues had been of the same sentiment with yourself.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 269. FORD ED., vii, 329. (P., 1799.)

3162. ——. The people now see that France has sincerely wished peace, and their seducers [federalists] have wished war, as well for the loaves and fishes which arise out of war expenses, as for the chance of changing the Constitution, while the people should have time to contemplate nothing but the levies of men and money.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 300. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., 1799.)

— FRANCE, People of.—See PEOPLE.

3163. FRANCE, Policy towards.—We stand completely corrected of the error, that either the government or the nation of France has any remains of friendship for us. The oration of that country which forms an exception, though respectable in weight, is weak in numbers. On the contrary, it appears evident, that an unfriendly spirit prevails in the most important individuals of the government, towards us. In this state of things, we shall so take our distance between the two rival nations, as, remaining disengaged till necessity compels us, we may haul finally to the enemy of that which shall make it necessary. We see all the disadvantageous consequences of taking a side, and shall be forced into it only by a more disagreeable alternative; in which event, we must counter-vail the disadvantages by measures which will give us splendor and power, but not as much happiness as our present system. We wish, therefore, to remain well with France. But we see that no consequences, however ruinous to them, can secure us with certainty against the extravagance of her present rulers. I think, therefore, that while we do nothing which the first nation on earth would deem crouching, we had better give to all our communications with them a very mild, complaisant, and even friendly complexion, but always independent. Ask no favors, leave small and irritating things to be conducted by the individuals interested in them, interfere ourselves but in the greatest cases, and then not push them to irritation. No matter at present existing between them and us is important enough to risk a breach of peace; peace being indeed the most important of all things for us, except the preserving an erect and independent attitude.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 448. FORD ED., viii, 173. (W., Oct. 1802.)

— FRANCE, Privateers of.—See PRIVATEERS.

3164. FRANCE, Punishment of.—She deserves much punishment, and her successes and reverses will be a wholesome lesson to the world hereafter; but she has now had enough, and we may lawfully pray for her resurrection, and I am confident the day is not distant. No one who knows that people, and the elasticity of their character, can believe they will long remain crouched on the earth as at present. They will rise by acclamation, and woe to their riders. What havoc are we not yet to see!—To MRS. TRIST. D. L. J. 363. (P.F., April 1816.)

3165. FRANCE, Reconciliation overtures.—The event of events was announced in the Senate yesterday. It is this: It seems that soon after Gerry's departure, overtures must have been made by Pichon, French Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague, to Murray. They were so soon matured, that on the 28th of September, 1798, Talleyrand writes to Pichon, approving what had been done, and particularly of his having assured Murray that whatever Plenipotentiary the government of the United States should send to France to end our differences would undoubtedly be received with the respect due to the representative of a free, independent and powerful nation; declaring that the President's instructions to his envoys at Paris, if they contain the whole of the American government's intentions, announce dispositions which have been always entertained by the Directory; and desiring him to communicate these expressions to Murray, in order to convince him of the sincerity of the French government, and to prevail on him to transmit them to his government. This is dated September the 28th. and may have been received by Pichon October 1st: and nearly five months elapse before it is communicated.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 292. FORD ED., vii, 362. (Pa., Feb. 19 1799.)

3166. ——. Mr. Gerry's communications, with other information, prove * * * that France is sincere in her wishes for reconciliation; and a recent proposition from that country, through Mr. Murray, puts the matter out of doubt.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 294. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

3168. FRANCE, Reliance on.—President Washington observed [that] there was no nation on whom we could rely, at all times, but France; and that, if we did not prepare in time some support, in the event of rupture with Spain and England, we might be charged with a criminal negligence. I was much pleased with the tone of these observations. It was the very doctrine which had been my polar star, and I did not need the successes of the republican arms in France, lately announced to us, to bring me to these sentiments * * * I, therefore, expressed to the President my cordial approbation of these ideas.—ANAS. ix, 128. FORD ED., i, 212. (December 1792.)

3169. FRANCE, Republican Government.—I look with great anxiety for the firm establishment of the new government in France, being perfectly convinced that if it takes place there, it will spread sooner or later all over Europe. On the contrary, a check there would retard the revival of liberty in other countries.—To GEORGE MASON. iii, 209. FORD ED., v, 274. (Pa., 1791.)

3170. ——. With respect to the French government, we are under no call to express opinions which might please or offend any party, and, therefore, it will be best to avoid them on all occasions, public or private. Could any circumstances require unavoidably such expressions, they would naturally be in conformity with the great mass of our countrymen, who, having first in modern times, taken the ground of government founded on the will of the people, cannot but be delighted on seeing so distinguished and so esteemed a nation arrive on the same ground, and plant their standard by our side.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 325. FORD ED., v, 428. (Pa., Jan. 1792.)

3172. ——. You express a wish in your letter to be generally advised as to the tenor of your conduct, in consequence of the late revolution in France, the questions relative to which, you observe, incidentally present themselves to you. It is impossible to foresee the particular circumstances which may require you to decide and act on that question. But, principles being understood, their application will be less embarrassing. We certainly cannot deny to other nations that principle whereon our government is founded, that every nation has a right to govern itself internally under what form it pleases, and to change these forms at its own will; and, externally, to transact business with other nations through whatever organ it chooses, whether that be a King, Convention, Assembly, Committee, President, or whatever it be. The only thing essential is the will of the nation. Taking this as your polar star, you can hardly err.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 500. (Pa., Dec. 1792.)

3173. FRANCE, Republic recognized.—I have laid before the President of the United States your notification of the 17th instant, in the name of the Provisory Executive Council, charged with the administration of your Government, that the French nation has constituted itself into a Republic. The President receives, with great satisfaction, this attention of the Executive Council and the desire they have manifested of making known to us the resolution entered into by the National Convention, even before a definitive regulation of their new establishment could take place. Be assured, Sir, that the Government and the citizens of the United States view with the most sincere pleasure every advance of your nation towards its happiness, an object essentially connected with its liberty, and they consider the union of principles and pursuits between our two countries as a link which binds still closer their interests and affections. The genuine and general effusions of joy which you saw overspread our country on their seeing the liberties of yours rise superior to foreign invasion and domestic trouble, have proved to you that our sympathies are great and sincere, and we earnestly wish on our part that these, our mutual dispositions, may be improved to mutual good, by establishing our commercial intercourse on principles as friendly to natural right and freedom as are those of our Government.—To J. B. TERNANT. iii, 518. FORD ED., vi, 189. (Pa., Feb. 23, 1793.)

3174. FRANCE, Restoration of.—It is impossible that France should rest under her present oppressions and humiliations. She will rise in that gigantic strength which cannot be annihilated, and will fatten her fields with the blood of her enemies. I only wish she may exercise patience and forbearance until divisions among [the Allies] may give her a choice of sides.—To M. DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 508. (M., 1815.)

3175. ——. France is too highminded, has too much innate force, intelligence and elasticity, to remain under its present compression. Samson will arise in his strength. as of old, and as of old, will burst asunder the withes and the cords, and the webs of the Philistines. But what are to be the scenes of havoc and horror, and how widely they may spread between brethren of the same house, our ignorance of the interior feuds and antipathies of the country places beyond our ken. It will end, nevertheless, in a representative government, in a government in which the will of the people will be an effective ingredient.—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 520. FORD ED., x, 8. (M., 1816.)

3176. ——. In the desolation of Europe, to gratify the atrocious caprices of Bonaparte, France sinned much; but she has suffered more than retaliation. Once relieved from the incubus of her late oppression, she will rise like a giant from her slumbers. Her soil and climate, her arts and eminent sciences, her central position and free constitution, will soon make her greater than she ever was.—To M. DE NEUVILLE. vii, 109. (M., 1818.)

— FRANCE, Revolution.—See REVOLUTION (FRENCH).

3177. FRANCE, Self-Government in.—What government France can bear, depends not on the state of science, however exalted, in a select band of enlightened men, but on the condition of the general mind. * * * The last change of government was fortunate. inasmuch as the new will be less obstructive to the effects of that advancement.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 66. FORD ED., x, 82. (M., 1817.)

3178. ——. Whether the state of society in Europe can bear a republican government, I doubted. you know, when with you, and I do now. A hereditary chief, strictly limited, the right of war vested in the legislative body, a rigid economy of the public contributions, and absolute interdiction of all useless expenses. will go far towards keeping the government honest and unoppressive.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.)

3179. FRANCE, Strength.—As long as the French can be tolerably unanimous internally. they can resist the whole world. The laws of nature render a large country unconquerable if they adhere firmly together, and to their purpose.—To H. INNES. FORD ED., vi, 266. (Pa., 1793.)

3180. FRANCE, Sufferings of.—I grieve for France; although it cannot be denied that the afflictions with which she wantonly and wickedly overwhelmed other nations, she has merited severe reprisals. For it is no excuse to lay the enormities to the wretch who led to them.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 499. (M., Oct. 1815.)

3181. FRANCE, Supplies to St. Domingo.—[Alexander] Hamilton called on me to speak about our furnishing supplies to the French colony of St. Domingo. He expressed his opinion, that we ought to be cautious, and not to go too far in our application of money to their use, lest it should not be recognized by the mother country. He did not even think that some kinds of government they might establish could give a sufficient sanction. I observed that the National Convention was now met, and would certainly establish a form of government; that as we had recognized the former government because established by the authority of the nation, so we must recognize any other which should be established by the authority of the nation. He said had recognized the former, because it contained an important member of the ancient to wit; the King, and wore the appearance of his consent; but if, in any future form, they should omit the King, he did not know that we could with safety recognize it, or pay money to its order.—THE ANAS. ix, 125. FORD ED., i, 208. (Nov. 1792.)

3182. FRANCE, Sympathy with.—The yeomanry of the city (not the fashionable people nor paper men), showed prodigious joy when, flocking to the wharves, they saw the British colors reversed, and the French flying above them.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi, 241. (Pa., 1793.)

3183. ——. The [French forces] have lately sustained some severe checks. * * * Their defeats are as sensibly felt at Philadelphia as at Paris, and I foresee we are to have a trying campaign of it.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 549. FORD ED., vi, 240. (Pa., May 1793.)

3185. FRANCE, United States, England and.—Our interest calls for a perfect equality in our conduct towards these two nations [France and England]; but no preference anywhere. If, however, circumstances should ever oblige us to show a preference, a respect for our character, if we had no better motive, would decide to which it should be given.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 436. (P., 1785.)

3186. ——. When of two nations, the one has engaged herself in a ruinous war for us, has spent her blood and money to save us, has opened her bosom to us in peace, and received us almost on the footing of her own citizens, while the other has moved heaven, earth, and hell to exterminate us in war, has insulted us in all her councils in peace, shut her doors to us in every port where her interests would admit it, labelled us in foreign nations, endeavored to poison them against the reception of our most precious commodities; to place these two nations on a footing, is to give a great deal more to one than to the other, if the maxim be true, that to make unequal quantities equal, you must add more to one than the other. To say, in excuse, that gratitude is never to enter into the motives of national conduct, is to revive a principle which has been buried for centuries with its kindred principles of the lawfulness of assassination, poison, perjury, &c. All of these were legitimate principles in the dark ages, which intervened between ancient and modern civilization, but exploded and held in just horror in the eighteenth century. I know but one code of morality for men, whether acting singly or collectively. He who says I will be a rogue when I act in company with a hundred others, but an honest man when I act alone, will be believed in the former assertion, but not in the latter. I would say with the poet "hic niger est, hunc tu Romane caveto." If the morality of one man produces a just line of conduct in him, acting individually, why should not the morality of one hundred men produce a just line of conduct in them, acting together? But I indulge myself in these reflections, because my own feelings run me into them; with you they were always acknowledged. Let us hope that our new government will take some other occasions to show that they mean to proscribe no virtue from the canons of their conduct with other nations. In every other instance, the new government has ushered itself to the world as honest, masculine, and dignified.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 99. FORD ED., v, 111. (P., Aug. 1789.)

3187. FRANCE, War with England.—How the mighty duel is to end between Great Britain and France, is a momentous question. The sea which divides them makes it a game of chance; but it is narrow, and all the chances are not on one side. Should they make peace, still our fate is problematical.—To HORATIO GATES. iv, 213. FORD ED., vii, 204. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

3188. FRANKING PRIVILEGE, Jefferson and.—The law making my letters post free goes to those to me only, not those from me. The bill had got to its passage before this war was observed. * * * As the privilege of freedom was given to the letters from as well as to both my predecessors, I suppose no reason exists for making a distinction. And in so extensive a correspondence as I am subject to, and still considerably on public matters, it would be a sensible convenience to myself, as well as to those who have occasion to receive letters from me. * * * I state this matter to you as being my representative, which must apologize for the trouble of it.—To W. C. NICHOLAS. v, 454. FORD ED., ix, 254. (M., 1809.)

3189. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), America's Ornament.—The ornament of our country and, I may say, of the world.—To M. GRAND. iii, 140. (N.Y., 1790.)

3191. ——. America's Reception of.—At a large table where I dined the other day, a gentleman from Switzerland expressed his apprehensions for the fate of Dr. Franklin, as he said he had been informed that he would be received with stones by the people, who were generally dissatisfied with the Revolution, and incensed against all those who had assisted in bringing it about. I told him his apprehensions were just, and that the people of America would probably salute Dr. Franklin with the same stones they had thrown at the Marquis Lafayette. The reception of the Doctor is an object of very general attention, and will weigh in Europe as an evidence of the satisfaction or dissatisfaction of America with their Revolution. To JAMES MONROE. i, 407. FORD ED., iv, 87. (P., 1785.)

3192. ——. Europe fixes an attentive eye on your reception of Doctor Franklin. He is infinitely esteemed. Do not neglect any mark of your approbation which you think * * * proper. It will honor you here.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 65. (P., 1785.)

3193. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Argand's lamp.—A little before my arrival in France, Argand had invented his celebrated lamp, in which the flame is spread into a hollow cylinder, and thus brought into contact with the air within as well as without. Dr. Franklin had been on the point of the same discovery. The idea had occurred to him; but he had tried a bulrush as a wick, which did not succeed. His occupations did not permit him to repeat and extend his trials to the introduction of a larger column of air than could pass through the stem of a bulrush.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 213. FORD ED., v, 291. (Pa., 1791.)

3194. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Beloved.—The venerable and beloved Franklin.—i, 108. FORD ED., i, 150. (1821.)

3195. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Defence of.—I have seen, with extreme indignation, the blasphemies lately vended against the memory of the father of American philosophy.—To JONATHAN WILLIAMS. iv, 147. FORD ED., vii, 87. (M., 1796.)

3196. ——. As to the charge of subservience to France, besides the evidence of his friendly colleagues [Silas Deane and Mr. Laurens], two years of my own service with him at Paris, daily visits, and the most friendly and confidential conversation convince me it had not a shadow of foundation.—To ROBERT WALSH. vii, 109. FORD ED., x, 117. (M., 1818.)

3197. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Diplomatic methods.—He possessed the confidence of the French government in the highest degree, insomuch, that it may truly be said, that they were more under his influence, than he under theirs. The fact is, that his temper was so amiable and conciliatory, his conduct so rational, never urging impossibilities, or even things unreasonably inconvenient to them, in short, so moderate and attentive to their difficulties, as well as our own, that what his enemies called subserviency, I saw was only that reasonable disposition, which, sensible that advantages are not all to be on one side, yielding what is just and liberal, is the more certain of obtaining liberality and justice. Mutual confidence produces, of course, mutual influence, and this was all which subsisted between Dr. Franklin and the government of France.—To ROBERT WALSH. vii, 109. FORD ED., x, 117. (M., 1818.)

3198. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Discoveries of.—In physics we have produced a Franklin, than whom no one of the present age has made more important discoveries, nor has enriched philosophy with more, or more ingenious solutions of the phenomena of nature.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 313. FORD ED., iii, 168. (1782.)

3199. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Enduring fame.—Time will be making him greater while it is spurning us from its records.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 214. FORD ED., v, 293. (Pa., 1791.)

3200. — — — His memory will be preserved and venerated as long as the thunder of heaven shall be heard or feared.—To JONATHAN EDWARDS. iv, 148. FORD ED., vii, 87. (M., 1796.)

3201. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), French admiration.—No greater proof of his estimation in France can be given than the late letters of condolence on his death, from the National Assembly of that country, and the community of Paris, to the President of the United States and to Congress, and their public mourning on that event. It is, I believe, the first instance of that homage having been paid by a public body of one nation to a private citizen of another.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 213. FORD ED., v, 292. (Pa., 1791.)

3202. — — — I have it in charge from the President * * * to communicate to the National Assembly * * * the peculiar sensibility of Congress to the tribute paid to the memory of Benjamin Franklin. * * * That the loss of such a citizen should be lamented by us, among whom he lived, whom he so long and eminently served, and who feel their country advanced and honored by his birth, life and labors, was to be expected. But it remained for the National Assembly of France, to set the first example of the representative of one nation, doing homage, by a public act, to the private citizen of another, and by withdrawing arbitrary lines of separation, to reduce into one fraternity the good and the great, wherever they have lived or died. That these separations may disappear between us in all times and circumstances, and that the union of sentiment which mingles our sorrows on this occasion may continue long to cement the friendships of our two nations, is our constant prayer.—To THE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY. iii, 218. (Pa., 1791.)

3203. — — — When he left Passy* [for America], it seemed as if the village had lost its patriarch. On taking leave of the court, which he did by letter, the King ordered him to be handsomely complimented, and furnished him with a litter and mules of his own, the only kind of conveyance the state of his health could bear.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 213. FORD ED., v, 292. (Pa., 1791.)

3204. — — — There appeared to me more respect and veneration attached to the character of Dr. Franklin in France, than to that of any other person in the same country, foreign or native.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 212. FORD ED., v, 213. (Pa., 1791.)

3205. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Greatness of.—The succession to Doctor Franklin, at the court of France, was an excellent school of humility. On being presented to any one as the minister of America, the commonplace question used in such cases was "c'est vous. Monsieur, qui remplace le Docteur Franklin" ? "It is you, sir, who replace Doctor Franklin" ? I generally answered, "no one can replace him, sir; I am only his successor".—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 213. FORD ED., v, 293. (Pa., 1791.)

3206. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Longevity.—His death was an affliction which was to happen to us at some time or other. We have reason to be thankful he was so long spared; that the most useful life should be the longest also; that it was protracted so far beyond the ordinary span allotted to man, as to avail us of his wisdom in the establishment of our own freedom, and to bless him with a view of its dawn in the East, where they seemed, till now, to have learned everything, but how to be free.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 213. FORD ED., v, 292. (Pa., 1791.)

3207. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Loyalty.—That Dr. Franklin would have waived the formal recognition of our Independence, I never heard on any authority worthy notice.—To ROBERT WALSH. vii, 108. FORD ED., x, 117. (M., 1818.)

3208. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Mesmerism unveiled.—The animal magnetism of the maniac Mesmer, * * * received its death wound from his hand in conjunction with his brethren of the learned committee appointed to unveil that compound of fraud and folly.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 212. FORD ED., v, 291. (Pa., 1791.)

3209. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Philosophy's loss.—[In his death] Philosophy has to deplore one of its principal luminaries extinguished.—To REV. WILLIAM SMITH. iii, 212. FORD ED., v, 290. (Pa., 1791.)

3210. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Presidency and.—Had I had a vote for the Presidency, I doubt whether I should not have withheld it from you, that you might have leisure to collect and digest the papers you have written from time to time, and which the world will expect to be given them.—To DR. FRANKLIN. i, 525. (P., Jan. 1786.)

* Franklin lived in Passy, a suburb of Paris.—EDITOR.

3211. FRANKLIN (Benjamin), Respected.—Mr. Jay, Silas Deane, Mr. Laurens, his colleagues also, ever maintained towards him unlimited confidence and respect.—To ROBERT WALSH. vii, 108. FORD ED., x, 117. (M., 1818.)

3212. FRANKLIN (William Temple), Diplomatic Desires.—I wish with all my heart Congress may call you into the diplomatic line, as that seems to have attracted your own desires. It is not one in which you can do anything more than pass the present hour agreeably, without any prospect of future provision.—To W. T. FRANKLIN. i, 555. (P., 1786.)

3213. FRANKLIN (William Temple), Office-seeking.—Can nothing be done for young Franklin? He is sensible, discreet, polite, and good-humored, had fully qualified as a Secrétaire d'Ambassade. His grandfather has none annexed to his legation at this Court [Versailles]. He is most sensibly wounded at his grandson's being superseded.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 8. (P., 1784.)

3214. FRANKLIN (William Temple), Estimate of.—I have never been with Master Franklin enough to unravel his character with certainty. He seems to be good in the main. I see sometimes an attempt to keep himself unpenetrated, which perhaps is the effect of the old lesson of his grandfather. His understanding is good enough for common use, but not great enough for uncommon ones.

* The Doctor is extremely wounded by the inattention of Congress to his application for him. He expects something to be done as a reward for his service. He will present * * * a determined silence on this subject in future.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 65. (P., 1785.)

3215. FRANKLIN, State of.—North Carolina, by an act of their Assembly, ceded to Congress all their lands westward of the Alleghany. The people inhabiting that territory, thereon declared themselves independent, called their State by the name of Franklin, and solicited Congress to be received into the Union. But before Congress met, North Carolina (for what reasons I could never learn) resumed their Session. The people, however, persist; Congress recommended the State to desist from their opposition, and I have no doubt they will do it.—To DAVID HARTLEY. i, 424. FORD ED., iv, 93. (P., 1785.)

3216. FRANKNESS, Complete.—My Dispositions are * * * against mysteries, innuendos and half-confidences.—To JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 259. FORD ED., vii, 309. (M., 1798.)

3217. ———. Half-confidences are not in my character.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 273. FORD ED., vii, 335. (Pa., 1799.)

3218. ———. I cannot say things by halves.—To SAMUEL KERCHVAL. vii, 17. FORD ED., x, 44. (M., 1816.)

3219. FRANKS (David), Office for.—Franks will doubtless be asking some appointment. I wish there may be one for which he is fit. He is light, indiscreet, active, honest, affectionate.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 108. FORD ED., iv, 365. (P., 1787.)

3220. FREDERICK THE GREAT, Potent influence.—His kingdom, like a machine, will go on for some time with the winding up he has given it.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 587. FORD ED., iv, 245. (P., July 1786.)

3221. ———. The death of the King of Prussia will employ the pens, if not the swords, of politicians.—To EZRA STILES. FORD ED., iv, 300. (P., 1786.)

3222. FREDERICK THE GREAT, Treaty with.—Without urging, we* sounded the ministers of the several European nations at the Court of Versailles, on their dispositions towards mutual commerce, and the expediency of encouraging it by the protection of a treaty. Old Frederick, of Prussia, met us cordially and without hesitation, and appointing the Baron de Thulemeyer, his minister at the Hague, to negotiate with us, we communicated to him our projet, which, with little alteration by the King was soon concluded.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 62. FORD ED., i, 87. (1820.) See TREATIES.

3223. FREDERICK WILLIAM II., Bulldog of tyranny.—If foreign troops should be furnished, it would be most probably by the King of Prussia, who seems to offer himself as the bulldog of tyranny to all his neighbors.—To JOHN JAY. iii, 118. (P., Sep. 1789.)

3224. FREDERICK WILLIAM II., Weakness of.—The King of Prussia does not seem to take into account the difference between his head and the late King's. This may be equal, perhaps, to half his army.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 492. (P., 1788.)

3225. FREEDOM, Birth.—Freedom,—the first-born daughter of science.—To M. D'IVERNOIS. iv, 113. FORD ED., vii, 3. (M., Feb. 1795.)

3226. FREEDOM, Gaining.—It is unfortunate, that the efforts of mankind to recover the freedom of which they have been so long deprived, will be accompanied with violence, with errors, and even with crimes. But while we weep over the means, we must pray for the end.—To M. D'IVERNOIS. iv, 115. FORD ED., vii, 5. (M., Feb. 1795.)

3227. FREEDOM, Solicitude for.—My future solicitude will be * * * to be instrumental to the happiness and freedom of all.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 5. FORD ED., viii, 6. (1801.) See GOVERNMENT, LIBERTY and TYRANNY.

— FREEDOM OF OPINION.—See OPINION.

3228. FREEDOM OF PERSON, Federal Constitution and.—The imprisonment of a person under the laws of * * * [Kentucky], on his failure to obey the simple order of the President to depart out of the United States, as is undertaken by the act entitled "An Act concerning Aliens", is contrary to the Constitution, one amendment to which has provided that "no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law"; and that another having provided that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to be tried by an impartial jury, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense", the same act, undertaking to authorize the President to remove a person out of the United States, who is under the protection of the law, on his own suspicion, without accusation, without jury, without public trial, without confrontation of the witnesses against him, without hearing witnesses in his favor, without defence, without counsel, is contrary to the provision also of the Constitution, is therefore not law, but utterly void, and of no force; * * * [and the] transferring the power of judging any person, who is under the protection of the laws, from the courts to the President of the United States, as is undertaken by the same act concerning aliens is against the article of the Constitution which provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in courts, the judges of which shall hold their offices during good behavior"; and * * * the said act is void for that reason also. And it is further to be noted, that this transfer of judiciary power is to that magistrate of the General Government who already possesses all the executive, and a negative on all legislative powers.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 467. FORD ED., vii, 297. (1798.)

3229. FREEDOM OF PERSON, Federal Government and.—Freedom of the person under the protection of the habeas corpus, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

3230. FREEDOM OF PERSON, State Constitutions and.—There are certain principles in which the constitutions of our several States all agree, and which all cherish as vitally essential to the protection of the life, liberty, property and safety of the citizen. [One is] Freedom of Person, securing every one from imprisonment, or other bodily restraint, but by the laws of the land. This is effected by the well-known law of habeas corpus.—TO M. CORAY. vii, 323. (M., 1823.) See HABEAS CORPUS.

— FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.—See PRESS.

— FREEDOM OF RELIGION.—See RELIGION.

3231. FREEDOM OF SPEECH, The Constitution and.—One of the amendments to the Constitution * * * expressly declares, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press"; thereby guarding in the same sentence, and under the same words, the freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press; inasmuch, whatever violates either, throws down the sanctuary which covers the others.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 466. FORD ED., vii, 295. (1798.) See 820.

3232. FREEDOM OF SPEECH, Error and.—Truth is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless, by human interposition, disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. FORD ED., ii, 239. (1779.)

3233. FREEDOM OF SPEECH, Government invasion of.—There are rights which it is useless to surrender to the government, and which governments have yet always been found to invade. [Among] these are the rights of thinking, and publishing our thoughts by speaking or writing.—TO DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 89. (P., 1789.)

3234. FREEDOM OF SPEECH, Guard to liberty.—The liberty of speaking and writing guards our other liberties.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. viiii, 129. (1808.)

3235. FREEDOM OF SPEECH, Opinion and.—Differences of opinion, when permitted * * * to purify themselves by free discussion, are but as * * * clouds overspreading our land transiently, and leaving our horizon more bright and serene.—TO BENJAMIN WARING.—iv, 378. (W., March 1801.)

3236. FREEDOM OF SPEECH, Shackled.—Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review the shackles on * * * the freedom of thought and of speech.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

3237. FREE PORTS, Honfleur.—Monsieur Famin called on me on the subject of making Honfleur a free port, and wished me to solicit it. I told him it was for our interest, as for that also of all the world, that every port of France, and of every other country, should be free; * * * but that I could not solicit it, as I had no instructions to do so.—TO M. DE LAFAYETTE. i, 579. (P., 1786.)

3238. — — — Some late regulations of the King and Council in favor of the commerce of the United States having given us room to hope that our endeavors may be successful to remove a good part of it from Great Britain to France, Honfleur presents itself as a more important instrument for this purpose than it had heretofore appeared. We are, therefore, now pressing more earnestly its establishment as a free port, and such other regulations in its favor as may invite the commerce to it.—TO M. FAMIN. ii, 53. (P., 1786.)

3239. — — — The enfranchising the port of Honfleur at the mouth of the Seine for multiplying the connections with us, is at present an object. It meets with opposition in the ministry but I am in hopes that it will prevail. If natural causes operate uninfluenced by accidental circumstances, Bourdeaux and Honfleur or Havre, must ultimately take the greatest part of our commerce. The former by the Garonne and canal of Languedoc opens the Southern provinces to us; the latter, the northern ones and Paris. Honfleur will be peculiarly advantageous for our rice and whale oil, of which the principal consumption is at Paris. Being free, they can be reexported when the market here shall happen to be overstocked.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 92. (P., 1787.)

3240. FREE PORTS, St. Bartholomew.—The island of St. Bartholomew, lately ceded to Sweden, is, if I am rightly informed, capable of furnishing little of its own productions to that country. It remains, then, to make it the instrument for obtaining through its intermediation such American productions as Sweden can consume or dispose of, and for finding in return a vent for the native productions of Sweden. Let us suppose it, then, made a free port without a single restriction. These consequences will follow: 1. It will draw to itself that tide of commerce which at present sets towards the Dutch and Danish islands, because vessels going to these are often obliged to negotiate a part of their cargoes at St. Eustatius, and to go to St. Thomas to negotiate the residue; whereas, when they shall know that there is a port where all articles are free for both importation and exportation, they will go to that port which enables them to perform by one voyage the exchanges which hitherto they could only effect by two. 2. Every species of American produce, whether of the precious metals or commodities, which Sweden may want for its own consumption, or as aliment for its own commerce with other nations, will be collected either fairly or by contraband into the magazines of St. Bartholomew. 3. All the productions which Sweden can furnish from within itself, or obtain to advantage from other nations, will in like manner be deposited in the magazines of St. Bartholomew, and will be carried to the several ports of America in payment for what shall be taken from them.—To BARON STAHE. FORD ED., iv, 240. (P., 1786.)

3241. ———. The interest of the United States is that St. Bartholomew be made a port of unlimited freedom, and such, too, is evidently the interest of Sweden. If it be freed by halves, the free ports of other nations, at present in possession of the commerce, will retain it against any new port offering no superior advantages. The situation of St. Bartholomew is very favorable to these views, as it is among the most windward, and therefore the most accessible of the West Indian Islands.—To BARON STAHE. FORD ED., iv, 242. (P., 1786.)

3242. FREE PORTS, St. Eustatius.—St. Eustatius is by nature a rock, barren and unproductive in itself, but its owners became sensible that what nature had denied it, policy could more than supply. It was conveniently situated for carrying on contraband trade with both the continents, and with the islands of America. They made it, therefore, an entrepot for all nations. Hither are brought the productions of every other port of America, and the Dutch give in exchange such articles as, in the course of their commerce, they can most advantageously gather up. And it is a question, on which they will not enable us to decide, whether by furnishing American productions to the commerce of Holland, and by finding vent for such productions of the old world as the Dutch merchants obtain to advantage, the barren rock of St. Eustatius does not give more activity to their commerce, and leave with them greater profits, than their more fertile possessions on the continent of South America.—To BARON STAHE. FORD ED., iv, 239. (P., 1786.)

3243. FREE PORTS, San Juan.—Free ports in the Spanish possessions in America, and particularly at the Havana, San Domingo, in the island of that name, and St. John of Porto Rico, are more to be desired than expected. It can, therefore, only be recommended to the best endeavors of the commissioners to obtain them.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 589. FORD ED., v, 478. (March 1792.)

3244. FREE SHIPS, Free goods, history of principle.—When Europe assumed the general form in which it is occupied by the nations now composing it, and turned its attention to maritime commerce, we found among its earliest practices, that of taking the goods of an enemy from the ship of a friend; and that into this practice every maritime State went sooner or later, as it appeared on the theatre of the ocean. If, therefore, we are to consider the practice of nations as the sole and sufficient evidence of the law of nature among nations, we should unquestionably place this principle among those of natural laws. But its inconveniences, as they affected neutral nations peaceably pursuing their commerce, and its tendency to embroil them with the powers happening to be at war, and thus to extend the flames of war, induced nations to introduce by special compacts, from time to time, a more convenient rule: "that free ships should make free goods"; and this latter principle has by every maritime nation of Europe been established, to a greater or less degree, in its treaties with other nations; inasmuch, that all of them have, more or less frequently, assented to it, as a rule of action in particular cases. Indeed, it is now urged, and I think with great appearance of reason, that this is the genuine principle dictated by national morality; and that the first practice arose from accident, and the particular convenience of the States (Venice and Genoa) which first figured on the water, rather than from well digested reflections of the relations of friend and enemy, on the rights of territorial jurisdiction, and on the dictates of moral law applied to these. Thus it had never been supposed lawful, in the territory of a friend to seize the goods of an enemy. On an element which nature has not subjected to the jurisdiction of any particular nation, but has made common to all for the purposes to which it is filled, it would seem that the particular portion of it which happens to be occupied by the vessel of any nation, in the course of its voyage, is for the moment, the exclusive property of that nation, and, with the vessel, is exempt from intrusion by any other, and from its jurisdiction, as much as if it were lying in the harbor of its sovereign. In no country, we believe, is the rule otherwise, as to the subjects of property common to all. Thus the place occupied by an individual in a highway, a church, a theatre, or other public assembly, cannot be intruded on, while its occupant holds it for the purposes of its institution. The persons on board a vessel traversing the ocean, carrying with them the laws of their nation, have among themselves a jurisdiction, a police, not established by their individual will, but by the authority of their nation, of whose territory their vessel still seems to compose a part, so long as it does not enter the exclusive territory of another. No nation ever pretended a right to govern by their laws the ship of another nation navigating the ocean. By what law, then, can it enter that ship while in peaceable and orderly use of the common element? We recognize no natural precept for submission to such a right; and perceive no distinction between the movable and immovable jurisdiction of a friend, which would authorize the entering the one and not the other, to seize the property of an enemy. It may be objected that this proves too much, as it proves you cannot enter the ship of a friend to search for contraband of war. But this is not proving too much. We believe the practice of seizing what is called contraband of war, is an abusive practice, not founded in natural right. War between two nations cannot diminish the rights of the rest of the world remaining at peace. The doctrine that the rights of nations remaining quietly in the exercise of moral and social duties, are to give way to the convenience of those who prefer plundering and murdering one another, is a monstrous doctrine; and ought to yield to the more rational law, that "the wrong which two nations endeavor to inflict on each other, must not infringe on the rights or conveniences of those remaining at peace". And what is contraband, by the law of nature? Either everything which may aid or comfort an enemy, or nothing. Either all commerce which would accommodate him is unlawful, or none is. The difference between articles of one or another description, is a difference in degree only. No line between them can be drawn. Either all intercourse must cease between neutrals and belligerents, or all be permitted. Can the world hesitate to say which shall be the rule? Shall two nations turning tigers, break up in one instant the peaceable relations of the whole world? Reason and nature clearly pronounce that the neutral is to go on in the enjoyment of all its rights, that its commerce remains free, not subject to the jurisdiction of another, nor consequently its vessels to search, or to enquiries whether their contents are the property of an enemy, or are of those which have been called contraband of war. Nor does this doctrine contravene the right of preventing vessels from entering a blockaded port. This right stands on other ground. When the fleet of any nation actually beleaguers the port of its enemy, no other has a right to enter their line, any more than their line of battle in the open sea, or their lines of circumvallation, or of encampment, or of battle array on land. The space included within their lines in any of those cases, is either the property of their enemy, or it is common property assumed and possessed for the moment, which cannot be intruded on, even by a neutral, without committing the very trespass we are now considering, that of intruding into the lawful possession of a friend.*—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 408. FORD ED., viii, 88. (M., Sep. 1801.)

3245. FREE SHIPS, Free goods, International Law and.—On the question whether the principle of "free bottoms making free goods, and enemy bottoms enemy goods", is now to be considered as established in the law of nations, I will state to you a fact within my own knowledge, which may lessen the weight of our authority as having acted in the war of France and England on the ancient principle "that the goods of an enemy in the bottom of a friend are lawful prize; while those of a friend in an enemy bottom are not so". England became a party in the general war against France on the 1st of February, 1793. We took immediately the stand of neutrality. We were aware that our great intercourse with these two maritime nations would subject us to harassment by multiplied questions on the duties of neutrality, and that an important and early one would be which of the two principles above stated should be the law of action with us? We wished to act on the new one of "free bottoms, free goods"; and we had established it in our treaties with other nations, but not with England. We determined, therefore, to avoid, if possible, committing ourselves on this question until we could negotiate with England her acquiescence in the new principle. Although the cases occurring were numerous, and the ministers. Genet and Hammond, eagerly on the watch, we were able to avoid any declaration until the massacre of St. Domingo. The whites, on that occasion, took refuge on board our ships, then in their harbor, with all the property they could find room for; and on their passage to the United States, many of them were taken by British cruisers, and their cargoes seized as lawful prize. The inflammable temper of Genet kindled at once, and he wrote, with his usual passion, a letter reclaiming an observance of the principle of "free bottoms, free goods", as if already an acknowledged law of neutrality. I pressed him in conversation not to urge this point; that although it had been acted on by convention, by the armed neutrality, it was not yet become a principle of universal admission; that we wished indeed to strengthen it by our adoption, and were negotiating an acquiescence on the part of Great Britain; but if forced to decide prematurely, we must justify ourselves by a declaration of the ancient principle, and that no general consent of nations had as yet changed it. He was immovable, and on the 25th of July wrote a letter, so insulting, that nothing but a determined system of justice and moderation would have prevented his being shipped home in the first vessel. I had the day before answered his of the 9th, in which I had been obliged in our own justification, to declare that the ancient was the established principle, still existing and authoritative. Our denial, therefore, of the new principle, and action on the old one, were forced upon us by the precipitation and intemperance of Genet, against our wishes, and against our aim; and our involuntary practice, therefore, is of less authority against the new rule.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 271. (M., Feb. 1823.)

3246. FREE SHIPS, Free goods, treaties and.—By the former usage of nations, the goods of a friend were safe though taken in an enemy bottom, and those of an enemy were lawful prize though found in a free bottom. But in our treaties with France, &c., we have established the simpler rule, that a free bottom makes free goods, and an enemy bottom, enemy goods. The same rule has been adopted by the treaty of armed neutrality between Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Holland and Portugal, and assented to by France and Spain. Contraband goods, however, are always excepted, so that they may still be seized; but the same powers have established that naval stores are not contraband goods; and this may be considered now as the law of nations. Though England acquiesced under this during the late war, rather than draw on herself the neutral powers, yet she never acceded to the new principle.—To MR. CAIRNES. ii, 280. (P., 1787.)

3247. ——. In our treaties with France, the United Netherlands, Sweden and Prussia, the principle of free bottoms, free goods, was uniformly maintained. In the instructions of 1784, given by Congress to their ministers appointed to treat with the nations of Europe generally, the same principle, and the doing away contraband of war, were enjoined, and were acceded to in the treaty signed with Portugal. In the late treaty with England, indeed, that power perseveringly refused the principle of free bottoms, free goods; and it was avoided in the late treaty with Prussia, at the instance of our then administration, lest it should seem to take side in a question then threatening decision by the sword. At the commencement of the war between France and England, the representative of the French Republic then residing in the United States [Genet], complaining that the British armed ships captured French property in American bottoms, insisted that the principle of "free bottoms, free goods", was of the acknowledged law of nations; that the violation of that principle by the British was a wrong committed on us, and such an one as we ought to repel by joining in the war against that country. We denied his position, and appealed to the universal practice of Europe, in proof that the principle of "free bottoms, free goods", was not acknowledged as of the natural law of nations, but only of its conventional law. And I believe we may safely affirm, that not a single instance can be produced where any nation of Europe, acting professedly under the law of nations alone, unrestrained by treaty, has, either by its executive or judiciary organs, decided on the principle of "free bottoms, free goods". Judging of the law of nations by what has been practiced among nations, we were authorized to say that the contrary principle was their rule, and this but an exception to it, introduced by special treaties in special cases only; that having no treaty with England substituting this instead of the ordinary rule, we had neither the right nor the disposition to go to war for its establishment. But though we would not then, nor will we now, engage in war to establish this principle, we are nevertheless sincerely friendly to it. We think that the nations of Europe have originally set out in error; that experience has proved the error oppressive to the rights and interests of the peaceable part of mankind; that every nation but one has acknowledged this, by consenting to the change, and that one has consented in particular cases; that nations have a right to correct an erroneous principle, and to establish that which is right as their rule of action; and if they should adopt measures for effecting this in a peaceable way, we shall wish them success and not stand in the way to it. But should it become, at any time, expedient for us to co-operate in the establishment of this principle, the opinion of the executive on the advice of its constitutional counsellors, must then be given; and that of the Legislature, an independent and essential organ in the operation, must also be expressed; in forming which, they will be governed, every man by his own judgment, and may, very possibly, judge differently from the Executive. With the same honest views, the most honest men often form different conclusions. As far, however, as we can judge, the principle of "free bottoms, free goods", is that which would carry the wishes of our nation.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 411. FORD ED., viii, 91. (M., Sep. 1801.)

3248. FREE TRADE, Alliance for.—I think nothing can bring the security of our continent and its cause into danger, if we can support the credit of our paper. To do that, I apprehend, one of two steps must be taken. Either to procure free trade by alliance with some naval power able to protect it; or, if we find there is no prospect of that, to shut our ports totally, to all the world, and turn our Colonies into manufactories. The former would be most eligible, because most conformable to the habits and wishes of our people.—To BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. i, 205. FORD ED., ii, 132. (1777.)

3249. FREE TRADE, Appeal for.—Our interest will be to throw open the doors of commerce, and to knock off all its shackles, giving perfect freedom to all persons for the vent of whatever they may choose to bring into our ports, and asking the same in theirs.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 412. FORD ED., iii, 279. (1782.)

3250. FREE TRADE, Benefit of.—I think all the world would gain by setting commerce at perfect liberty.—To JOHN ADAMS, i, 371. FORD ED., iv, 81. (July 1785.)

3251. FREE TRADE, Confederation Congress and.—Congress had, in the year 1784, made up their minds as to the system of commercial principles they wished to pursue. These were very free. They proposed them to all the powers of Europe. All declined except Prussia. To this general opposition they may now find it necessary to present a very different general system to which their treaties will form cases of exception.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 321. (P., 1787.)

3252. FREE TRADE, Desire for.—I take for granted, that the commercial system, wished for by Congress, was such a one as should leave commerce on the freest footing possible. This was the plan on which we prepared our general draft for treating with all nations.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 487. (P., 1785.)

3253. ——. Would even a single nation begin with the United States this system of free commerce, it would be advisable to begin it with that nation; since it is one by one only that it can be extended to all.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 646. FORD ED., vi, 479. (1793.)

3254. ——. I am for free commerce with all nations.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

3255. FREE TRADE, Encouragement.—The permitting an exchange of industries with other nations is a direct encouragement of your own, which without that, would bring you nothing for your comfort, and would of course cease to be produced.—To SAMUEL SMITH. vii, 286. FORD ED., x, 253. (M., 1823.)

3256. FREE TRADE, France and.—Merchandise received [in France] from the other nations of Europe takes employment from the poor of France; ours gives it. Their's is brought in the last stage of manufacture; ours in the first. We bring our tobaccos to be manufactured into snuff, our flax and hemp into linen and cordage, our furs into hats, skins into saddlery, shoes and clothing. We take nothing till it has received the last hand.*—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 173. FORD ED., iv, 400. (P., 1787.)

3257. FREE TRADE, Great Britain and.—The system into which the United States wished to go, was that of freeing commerce from every shackles. A contrary conduct in Great Britain will occasion them to adopt the contrary system, at least as to that island.—To W. W. SEWARD. i, 479. (P., 1785.)

3258. ——. I had persuaded myself [in 1804] that a nation, distant as we are from the contentions of Europe, avoiding all offences to other powers, and not over-hasty in resenting offence from them, doing justice to all, faithfully fulfilling the duties of neutrality performing all offices of amity, and administering to their interests by the benefits of our commerce, that such a nation, I say, might expect to live in peace, and consider itself merely as a member of the great family of mankind; that in such case it might devote itself to whatever it could best produce, secure of a peaceable exchange of surplus for what could be more advantageously furnished by others, as takes place between one country and another of France. But experience has shown that continued peace depends not merely on our own justice and prudence, but on that of others also; that when forced into war, the interception of exchanges which must be made across a wide ocean, becomes a powerful weapon in the hands of an enemy domineering over that element, and to the other distresses of war adds the want of all those necessities for which we have permitted ourselves to be dependent on others, even arms and clothing. This fact, therefore, solves the question by reducing it to its ultimate form, whether profit or preservation is the first interest of a State? We are consequently become manufacturers to a degree incredible to those who do not see it, and who only consider the short period of time during which we have been driven to them by the suicidal policy of England.—To J. B. SAY. vi, 430. (M., March 1815.)

3259. FREE TRADE, Human happiness and.—Could each [country] be free to exchange with others mutual surpluses for mutual wants, the greatest mass possible would then be produced of those things which contribute to human life and human happiness; the numbers of mankind would be increased, and their condition bettered.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 646. FORD ED., vi, 479. (Dec. 1793.)

3260. FREE TRADE, Natural right of.—The exercise of a free trade with all parts of the world, possessed by the American Colonists, as of natural right, and which no law

of their own had taken away or abridged, was next the object of unjust encroachment.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 127. FORD ED., i, 432. (1774.)

3261. FREE TRADE, Neighbor nations and.—An exchange of surpluses and wants between neighbor nations, is both a right and a duty under the moral law.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 275. FORD ED., v, 364. (Pa., 1791.) See AGRICULTURE, COMMERCE, MANUFACTURES, NAVIGATION, PROTECTION and TARIFF.

3262. FRENEAU (Philip), Clerkship.—The clerkship for foreign languages in my office is vacant. The salary, indeed, is very low, being but two hundred and fifty dollars a year; but also, it gives so little to do as not to interfere with any other calling the person may choose, which would not absent him from the seat of government. I was told a few days ago, that it might perhaps be convenient to you to accept it. If so, it is at your service. It requires no other qualification than a moderate knowledge of the French.—To PHILIP FRENEAU. iii, 215. (Pa., 1791.)

3263. FRENEAU (Philip), Gazette of.—Freneau has come here [Philadelphia] to set up a national gazette, to be published twice a week, and on whig principles.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 373. (Pa., 1791.)

3265. ——. As to the merits or demerits of his paper, they certainly concern me not. He and Fenno are rivals for the public favor. The one courts them by flattery, the other by censure; and I believe it will be admitted that the one has been as servile, as the other severe.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 466. FORD ED., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

3266. FRENEAU (Philip), Jefferson's relations to.—While the government was at New York I was applied to in behalf of Freneau to know if there was any place within my Department to which he could be appointed. I answered there were but four clerkships, all of which I found full, and continued without any change. When we removed to Philadelphia, Mr. Pintard, the translating clerk, did not choose to remove with us. His office then became vacant. I was again applied to there for Freneau, and had no hesitation to promise the clerkship for him. I cannot recollect whether it was at the same time, or afterwards, that I was told he had a thought of setting up a newspaper there. But whether then, or afterwards, I considered it a circumstance of some value, as it might enable me to do, what I had long wished to have done, that is, to have the material parts of the Leyden Gazette brought under your eye, and that of the public, in order to possess yourself and them of a juster view of the affairs of Europe than could be obtained from any other public source. This I had ineffectually attempted through the press of Mr. Fenno, while in New York, selecting and translating passages myself at first, then having it done through Mr. Pintard, the translating clerk, but they found their way too slowly into Mr. Fenno's papers. Mr. Bache essayed it for me in Philadelphia, but his being a daily paper, did not circulate sufficiently in the other States. He even tried, at my request, the plan of a weekly paper of recapitulation from his daily paper, in hopes that that might go into the other States, but in this, too, we failed. Freneau, as translating clerk, and the printer of a periodical paper likely to circulate through the States (uniting in one person the parts of Pintard and Fenno), revived my hopes that the thing could at length be effected. On the establishment of his paper, therefore, I furnished him with the Leyden gazettes, with an expression of my wish that he could always translate and publish the material intelligence they contained, and have continued to furnish them from time to time, as regularly as I received them. But as to any further direction or indication of my wish how his press should be conducted, what sort of intelligence he should give, what essays encourage, I can protest, in the presence of Heaven, that I never did by myself, or any other, or indirectly, say a syllable, nor attempt any kind of influence. I can further protest, in the same awful presence, that I never did, by myself, or any other, directly or indirectly, write, dictate, or procure any one sentence or sentiment to be inserted in his, or any other gazette, to which my name was not affixed or that of my office. * * * Freneau's proposition to publish a paper, having been about the time that the writings of "Publicola", and the discourses on Davila, had a good deal excited the public attention, I took for granted from Freneau's character, which had been marked as that of a good whig, that he would give free place to pieces written against the aristocratical and monarchical principles these papers had inculcated. This having been in my mind, it is likely enough I may have expressed it in conversation with others; though I do not recollect that I did. To Freneau I think I could not, because I had still seen him but once, and that was at a public table, * * * as I passed through New York the last year. And I can safely declare that my expectations looked only to the chastisement of the aristocratical and monarchical writers, and not to any criticisms on the proceedings of government.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 464. FORD ED., vi, 106. (M., 1792.)

3267. FRIENDS, College.—Friends we have, if we have merited them. Those of our earliest years stand nearest in our affections. Our college friends are the dearest.—To JOHN PAGE. iv, 547. (W., 1804.)

3268. FRIENDS, Inconstant.—During the whole of the Revolutionary war, which was trying enough I never deserted a friend because he had taken an opposite side: and those of my own State, who joined the British government, can attest my unremitting zeal in saving their property, and can point out the laws in our statute book which I drew, and carried through in their favor. However, I have seen during the late political paroxysm here [Philadelphia] numbers whom I had highly esteemed draw off from me inasmuch as to cross the street to avoid meeting me. The fever is abating, and doubtless some of them will correct the momentary wanderings of their heart, and return again. If they do, they will meet the constancy of my esteem, and the same oblivion of this as of any other celirium which might happen to them.—To WILLIAM HAMILTON. FORD ED., vii, 441. (Pa., 1800.)

3269. FRIENDS, Political.—Of one thing I am certain, that they will not suffer personal dissatisfactions to endanger the republican cause. Their principles, I know, are far above all private considerations. And when we reflect that the eyes of the virtuous all over the earth are turned with anxiety on us, as the only depositories of the sacred fire of liberty, and that our falling into anarchy would decide forever the destinies of mankind, and seal the political heresy that man is incapable of self-government, the only contest between divided friends should be who will dare farthest into the ranks of the common enemy.—To JOHN HOLLINS. v, 596. (M., 1811.)

3270. FRIENDS, Separation of.—No one feels more painfully than I do, the separation of friends, and especially when their sensibilities are to be daily harrowed up by cannibal newspapers. In these cases, however, I claim from all parties the privilege of neutrality, and to be permitted to esteem all as I ever did. The harmony which made me happy while at Washington, is as dear to me now as then, and I should be equally afflicted, were it, by any circumstance, to be impaired as to myself.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 588. (M., April 1811.)

3272. FRIENDS, Wounded.—Sincerely the friend of all the parties, I ask of none why they have fallen out by the way, and would gladly infuse the oil and wine of the Samaritan into all their wounds. I hope that time, the assuager of all evils, will heal these also; and I pray for them all a continuance of their affection, and to be permitted to bear to all the same unqualified esteem.—To JOHN HOLLINS. v, 596. (M., 1811.)

3273. FRIENDSHIP, Affectionate.—The happiest moments my heart knows are those in which it is pouring forth its affections to a few esteemed characters.—To MRS. TRIST. D. L. J., 84. (1786.)

3274. FRIENDSHIP, Ambition and.—I had rather be shut up in a very modest cottage, with my books, my family and a few old friends, dining on simple bacon, and letting the world roll on as it liked than to occupy the most splendid post which any human power can give.—To A. DONALD. ii, 356. (P., 1788.)

3275. FRIENDSHIP, Ancient.—I enjoy, in recollection, my ancient friendships, and suffer no new circumstances to mix alloy with them.—To DAVID HOWELL. v, 555. (M., 1810.)

3276. FRIENDSHIP, Broken.—The late misunderstandings at Washington have been a subject of real concern to me. I know that the dissolutions of personal friendship are among the most painful occurrences in human life. I have sincere esteem for all who have been affected by them, having passed with them eight years of great harmony and affection. These incidents are rendered more distressing in our country than elsewhere, because our printers ravin on the agonies of their victims, as wolves do on the blood of the lamb.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 598. FORD ED., ix, 323. (M., May 1811.)

3277. FRIENDSHIP, Comforts of.—What an ocean is life! And how our barks get separated in beating through it! One of the greatest comforts of the retirement to which I shall soon withdraw will be its rejoining me to my earliest and best friends, and acquaintances.—To ST. GEORGE TUCKER. FORD ED., vi, 425. (Pa., 1793.)

3278. — — — The only thing wanting to make me completely happy, is the more frequent society of my friends. It is the more wanting, as I am become more firmly fixed to the glebe.—To W. B. GILES. iv, 118. FORD ED., vii, 12. (M., 1795.)

3279. — — — So long a time has elapsed since we have been separated by events, that your favor was like a letter from the dead, and recalled to my memory very dear recollections. My subsequent journey through life has offered nothing which, in comparison with those, is not cheerless and dreary. It is a rich comfort sometimes to look back on them.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 300. FORD ED., vii, 373. (M., 1799.)

3280. FRIENDSHIP, Early.—As I grow older, I set a higher value on the intimacies of my youth, and am more afflicted by whatever loses one of them to me.—To A. DONALD. ii, 193. FORD ED., iv, 413. (P., 1787.)

3281. — — — I find as I grow older, that I love those most whom I loved first.—To MRS. BOWLING. FORD ED., iv, 412. (1787.)

3282. — — — The fond recollections of ancient times are much dearer to me than anything I have known since. * * * No attachments soothe the mind so much as those contracted in early life.—To A. DONALD. ii, 356. (P., 1788.)

3283. FRIENDSHIP, Enduring.—I never considered a difference of opinion in politics, in religion, in philosophy, as cause for withdrawing from a friend.—To WILLIAM HAMILTON. FORD ED., vii, 441. (Pa., 1800.)

3285. FRIENDSHIP, False national.—No circumstances of morality, honor, interest, or engagement are sufficient to authorize a secure reliance on any nation, at all times, and in all positions. A moment of difficulty, or a moment of error, may render forever useless the most friendly dispositions in the King, in the major part of his ministers, and the whole of his nation.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 304. (P., 1787.)

3286. FRIENDSHIP, Honest national.—Honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

3287. — — — We have endeavored to cultivate the friendship of all nations.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 40. FORD ED., viii, 343. (1805.)

3288. FRIENDSHIP, Precious.—Friendship is precious, not only in the shade, but in the sunshine of life; and thanks to a benevolent arrangement of things, the greater part of life is sunshine.—To MRS. COSWAY. ii, 39. FORD ED., iv, 319. (P.)

3289. FRIENDSHIP, Private.—I declare to you that I have never suffered political opinion to enter into the estimate of my private friendships; nor did I ever abdicate the society of a friend on that account till he had first withdrawn from mine. Many have left me on that account, but with many I still preserve affectionate intercourse, only avoiding to speak on politics, as with a Quaker or Catholic I would avoid speaking on religion.—To J. F. MERCER. iv, 563. (W., 1804.)

3290. FRIENDSHIP, Qualities of.—Wealth, title, office are no recommendations to my friendship. On the contrary, great good qualities are requisite to make amends for their having wealth, title and office.—To MRS. COSWAY. ii, 41. FORD ED., iv, 321. (P., 1786.)

3291. FRIENDSHIP, Value of.—That is a miserable arithmetic which could estimate friendship at nothing, or at less than nothing.—To MRS. COSWAY. ii, 39. FORD ED., iv, 319. (P., 1786.)

3292. FRIENDSHIP, Like wine.—I find friendship to be like wine, raw when new, ripened with age, the true old man's milk and restorative cordial.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 4. FORD ED., ix, 329. (P.F., 1811.)

3293. FRIENDSHIP, Youthful.—The friendships of my youth are those which adhere closest to me, and in which I most confide.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 399. (P., 1785.)

me that I was not the first to leave them. I have never thought that a difference in political, any more than in religious opinions, should disturb the friendly intercourse of society. There are so many other topics on which friends may converse and be happy, that it is wonderful they would select, of preference, the only one on which they cannot agree.—To DAVID CAMPBELL. v, 499. (M., 1810.)

3295. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Advantages.—Both the United States and England ought to wish for peace and cordial friendship; we, because you can do us more harm than any other nation; and you, because we can do you more good than any other. Our growth is now so well established by regular enumerations through a course of forty years, and the same grounds of continuance so likely to endure for a much longer period, that, speaking in round numbers, we may safely call ourselves twenty millions in twenty years, and forty millions in forty years. Many of the statesmen now living saw the commencement of the first term, and many now living will see the end of the second. It is not then a mere concern of posterity; a third of those now in life will see that day. Of what importance, then, to you must such a nation be, whether as friends or foes.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. vii, 22. (M., 1816.)

3296. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Advocates and antagonists.—That [friendly] dispositions [towards Great Britain] have been strong on our part in every administration from the first to the present one, that we would at any time have gone our full half way to meet them, if a single step in advance had been taken by the other party, I can affirm of my own intimate knowledge of the fact. During the first year of my own administration, I thought I discovered in the conduct of Mr. Addington some marks of comity towards us, and a willingness to extend to us the decencies and duties observed towards other nations. My desire to catch at this, and to improve it for the benefit of my own country, induced me, in addition to the official declarations from the Secretary of State, to write with my own hand to Mr. King, then our Minister Plenipotentiary at London, in the following words: [See 3299.] My expectation was that Mr. King would show this letter to Mr. Addington, and that it would be received by him as an overture towards a cordial understanding between the two countries. He left the ministry, however, and I never heard more of it and certainly never perceived any good effect from it. I know that in the present temper, the boastful, the insolent, and the mendacious newspapers, on both sides, will present serious impediments. Ours will be insulting your public authorities, and boasting of victories; and yours will not be sparing of provocations and abuse of us. But if those at our helms could not place themselves above these pitiful notices, and throwing aside all personal feelings, look only to the interest of their nations, they would be unequal to the trusts confided to them. I am equally confident, on our part, in the administration now in place, as in that which will succeed it; and that if friendship is not hereafter sincerely cultivated, it will not be their fault. * * * Although what I write is from no personal privity with the views or wishes of our government, yet believing them to be what they ought to be, and confident in their wisdom and integrity, I am sure I hazard no deception in what I have said of them, and I shall be happy indeed if some good shall result to both our countries.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. vii, 23. (M., 1816.)

3297. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Common interest.—No two countries upon earth have so many points of common interest and friendship; and the rulers must be great bunglers indeed, if, with such dispositions, they break them asunder.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 12. FORD ED., viii, 449. (W., May 1806.)

3298. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Cultivation of.—As to the duties of your office [Minister to England], I shall only express a desire that they be constantly exercised in that spirit of sincere friendship which we bear to the English nation, and that in all transactions with the minister, his good dispositions be conciliated by whatever in language or attentions may tend to that effect.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 441. FORD ED., vi, 75. (Pa., 1792.)

3299. — — — I hope that through your agency we may be able to remove everything inauspicious to a cordial friendship between this country and the one in which you are stationed; a friendship dictated by too many considerations not to be felt by the wise and the dispassionate of both nations. It is, therefore, with the sincerest pleasure I have observed on the part of the British government various manifestations of just and friendly disposition towards us.* We wish to cultivate peace and friendship with all nations, believing that course most conducive to the welfare of our own. It is natural that these friendships should bear some proportion to the common interests of the parties. The interesting relations between Great Britain and the United States are certainly of the first order; and as such are estimated, and will be faithfully cultivated by us. These sentiments have been communicated to you from time to time in the official correspondence of the Secretary of State; but I have thought it might not be unacceptable to

*In the Ford edition, it is noted that in the draft of the letter to Mr. King, the following paragraph is stricken out: "These seeds are not sown in barren ground. I have too high an opinion of the understanding of those at the helm of British affairs to suppose they judge of the dispositions of this administration from the miserable trash of the public papers; and I trust they have more respect for our understandings than to suppose we are Gallomen or Anglomen, or anything but Americans and the friends of our friends. Peace and friendship are essential with all other nations."—EDITOR.

be assured that they perfectly concur with my own personal convictions, both in relation to yourself and the country in which you are.—To RUFUS KING. iv, 444. FORD ED., viii, 163. (W., July 1802.)

3300. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Desired.—Would to God that nation [England] would so far be just in her conduct, as that we might with honor give her that friendship it is so much our interest to bear her.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 300. (M., April 1804.)

3301. ——. Instead of fearing and endeavoring to crush our prosperity, had the British cultivated it in friendship, it might have become a bulwark instead of a breaker to them. There has never been an administration in this country which would not gladly have met them more than half way on the road to an equal, a just and solid connection of friendship and intercourse. And as to repressing our growth, they might as well attempt to repress the waves of the ocean.—To JOHN MELISH. vi, 403. (M., 1814.)

3302. ——. No one feels more indignation than myself when reflecting on the insults and injuries of that country to this. But the interests of both require that these should be left to history, and in the meantime be smothered in the living mind. I have, indeed, little personal concern in it. Time is drawing her curtain on me. But I should make my bow with more satisfaction, if I had more hope of seeing our countries shake hands together cordially.—To JAMES MAURY. vi, 469. (M., June 1815.)

3303. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Her advantage.—If the British adopt a course of friendship with us, the commerce of one hundred millions of people, which some now born will live to see will maintain them forever as a great unit of the European family. But if they go on checking, irritating, injuring, and hostilizing us, they will force on us the motto "Carthago delenda est". And some Scipio Americanus will leave to posterity the problem of conjecturing where stood once the ancient and splendid city of London. * * * I hope the good sense of both parties will concur in travelling rather the paths of peace, of affection, and reciprocations of interests.—To C. F. GRAY. vi 439. (M., 1815.)

3304. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, How obtained.—But is their friendship to be obtained by the irritating policy of fomenting among us party discord, and a teasing opposition; by bribing traitors, whose sale of themselves proves they would sell their purchasers also, if their treacheries were worth a price? How much cheaper would it be, how much easier, more honorable more magnanimous and secure, to gain the government itself by a moral, a friendly and respectful course of conduct, which is all they would ask for a cordial and faithful return.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. vii, 22. (M., 1816.)

3305. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Influence of George III.—Circumstances have nourished between our kindred countries angry dispositions which both ought long since to have banished from their bosoms. I have ever considered a cordial affection as the first interest of both. No nation on earth can hurt us so much as yours, none be more useful to you than ours. The obstacle, we have believed, was in the obstinate and unforgiving temper of your late King, and a continuance of his prejudices kept up from habit, after he was withdrawn from power. I hope I now see symptoms of sounder views in your government; in which I know it will be cordially met by ours, as it would have been by every administration which has existed under our present Constitution. None desired it more cordially than myself, whatever different opinions were impressed on your government by a party who wishes to have its weight in their scale as its exclusive friends.—To MR. ROSCOW. vii, 196. (M., 1820.)

3306. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Mr. Merry and.—I thought that in the administration of Mr. Addington, I discovered some dispositions towards justice, and even friendship and respect for us, and began to pave the way for cherishing these dispositions, and improving them into ties of mutual good-will. But we had then a Federal minister there, whose dispositions to believe himself, and to inspire others with a belief in our sincerity, his subsequent conduct has brought into doubt; and poor Merry, the English minister here, had learned nothing of diplomacy but its suspicions, without head enough to distinguish when they were misplaced. Mr. Addington and Mr. Fox passed away too soon to avail the two countries of their dispositions.—To JAMES MAURY. vi, 53. FORD ED., ix, 350. (M., April 1812.)

3307. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Mutual interest.—Time and prudence on the part of the two governments may get over these [irritations, produced by the war of 1812]. Manifestations of cordiality between them, friendly and kind offices made visible to the people on both sides, will mollify their feelings, and second the wishes of their functionaries to cultivate peace and promote mutual interest.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. vii, 23. (M., 1816.)

3308. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Obstacles to.—The war interests in England include a numerous and wealthy part of their population; and their influence is deemed worth courting by ministers wishing to keep their places. Continually endangered by a powerful opposition, they find it convenient to humor the popular passions at the expense of the public good. The shipping interest, commercial interest, and their janizaries of the navy, all fattening on war, will not be neglected by ministers of ordinary minds. Their tenure of office is so infirm that they dare not follow the dictates of wisdom, justice, and the well-calculated interests of their country. This vice in the English constitution, renders a dependence on that government very unsafe. The feelings of their King, too, fundamentally adverse to us, have added another motive for unfriendliness in his ministers. This obstacle to friendship, however, seems likely to be soon removed; and I verily believe the successor will come in with fairer and wiser dispositions towards us; perhaps on that event their conduct may be changed.—To THOMAS LAW. v. 556. FORD ED., ix, 293. (M., 1811.)

3309. ——. Instead of cultivating the government itself, whose principles are those of the great mass of the nation, they [the British Ministry] have adopted the miserable policy of teasing and embarrassing it, by allying themselves with a faction here [the monarchical Federalists], not a tenth of the people, noisy and unprincipled, and which can never come into power while republicanism is the spirit of the nation, and that must continue to be so, until such a condensation of population shall have taken place as will require centuries. Whereas, the good will of the government itself would give them, and immediately, every benefit which reason or justice would permit it to give.—To THOMAS LAW. v. 556. FORD ED., ix, 292. (M., 1811.)

3310. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Price of.—What is the price we ask for our friendship? Justice, and the comity usually observed between nation and nation. Would there not be more of dignity in this, more character and satisfaction, than in her teasings and harrassings, her briberies and intrigues, to sow party discord among us, which can never have more effect here than the opposition within herself has there; which can never obstruct the begetting children, the efficient source of growth; and by nourishing a deadly hatred, will only produce and hasten events which both of us, in moments of sober reflection, should deplore and deprecate? One half of the attention employed in decent observances towards our Government, would be worth more to her than all the Yankee duperies played off upon her, at a great expense on her part of money and meanness, and of nourishment to the vices and treacheries of the Henrys and Hulls of both nations.—To JAMES MAURY. vi, 468. (M., 1815.)

3311. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Sacrifices for.—There is not a nation on the globe with whom I have more earnestly wished a friendly intercourse on equal concitions. On no other would I hold out the hand of friendship to any. I know that their creatures represent me as personally an enemy to England. But fools only can believe this, or those who think me a fool. I am an enemy to her insults and injuries. I am an enemy to the flagitious principles of her administration, and to those which govern her conduct towards other nations. But would she give to morality some place in her political code, and especially should she exercise decency, and at least neutral passions towards us, there is not, I repeat it, a people on earth with whom I would sacrifice so much to be in friendship.—To CÆSAR A. RODNEY. vi, 449. (M., March 1815.)

3312. FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND, Value of.—No man was more sensible than myself of the just value of the friendship of Great Britain. There are between us so many of those circumstances which naturally produce and cement kind dispositions, that if they could have forgiven our resistance to their usurpations, our connections might have been durable, and have insured duration to both our governments. I wished, therefore, a cordial friendship with them, and I spared no occasion of manifesting this in our correspondence and intercourse with them; not disguising, however, my desire of friendship with their enemy also. During the administration of Mr. Addington, I thought I discovered some friendly symptoms on the part of that government; at least, we received some marks of respect from the administration, and some of regret at the wrongs we were suffering from their country. So, also, during the short interval of Mr. Fox's power. But every other administration since our Revolution has been equally wanton in their injuries and insults, and have manifested equal hatred and aversion.—To THOMAS LAW. v, 555. FORD ED., ix, 292. (M., 1811.)

3313. ——. I reciprocate congratulations with you sincerely on the restoration of peace between our two nations. * * * Let both parties now count soberly the value of mutual friendship. I am satisfied both will find that no advantage either can derive from any act of injustice whatever will be of equal value with those flowing from friendly intercourse.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. vii, 22. (M., 1816.)

3314. FRUGALITY, Advocated.—Would a missionary appear, who would make frugality the basis of his religious system, and go through the land preaching it up as the only road to salvation, I would join his school, though not generally disposed to seek my religion out of the dictates of my own reason, and feelings of my own heart.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P. 1786.)

3315. FRUGALITY, Government and.—What more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people? Still one thing more: a wise and frugal Government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government, and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 3. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

3316. FUGITIVES, Debtors.—In the case of fugitive debtors and criminals, it is always well that coterminous States should understand one another, as far as their ideas on the rightful powers of government can be made to go together. When they separate, the cases may be left unprovided for.—To MESSRS. CARMICHAEL AND SHORT. iii, 349. (Pa., 1792.)

3317. FUGITIVES, England and.—England has no such convention with any nation, and their laws have given no power to their Executive to surrender fugitives of any description; they are accordingly constantly refused, and hence England has been the asylum of the Paolis, the La Mottes, the Calonnes, in short, of the most atrocious offenders as well as the most innocent victims, who have been able to get there.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 299. FORD ED., v, 386. (Pa., 1791.)

3318. FUGITIVES, Exile and.—Does the fugitive from his country avoid punishment? He incurs exile, not voluntary, but under a moral necessity, as strong as physical. Exile, in some countries, has been the highest punishment allowed by the laws. To most minds it is next to death; to many beyond it. The fugitive, indeed, is not of the latter: he must estimate it somewhat less than death. It may be said that to some, as foreigners, it is no punishment.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 353. FORD ED., v, 483. (1792.)

3319. FUGITIVES, Mariners.—When the consular convention with France was under consideration, this subject was attended to; but we could agree to go no further than is done in the ninth article of that instrument, when we agree mutually to deliver up "captains, officers, mariners, sailors, and all other persons being part of the crews of vessels", &c. Unless, therefore, the persons before named* be part of the crew of some vessel of the French nation, no person in this country is authorized to deliver them up; but, on the contrary, they are under the protection of the laws.—To E. C. GENET. FORD ED., vi, 426. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

3320. FUGITIVES, Murderers.—Any person having committed murder of malice prepense, not of the nature of treason, within the United States or the Spanish provinces adjoining thereto, and fleeing from the justice of the country, shall be delivered up by the government where he shall be found, to that from which he fled, whenever demanded by the same.—PROJECT OF A SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 350. FORD ED., v, 485. (1792.)

3321. ———. Murder is one of the extreme crimes justifying a denial of habitation, arrest and redelivery. It should be carefully restrained by definition to homicide of malice prepense, and not of the nature of treason. * * * The only rightful subject then of arrest and delivery, for which we have need [to provide by convention], is murder.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 352. FORD ED., v, 482. (1792.)

* M. Genet had requested the delivery of several persons "escaped from the ship Jupiter, and from the punishment of crime committed against the Republic of France".—EDITOR.

3322. FUGITIVES, Political.—However desirable it be that the perpetrators of crimes, acknowledged to be such by all mankind, should be delivered up to punishment, yet it is extremely difficult to draw the line between those and acts rendered criminal by tyrannical laws only; hence the first step always, is a convention defining the cases where a surrender shall take place.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 300. FORD ED., v, 386. (Pa., 1791.)

3323. FUGITIVES, Protection of.—The laws of this country take no notice of crimes committed out of their jurisdiction. The most atrocious offender coming within their pale, is received by them as an innocent man, and they have authorized no one to seize or deliver him. The evil of protecting malefactors of every dye is sensibly felt here, as in other countries; but until a reformation of the criminal codes of most nations, to deliver fugitives from them, would be to become their accomplices; the former, therefore, is viewed as the lesser evil.—To EDMOND CHARLES GENET. FORD ED., vi, 426. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

3324. FUGITIVES, Punishment of.—All excess of punishment is a crime. To remit a fugitive to excessive punishment, is to be accessory to the crime. Ought we to wish for the obligation, or the right to do it? Better on the whole, to consider these crimes as sufficiently punished by the exile.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 354. FORD ED., v, 484. (1792.)

3325. FUGITIVES, Rights of.—Has a nation a right to punish a person who has not offended itself? Writers on the law of nature agree that it has not; that on the contrary, exiles and fugitives are to them as other strangers, and have a right of residence, unless their presence would be noxious; e. g., infectious persons. One writer. (Vattel, L. I. 5, 233.) extends the exception to atrocious criminals, too imminently dangerous to society; namely, to pirates, murderers, and incendiaries.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 352. FORD ED., v, 481. (1792.)

3326. FUGITIVES, Slaves.—Complaint has been made by the representatives of Spain that certain individuals of Georgia entered the State of Florida, and without any application to the Government, seized and carried into Georgia, certain persons, whom they claimed to be their slaves. This aggression was thought the more of, as there exists a convention between that government and the United States against receiving fugitive slaves. The minister of France has complained that the master of an American vessel, while lying within a harbor of St. Domingo, having enticed some negroes on board his vessel, under pretext of employment, brought them off, and sold them in Georgia as slaves. 1. Has the General Government cognizance of these offences? 2. If it has, is any law already provided for trying and punishing them? 1. The Constitution says "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts, &c., provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States". I do not consider this clause as reaching the point. * * * The Constitution says further, that Congress shall have power to "define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations". These offences were not committed on the high seas, and consequently not within that branch of the clause. Are they against the law of nations, taken as it may be in its whole extent, as founded, 1st, in nature; 2d, usage; 3d, convention. So much may be said in the affirmative, that the legislators ought to send the case before the judiciary for discussion; and the rather, when it is considered that unless the offenders can be punished under this clause, there is no other which goes directly to their case, and consequently our peace with foreign nations will be constantly at the discretion of individuals. 2. Have the legislators sent this question before the Courts by any law already provided? The act of 1789, chapter 20, section 9, says the district courts shall have cognizance concurrent with the courts of the several States, or the circuit courts, of all causes, where an alien sues for a tort only, in violation of the law of nations; but what if there be no alien whose interest is such as to support an action for the tort?—which is precisely the case of the aggression on Florida. If the act in describing the jurisdiction of the Courts, had given them cognizance of proceedings by way of indictment or information against offenders under the law of nations, for the public wrong, and on the public behalf, as well as to an individual for the special tort, it would have been the thing desired. The same act, section 13, says, the "Supreme Court shall have exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics or domestic servants, as a court of law can have or exercise consistently, with the law of nations". Still this is not the case, no ambassador, &c., being concerned here. I find nothing else in the law applicable to this question, and therefore presume the case is still to be provided for, and that this may be done by enlarging the jurisdiction of the courts, so that they may sustain indictments and informations on the public behalf, for offences against the law of nations.*—OPINION ON FUGITIVE SLAVES. vii, 601. FORD ED., vi, 141. (1792.)

3327. FUGITIVES, Treaties Respecting.—Two neighboring and free governments, with laws equally mild and just, would find

*Jefferson added at a later period: "On further examination it does appear that the 11th section of the Judiciary Act, above cited, gives to the circuit courts exclusively, cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, and not otherwise provided for. This removes the difficulty, however, but one step further; for questions then arise, 1st: What is the peculiar character of the offence in question; to wit, treason, felony, no difficulty in forming a convention for the interchange of fugitive criminals. Nor would two neighboring despotic governments, with laws of equal severity. The latter wish that no door should be opened to their subjects flying from the oppression of their laws. The fact is, that most of the governments on the continent of Europe have such conventions; but England, the only free one till lately, has never yet consented to enter into a convention for this purpose, or to give up a fugitive. The difficulty between a free government and a despotic one, is indeed great.—To GOVERNOR PINCKNEY. iii, 346. FORD ED., v, 492. (1792.)

3329. FUNDING, Redemption and.—Funding I consider as limited, rightfully, to a redemption of the debt within the lives of a majority of the generation contracting it; every generation coming equally, by the laws of the Creator of the world, to the free possession of the earth He made for their subsistence, unincumbered by their predecessors, who, like them, were but tenants for life.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 605. FORD ED., x, 28. (M., May 1816.) See ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, DEBT, GENERATIONS, and HAMILTON.

3330. FUR TRADE, Aid to Astor.—I learn with great satisfaction the disposition of our merchants to form into companies for undertaking the Indian trade within our own territories. I have been taught to believe it an advantageous one for the individual adventurers, and I consider it as highly desirable to have that trade centered in the hands of our own citizens. * * * All beyond the Mississippi is ours exclusively, and it will be in our own power to give our own traders great advantages over their foreign competitors on this side the Mississippi. You may be assured that in order to get the whole of this business passed into the hands of our own citizens, and to oust foreign traders, who so much abuse their privilege by endeavoring to excite the Indians to war on us, every reasonable patronage and facility in the power of the Executive will be afforded.—To JOHN JACOB ASTOR. v, 269. (W., 1808.)

3331. ——. A powerful company is at length forming for taking up the Indian commerce on a large scale. They will employ a capital the first year of $100,000, and raise it afterwards to a million. The English Mackinac company will probably withdraw from the competition. It will be under the direction of a most excellent man, a Mr. Astor, merchant of New York, long engaged in the business, and perfectly master of it. He has some hope of seeing you at St. Louis, in which case I recommend him to your particular attention. Nothing but the exclusive possession of the Indian commerce can secure us their peace.—To MERIWETHER LEWIS. v, 321. FORD ED., ix, 190. (W., July 1808.)

misdeemeanor, or trespass? 2d. What is its specific punishment, capital or what? 3d. Whence is the venue to come?—EDITOR.

3332. FUR TRADE, Difficulties in.—I am sorry your enterprise for establishing a factory on the Columbia river, and a commerce through the line of that river and the Missouri, should meet with the difficulties stated in your letter. I remember well having invited your proposition on that subject, and encouraged it with the assurance of every facility and protection which the government could properly afford. I considered as a great public acquisition the commencement of a settlement on that point of the Western coast of America, and looked forward with gratification to the time when its descendants should have spread themselves through the whole length of that coast, covering it with free and independent Americans, unconnected with us but by the ties of blood and interest, and employing like us the rights of self-government. I hope the obstacles you state are not insurmountable; that they will not endanger, or even delay the accomplishment of so great a public purpose.—To JOHN JACOB ASTOR. vi, 55. FORD ED., ix, 351. (M., May 1812.)

3333. FUR TRADE, Great Britain and.—In the present state of affairs between Great Britain and us, the government is justly jealous of the contraventions of those commercial restrictions which have been deemed necessary to exclude the use of British manufactures in these States, and to promote the establishment of similar ones among ourselves. The interests, too, of the revenue require particular watchfulness. But in the non-importation of British manufactures, and the revenue raised on foreign goods, the Legislature could only have in view the consumption of our own citizens, and the revenue to be levied on that. We certainly did not mean to interfere with the consumption of nations foreign to us, as the Indians of the Columbia and Missouri are, or to assume a right of levying an impost on that consumption; and if the words of the laws take in their supplies in either view, it was probably unintentional, and because their case not being under the contemplation of the Legislature, has been inadvertently embraced by it. The question with them would be not what manufactures these nations should use, or what taxes they should pay us on them, but whether we would give a transit for them through our country. We have a right to say we will not let the British exercise that transit. But it is our interest, as well as a neighborly duty, to allow it when exercised by our own citizens only. To guard against any surreptitious introduction of British influence among those nations, we may justifiably require that no Englishman be permitted to go with the trading parties, and necessary precautions should also be taken to prevent this covering the contravention of our own laws and views. But these once securely guarded, our interest would permit the transit free of duty.—To JOHN JACOB ASTOR. vi, 55. FORD ED., ix, 351. (M., May 1812.)

3334. FUTURE, Dreams of.—I like the dreams of the future better than the history of the past.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 27. (M., 1816.)

3335. FUTURE LIFE, Belief in.—Your son found me in a retirement I doat on, living like an antediluvian patriarch among my children and grandchildren, and tilling my soil. As he had lately come from Philadelphia, Boston, &c., he was able to give me a great deal of information of what is passing in the world, and I pestered him with questions pretty much as our friends Lynch, Nelson, &c., will [pester] us, when we step across the Styx, for they will wish to know what has been passing above ground since they left us.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 124. FORD ED., vii, 39. (M., Nov. 1795.)

3336. — — — Your letter was like the joy we expect in the mansions of the blessed, when received with the embraces of our fathers, we shall be welcomed with their blessing as having done our part not unworthily of them.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 365. FORD ED., viii, 7. (W., March 1801.)

3337. FUTURE LIFE, Felicity of.—Perhaps one of the elements of future felicity is to be a constant and unimpassioned view of what is passing here.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. vii, 53. FORD ED., x, 71. (M., 1817.)

3338. — — — But these are speculations which we may as will deliver over to those who are to see their development. We shall only be lookers on, from the clouds above, as now we look down on the laborers, the hurry and bustle of the ants and bees. Perhaps in that super-mundane region, we may be amused with seeing the fallacy of our own guesses, and even the nothingness of those labors, which have filled and agitated our own time here.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 105. FORD ED., x, 109. (M., 1818.)

3339. FUTURE LIFE, Reunion.—Your age of eighty-four and mine of eighty-one years insure us a speedy meeting. We may then commune at leisure, and more fully, on the good and evil which, in the course of our long lives, we have both witnessed.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 361. (M., 1824.)

3340. GAGE (General Thomas), Appointment.—The substitution of Gage for Hutchinson was not intended as a favor, but, by putting the civil government into military hands, was meant to show they would enforce their measures by arms.—NOTES ON M. SOULE'S WORK. ix, 300. FORD ED., iv, 307. (P., 1786.)

3341. GAGE (General Thomas), Oppressor.—General Gage, by proclamation bearing date the 12th day of June, after reciting the grossest falsehoods and calumnies against the good people of these Colonies, proceeds to declare them all, either by name or description, to be rebels and traitors, to supersede the exercise of the common law of the said province [Massachusetts], and to proclaim and order instead thereof the use and exercise of the law martial. This bloody edict issued, he has proceeded to commit further ravages and murders in the same province, burning the town of Charlestown, attacking and killing great numbers of the people residing or assembled therein; and is now going on in an avowed course of murder and devastation, taking every occasion to destroy the lives and properties of the inhabitants. To oppose his arms we also have taken up arms. We should be wanting to ourselves, we should be perfidious to posterity, we should be unworthy that free ancestry from which we derive our descent, should we submit with folded arms to military butchery and depredation, to gratify the lordly ambition, or sate the avarice of a British ministry. We do, then, most solemnly, before God and the world declare that, regardless of every consequence, at the risk of every distress, the arms we have been compelled to assume we will use with perseverance, exerting to their utmost energies all those powers which our Creator hath given us, to preserve that liberty which he committed to us in sacred deposit and to protect from every hostile hand our lives and our properties.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 473. (July 1775.)

3342. GALLATIN (Albert), Ability.—The ablest man except the President [Madison] who was ever in the administration.—TO WILLIAM WIRT. v, 595. FORD ED., ix, 319. (M., May 1811.)

3343. ———. Our worthy, our able, and excellent minister [to France].—TO F. H. ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. vii, 75. FORD ED., x, 89. (M., 1817.)

3344. GALLATIN (Albert), Advertising for.—The minister for Geneva has desired me to have enquiries made after the Mr. Gallatin named in the within paper. I will pray you to have the necessary advertisements inserted in the papers, and to be so good as to favor me with the result.—TO JOHN JAY. i, 525. (P., 1786.)

3345. ———. I am to thank you on the part of the minister of Geneva for the intelligence it contained on the subject of Gallatin, whose relations will be relieved by the receipt of it.—TO JOHN JAY. i, 602. (P., 1786.)

3346. GALLATIN (Albert), Ark of safety.—There is no truer man than Mr. Gallatin, and after the President he is the ark of our safety.—TO DABNEY CARR. FORD ED., ix, 317. (M., 1811.)

3347. GALLATIN (Albert), Cabinet dissensions.—In the earlier part of the administration, you witnessed the malignant and long continued efforts which the Federalists exerted in their newspapers, to produce misunderstanding between Mr. Madison and myself. Those failed completely. A like attempt was afterwards made, through other channels, to effect a similar purpose between General Dearborn and myself, but with no more success. The machinations of the last session to put you at cross purposes with us all, were so obvious as to be seen at the first glance of every eye. In order to destroy one member of the administration, the whole were to be set to loggerheads to destroy one another. I observe in the papers lately, new attempts to revive this stale artifice, and that they squint more directly towards you and myself. I cannot, therefore, be satisfied, till I declare to you explicitly, that my affections and confidence in you are nothing impaired, and that they cannot be impaired by means so unworthy the notice of candid and honorable minds. I make the declaration, that no doubts or jealousies, which often beget the facts they fear, may find a moment's harbor in either of our minds.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 23. FORD ED., viii, 475. (W., Oct. 1806.)

3348. ———. I have reflected much and painfully on the change of dispositions which has taken place among the members of the cabinet * * *. It would be, indeed, a great public calamity were it to fix you in the purpose you seemed to think possible [resignation]. I consider the fortunes of our republic as depending, in an eminent degree, on the extinguishment of the public debt before we engage in any war: because, that done, we shall have revenue enough to improve our country in peace and defend it in war, without recurring either to new taxes or loans. But if the debt should once more be swelled to a formidable size, its entire discharge will be despaired of, and we shall be committed to the English career of debt, corruption and rottenness, closing with revolution. The discharge of the debt, therefore, is vital to the destinies of our government, and it hangs on Mr. Madison and yourself alone. We shall never see another President and Secretary of the Treasury making all other objects subordinate to this. Were either of you to be lost to the public, that great hope is lost. I had always cherished the idea that you would fix on that object the measure of your fame, and of the gratitude which our country will owe you. Nor can I yield up this prospect to the secondary considerations which assail your tranquillity. For, sure I am, they never can produce any other serious effect. Your value is too justly estimated by our fellow citizens at large, as well as their functionaries, to admit any remissness in their support of you. My opinion always was, that none of us ever occupied stronger ground in the esteem of Congress than yourself, and I am satisfied there is no one who does not feel your aid to be still as important for the future as it has been for the past. You have nothing, therefore, to apprehend in the dispositions of Congress, and still less of the President, who, above all men, is the most interested and affectionately disposed to support you. I hope, then, you will abandon entirely the idea you expressed to me, and that you will consider the eight years to come as essential to your political career. I should certainly consider any earlier day of your retirement, as the most inauspicious day our new government has ever seen. In addition to the common interest in this question, I feel particularly for myself the considerations of gratitude which I personally owe you for your valuable aid during my administration of public affairs, a just sense of the large portion of the public approbation which was earned by your labors and belongs to you, and the sincere friendship and attachment which grew out of our joint exertions to promote the common good.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 477. FORD ED., ix, 264. (M. Oct. 1809.)

3349. ———. The newspapers pretend that Mr. Gallatin will go out [of the cabinet]. That indeed would be a day of mourning for the United States.—TO DR. WALTER JONES. v, 510. FORD ED., ix, 273. (M., 1810.)

3350. GALLATIN (Albert), Courage.—I believe Mr. Gallatin to be of a pure integrity, and as zealously devoted to the liberties and interests of our country as its most affectionate native citizen. Of this his courage in Congress in the days of terror, gave proofs which nothing can obliterate from the recollection of those who were witnesses of it. * * * An intercourse, almost daily, of eight years with him, has given me opportunities of knowing his character more thoroughly than perhaps any other man living.—TO WILLIAM DUANE. v, 574. FORD ED., ix, 311. (M., 1811.)

3351. GALLATIN (Albert), Newspaper attacks.—I have seen with infinite grief the set which is made at you in the public papers, and with the more as my name has been so much used in it. I hope we both know one another too well to receive impression from circumstances of this kind. A twelve years' intimate and friendly intercourse must be better evidence to each of the dispositions of the other than the letters of foreign ministers to their courts, or tortured inferences from facts true or false. I have too thorough a conviction of your cordial good will towards me, and too strong a sense of the faithful and able assistance I received from you, to relinquish them on any evidence but of my own senses.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 538. (M., 1810.)

3352. GALLATIN (Albert), Support of the bank.—Mr. Gallatin's support of the bank has, I believe, been disapproved by many. He was not in Congress when that was established, and therefore had never committed himself, publicly, on the constitutionality of that institution, nor do I recollect ever to have heard him declare himself on it. I know he derived immense convenience from it, because they gave the effect of ubiquity to his money wherever deposited. * * * He was, therefore, cordial to the bank. I often pressed him to divide the public deposits among all the respectable banks, being indignant myself at the open hostility of that institution to a government on whose treasuries they were fattening. But his repugnance to it prevented my persisting. And if he was in favor of the bank, what is the amount of that crime or error in which he had a majority, save one, in each House of Congress as participators?—To WILLIAM WIRT. v, 595. FORD ED., ix, 318. (M., May 1811.)

3353. GALLATIN (Albert), Tribute to.—They say Mr. Gallatin was hostile to me. This is false. I was indebted to nobody for more cordial aid [during my administration] than to Mr. Gallatin, nor could any man more solicitously interest himself in behalf of another than he did of myself.—To WILLIAM WIRT. v, 594. FORD ED., ix, 318. (M., 1811.)

3354. GALLATIN (Albert), Usefulness.—I congratulate you sincerely on your safe return to your own country, and without knowing your own wishes, mine are that you would never leave it again. I know you would be useful to us at Paris, and so you would anywhere; but nowhere so useful as here.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 498. (M., 1815.)

3355. GAMBLING, Evils of.—Gaming corrupts our dispositions, and teaches us a habit of hostility against all mankind.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 389. (1787.)

— GARDENING.—See HORTICULTURE.

3356. GASTRONOMY, English.—I fancy it must be the quantity or animal food eaten by the English which renders their character insusceptible of civilization. I suspect it is in their kitchens, and not in their churches that their reformation must be worked, and that missionaries of that description from hence [Paris] would avail more than those who should endeavor to tame them by precepts of religion or philosophy.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., iv, 100. (P., 1785.)

3357. GASTRONOMY, French.—In the pleasures of the table they [the French] are far before us, because, with good taste they unite temperance. They do not terminate the most sociable meals by transforming themselves into brutes.—To Mr. BELLINI. i, 445. (P., 1785.)

rangements will not do without a certain degree of bravery and discipline in those who are to carry them into execution. This, the men whom you commanded, or the greater part of them at least, unfortunately wanted on that particular occasion. * I have not a doubt but that, on a fair enquiry, the returning justice of your countrymen will remind them of Saratoga, and induce them to recognize your merits.—To GENERAL GATES. i, 314. FORD ED., iii, 52. (M., 1781.)

3359. GATES (General Horatio), Civil office for.—General Gates would supply Short's place in the Council very well, and would act.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 403. (A., Feb. 1784.)

3361. — — —. Whether fortune means to allow or deny me the pleasure of ever seeing you again, be assured that the worth which gave birth to my attachment, and which still animates it, will continue to keep it up while we both live.—To BARON GEISMER. i, 428. (P., 1785.)

3362. GEM (Doctor), Solitude for.—I must ask you to see for me * * * and present my affectionate remembrances to him, Dr. Gem, an old English physician in the Faubourg St. Germain, who practiced only for his friends, and would take nothing, one of the most sensible and worthy men I have ever known.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 19. (M., 1795.)

3363. GENERALS, Brave.—Our militia are heroes when they have heroes to lead them.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 420. (FORD ED., ix, 504. (M., 1815.)

3364. GENERALS, Costly.—The seeing whether our untried generals will stand proof is a very dear operation. Two of them have cost us a great many men.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Nov. 1812.)

3365. — — —. The Creator has not thought proper to mark those in the forehead who are of stuff to make good generals. We are first, therefore, to seek them blindfold, and let them learn the trade at the expense of great losses.—To GENERAL BAILEY. vi, 100. (M., Feb. 1813.)

3366. — — —. Our only hope is that these misfortunes will at length elicit by trial the characters qualified by nature from those unqualified, to be entrusted with the destinies of their fellow citizens.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. FORD ED., ix, 380. (M., Feb. 1813.)

3367. GENERALS, Discipline and.—Good dispositions and arrangements will not do without a certain degree of bravery and discipline in those who are to carry them into execution.—To GENERAL GATES. i, 314. FORD ED., iii, 52. (1781.)

3368. GENERALS, Discovering.—Our war on the land has commenced most inauspiciously. I fear we are to expect reverses until we can find out who are qualified for command, and until these can learn their profession.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 99. (M., Jan. 1813.)

3369. ——. It is unfortunate that heaven has not set its stamp on the foreheads of those whom it has qualified for military achievement; that it has left us to draw for them in a lottery of so many blanks to a prize, and where the blank is to be manifested only by the public misfortunes. If nature had planted the fanum in cornu on the front of treachery, of cowardice, of imbecility, the unfortunate début we have made on the theatre of war would not have sunk our spirits at home, and our character abroad.—To GENERAL JOHN ARMSTRONG. vi, 103. (M., Feb. 1813.)

3371. GENERALS, Good.—Whenever we have good commanders, we shall have good soldiers, and good successes.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 380. (1813.)

3372. GENERALS, Incompetent.—On the land, indeed, we have been most unfortunate; so wretched a succession of generals never before destroyed the fairest expectations of a nation, counting on the bravery of its citizens, which has proved itself on all these trials.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 106. (M., March 1813.)

3374. ——. Will not [General] Van Rensselaer be broke for cowardice and incapacity? To advance such a body of men across a river without securing boats to bring them off in case of disaster, has cost 700 men; and to have taken no part himself in such an action, and against such a general would be nothing but cowardice.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Nov. 1812.)

3378. GENERALS, Losses through.—Three frigates taken by our gallant navy, do not balance in my mind three armies lost by the treachery, cowardice, or incapacity of those to whom they were intrusted. I see that our men are good, and only want generals.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 110. (M., April 1813.)

3379. GENERALS, Plumage of.—We can tell by his plumage whether a cock is dunghill or game. But with us cowardice and courage wear the same plume.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Nov. 1812.)

3380. GENERALS, Proving.—The proof of a general, to know whether he will stand fire, costs a more serious price than that of a cannon; these proofs have already cost us thousands of good men, and deplorable degradation of reputation, and as yet have elicited but a few negative and a few positive characters. But we must persevere till we recover the rank we are entitled to.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 99. (M., 1813.)

3381. GENERALS, Self-sacrificing.—I think with the Romans of old, that the general of to-day should be a common soldier to-morrow, if necessary.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 155. FORD ED., vii, 99. (1797.)

FORD ED., ii, 249. (Wg., 1779.)

3391. GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE,

Interpretation.—To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, that is to say, "to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare". For the laying of taxes is the power, and the general welfare the purpose for which the power is to be exercised. They are not to lay taxes ad libitum for any purpose they please; but only to pay the debts or provide for the welfare of the Union. In like manner, they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare, but only to lay taxes for that purpose. To consider the latter phrase, not as describing the purpose of the first, but as giving a distinct and independent power to do any act they please, which might be for the good of the Union, would render all the preceding and subsequent enumerations of power completely useless. It would reduce the whole instrument to a single phrase, that of instituting a Congress with power to do whatever would be for the good of the United States; and as they would be the sole judges of the good or evil, it would be also a power to do whatever evil they please. It is an established rule of construction where a phrase will bear either of two meanings, to give it that which will allow some meaning to the other parts of the instrument, and not that which would render all the others useless. Certainly no such universal power was meant to be given them.

It was intended to lace them up strictly within the enumerated powers, and those without which, as means, these powers could not be carried into effect.—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii, 557. FORD ED., v, 286. (1791.)

3392. — — —. The Constitution says, "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, &c., provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States". I suppose the meaning of this clause to be, that Congress may collect taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare, in those cases wherein the Constitution empowers them to act for the general welfare. To suppose that it was meant to give them a distinct substantive power, to do any act which might tend to the general welfare, is to render all the enumerations useless, and to make their powers unlimited.—OPINION ON FUGITIVE SLAVES. vii, 602. FORD ED., vi, 141. (Dec. 1792.)

3393. — — —. The construction applied by the General Government (as is evidenced by sundry of their proceedings) to those parts of the Constitution of the United States which delegate to Congress a power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States", and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof", goes to the destruction of all limits prescribed to their power by the Constitution. * * * Words meant by the instrument to be subsidiary only to the execution of limited powers, ought not to be so construed as themselves to give unlimited powers, nor a part to be so taken as to destroy the whole residue of that instrument.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 468. FORD ED., vii, 299. (1798.)

3394. GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE,

Manufactures.—I told the President [Washington] that they [the Hamilton party in Congress] had now brought forward a proposition, far beyond every one ever yet advanced, and to which the eyes of many were turned as the decision which was to let us know, whether we live under a limited or an unlimited government, * * * [to wit] that in the Report on Manufactures which, under color of giving bounties for the encouragement of particular manufactures meant to establish the doctrine, that the power given by the Constitution to collect taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, permitted Congress to take everything under their management which they should deem for the public welfare, and which is susceptible of the application of money; consequently, that the subsequent enumeration of their powers was not the description to which resort must be had, and did not at all constitute the limits of their authority; that this was a very different question from that of the Bank [of the United States], which was thought an incident to an enumerated power; that, therefore, this decision was expected with great anxiety; that, indeed, I hoped the proposition would be rejected, believing there was a majority in both Houses against it, and that if it should be, it would be considered as a proof that things were returning into their true channel.—THE ANAS. ix, 104. FORD ED., i, 177. (Feb. 1792.)

3395. — — —. In a Report on the subject of manufactures, it was expressly assumed that the General Government has a right to exercise all powers which may be for the general welfare, that is to say, all the legitimate powers of government; since no government has a legitimate right to do what is not for the welfare of the governed. There was, indeed, a sham limitation of the universality of this power to cases where money is to be employed. But about what is it that money cannot be employed?—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 461. FORD ED., vi, 103. (M., 1792.)

3396. GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE, Universal power.—An act for internal improvement, after passing both houses, was negatived by the President. The act was founded, avowedly, on the principle that the phrase in the Constitution which authorizes Congress "to lay taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare", was an extension of the powers specifically enumerated to whatever would promote the general welfare; and this, you know, was the federal doctrine. Whereas, our tenet ever was, and, indeed, it is almost the only landmark which now divides the federalists from the republicans, that Congress had not unlimited powers to provide for the general welfare, but were restrained to those specifically enumerated; and that, as it was never meant they should provide for that welfare but by the exercise of the enumerated powers, so it could not have been meant they should raise money for purposes which the enumeration did not place under their action; consequently, that the specification of powers is a limitation of the purposes for which they may raise money. * * * This phrase * * * by a mere grammatical quibble, has countenanced the General Government in a claim of universal power. For in the phrase, "to lay taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare", it is a mere question of syntax, whether the two last infinitives are governed by the first or are distinct and coordinate powers; a question unequivocally decided by the exact definition of powers immediately following.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 78. FORD ED., x, 91. (M., June 1817.)

3397. — — —. I hope our courts will never countenance the sweeping pretensions which have been set up under the words "general defence and public welfare". These words only express the motives which induced the Convention to give to the ordinary legislature certain specified powers which they enumerate, and which they thought might be trusted to the ordinary legislature, and not to give them the unspecified also; or why any specification? They could not be so awkward in language as to mean, as we say, "all and some". And should this construction prevail, all limits to the Federal Government are done away. This opinion, formed on the first rise of the question, I have never seen reason to change, whether in or out of power; but, on the contrary, find it strengthened and confirmed by five and twenty years of additional reflection and experience: and any countenance given to it by any regular organ of the government, I should consider more ominous than anything which has yet occurred.—To SPENCER ROANE. vi, 494. FORD ED., ix, 531. (M., 1815.)

3398. GENERATIONS, Binding power.

—The question whether one generation of men has a right to bind another, seems never to have been started either on this or our side of the water. Yet it is a question of such consequences as not only to merit decision, but place also, among the fundamental principles of every government. The course of reflection in which we are immersed here [Paris], on the elementary principles of society, has presented this question to my mind; and that no such obligation can be transmitted, I think very capable of proof. I set out on this ground, which I suppose to be self-evident, that the earth belongs in usufruct to the living; that the dead have neither powers nor rights over it. The portion occupied by an individual ceases to be his when himself ceases to be, and reverts to the society. If the society has formed no rules for the appropriation of its lands in severalty, it will be taken by the first occupants, and these will generally be the wife and children of the decedent. If they have formed rules of appropriation, those rules may give it to the wife and children, or to some one of them, or to the legatee of the deceased. So they may give it to its creditor. But the child, the legatee or creditor, takes it, not by natural right, but by a law of the society of which he is a member, and to which he is subject. Then, no man can, by natural right, oblige the lands he occupied, or the persons who succeed him in that occupation, to the payment of debts contracted by him. For if he could, he might during his own life, eat up the usufruct of the lands for several generations to come; and then the lands would belong to the dead, and not to the living, which is the reverse of our principle. What is true of every member of the society, individually, is true of them all collectively; since the rights of the whole can be no more than the sum of the rights of the individuals. To keep our ideas clear when applying them to a multitude, let us suppose a whole generation of men to be born on the same day, to attain mature age on the same day, and to die on the same day, leaving a succeeding generation in the moment of attaining their mature age, all together. Let the ripe age be supposed of twenty-one years, and their period of life thirty-four years more, that being the average term given by the bills of mortality to persons of twenty-one years of age. Each successive generation would, in this way, come and go off the stage at a fixed moment, as individuals do now. Then I say, the earth belongs to each of these generations during its course, fully, and in its own right. The second generation receives it clear of the debts and incumbrances of the first, the third of the second, and so on. For if the first could charge it with a debt, then the earth would belong to the dead and not to the living generation. Then, no generation can contract debts greater than may be paid during the course of its own existence. At twenty-one years of age, they may bind themselves and their lands for thirty-four years to come; at twenty-two, for thirty-three; at twenty-three, for thirty-two; and at fifty-four, for one year only; because these are the terms of life which remain to them at the respective epochs. But a material difference must be noted between the succession of an individual and that of a whole generation. Individuals are parts only of a society, subject to the laws of a whole. These laws may appropriate the portion of land occupied by a decedent to his creditor rather to any other, or to his child, on condition he satisfies the creditor. But when a whole generation, that is, the whole society dies, as in the case we have supposed, and another generation or society succeeds, this forms a whole, and there is no superior who can give their territory to a third society, who may have lent money to their predecessors beyond their faculties of paying.

What is true of a generation all arriving to self-government on the same day, and dying all on the same day, is true of those on a constant course of decay and renewal, with this only difference. A generation coming in and going out entire, as in the first case, would have a right in the first year of their self-dominion to contract a debt for thirty-three years; in the tenth, for twenty-four; in the twentieth, for fourteen; in the thirtieth, for four; whereas generations changing daily, by daily deaths and births, have one constant term beginning at the date of their contract, and ending when a majority of those of full age at that date shall be dead. The length of that term may be estimated from the tables of mortality, corrected by the circumstances of climate, occupation, &c., peculiar to the country of the contractors. Take, for instance, the table of M. de Buffon wherein he states that 23,994 deaths, and the ages at which they happened. Suppose a society in which 23,994 persons are born every year, and live to the ages stated in this table. The conditions of that society will be as follows. First, it will consist constantly of 617,703 persons of all ages; secondly, of those living at any one instant of time, one-half will be dead in twenty-four years, eight months; thirdly, 10,675 will arrive every year at the age of twenty-one years complete; fourthly, it will constantly have 348,417 persons of all ages above twenty-one years; fifthly, and the half of those of twenty-one years and upwards, living at any one instant of time, will be dead in eighteen years, eight months, or say nineteen years as the nearest integral number. Then nineteen years is the term beyond which neither the representatives of a nation, nor even the whole nation itself assembled, can validly extend a debt.

To render this conclusion palpable by example, suppose that Louis XIV. and XV. had contracted debts in the name of the French nation to the amount of ten thousand millions of livres, and that the whole had been contracted in Genoa. The interest of this sum would be five hundred millions, which is said to be the whole rent-roll, or net proceeds of the territory of France. Must the present generation of men have retired from the territory in which nature produced them, and ceded it to the Dutch creditors? No; they have the rights over the soil on which they were produced, as the preceding generations had. They derive these rights not from their predecessors, but from nature. They, then, and their soil, are by nature clear of the debts of their predecessors. Again, suppose Louis XV. and his contemporary generation had said to the money lenders of Holland, give us money that we may eat, drink, and be merry in our day; and on condition you will demand no interest till the end of nineteen years, you shall then forever after receive an annual interest of 12.5 per cent. The money is lent on these conditions, is divided among the living, eaten, drunk, and squandered. Would the present generation be obliged to apply the produce of the earth, and of their labor to replace their dissipations? Not at all.

I suppose that the received opinion, that the public debts of one generation devolve on the next, has been suggested by our seeing habitually in private life that he who succeeds to lands is required to pay the debts of his ancestor or testator, without considering that this requisition is municipal only, not moral, flowing from the will of the society, which has found it convenient to appropriate the lands become vacant by the death of their occupant on the condition of a payment of his debts; but that between society and society, or generation and generation, there is no municipal obligation, no umpire but the law of nature. We seem not to have perceived that, by the law of nature, one generation is to another as one independent nation to another.

The interest of the national debt of France being in fact but a two thousandth part of its rent-roll, the payment of it is practicable enough; and so becomes a question merely of honor or of expediency. But with respect to future debts, would it not be wise and just for that nation to declare in the constitution they are forming that neither the legislature, nor the nation itself can validly contract more debt than they may pay within their own age, or within the term of nineteen years. And that all future contracts shall be deemed void as to what shall remain unpaid at the end of nineteen years from their date? This would put the lenders, and the borrowers also, on their guard. By reducing, too, the faculty of borrowing within its natural limits, it would bridle the spirit of war, to which too free a course has been procured by the inattention of money lenders to this law of nature, that succeeding generations are not responsible for the preceding.

On similar ground, it may be proved that no society can make a perpetual constitution, or even a perpetual law. The earth belongs always to the living generation. They may manage it, then, and what proceeds from it, as they please, during their usufruct. They are masters, too, of their own persons, and consequently may govern them as they please. But persons and property make the sum of the object of government. The constitution and the laws of their predecessors are extinguished, then, in their natural course, with those whose will gave them being. This could preserve that being till it ceased to be itself, and no longer. Every constitution, then, and every law, naturally expire at the end of nineteen years. If it be enforced longer, it is an act of force and not of right.

It may be said that the succeeding generation exercising in fact the power of repeal, this leaves them as free as if the constitution or law had been expressly limited to nineteen years only. In the first place, this objection admits the right, in proposing an equivalent. But the power of repeal is not an equivalent. It might be, indeed, if every form of government were so perfectly contrived that the will of the majority could always be obtained fairly and without impediment. But this is true of no form. The people cannot assemble themselves; their representation is unequal and vicious. Various checks are opposed to every legislative proposition. Factions get possession of the public councils. Bribery corrupts them. Personal interests lead them astray from the general interests of their constituents; and other impediments arise so as to prove to every practical man that a law of limited duration is much more manageable than one which needs a repeal.

This principle that the earth belongs to the living and not to the dead, is of very extensive application and consequences in every country, and most especially in France. It enters into the resolution of the questions, whether the nation may change the descent of lands holden in tail; whether they may change the appropriation of lands given anciently to the church, to hospitals, colleges, orders of chivalry, and otherwise in perpetuity; whether they may abolish the charges and privileges attached on lands, including the whole catalogue, ecclesiastical and feudal; it goes to hereditary orders, distinctions and appellations, to perpetual monopolies in commerce, the arts or sciences, with a long train of et ceteras; and it renders the question of reimbursement a question of generosity and not of right. In all these cases, the legislature of the day could authorize such appropriations and establishments for their own time, but no longer, and the present holders, even where they or their ancestors have purchased, are in the case of bona fide purchasers of what the seller had no right to convey.

Turn this subject in your mind, and particularly as to the power of contracting debts, and develop it with that perspicuity and cogent logic which is so peculiarly yours. Your station in the public councils of our country gives you an opportunity of forcing it into discussion. At first blush it may be rallied as a theoretical speculation; but examination will prove it to be solid and salutary. It would furnish matter for a fine preamble to our first law for appropriating the public revenue; and it will exclude, at the threshold of our new government, the contagious and ruinous errors of this quarter of the globe, which have armed despots with means not sanctioned by nature for binding in chains their fellow men. We have already seen, in example, one effectual check to the fog of war, by transferring the power of letting him loose from the Executive to the Legislative body, from those who are to spend to those who are to pay. I should be pleased to see this second obstacle held out also in the first instance. No nation can make a declaration against the validity of long-contracted debts so disinterestedly as we, since we do not owe a shilling which will not be paid with ease, principal and interest, within the time of our own lives. Establish the principle also in the new law to be passed for protecting copyrights and new inventions, by securing the exclusive right for nineteen instead of fourteen years [a line entirely faded], an instance the more of our talking-reason for our guide instead of English precedents, the habit of which fetters us with all the political heresies of a nation, equally remarkable for its excitement from some errors, as long slumbering under others.*—To

* The hurry in which I wrote * * * to Mr. Madison * * *, occasioned an inattention to the difference between generations succeeding each other at fixed

3389. ——. Can one generation of men, by any act of theirs, bind those which are to follow them? I say, by the laws of nature, there being between generation and generation, as between nation and nation, no other obligatory law.—To JOSEPH W. CABELL. vi, 299. (M., 1814.)

3400. GENERATIONS, The Earth and.—Every generation comes equally, by the laws of the Creator of the world, to the free possession of the earth which He made for their subsistence, unincumbered by their predecessors, who, like, them, were but tenants for life.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 605. FORD ED., x, 28. (M., May 1816.)

3401. ——. That our Creator made the earth for the use of the living and not of the dead; that those who exist not can have no use nor right in it, no authority or power over it; that one generation of men cannot foreclose or burthen its use to another, which comes to it in its own right and by the same divine beneficence; that a preceding generation cannot bind a succeeding one by its laws or contracts; these deriving their obligation from the will of the existing majority, and that majority being removed by death, another comes in its place with a will equally free to make its own laws and contracts; these are axioms so self-evident that no explanation can make them plainer; for he is not to be reasoned with who says that non-existence can control existence, or that nothing can move something. They are axioms also pregnant with salutary consequences. The laws of civil society, indeed, for the encouragement of industry, give the property of the parent to his family on his death, and in most civilized countries permit him even to give it, by testament, to whom he pleases. And it is also found more convenient to suffer the laws of our predecessors to stand on our implied assent, as if positively reenacted, until the existing majority positively repeals them. But this does not lessen the right of that majority to repeal whenever a change of circumstances or of will calls for it. Habit alone confounds what is civil practice with natural right.—To THOMAS EARLE. vii, 310. (M., 1823.)

3402. ——. Can one generation bind another, and all others, in succession forever? I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the living, not the dead. Rights and epochs, and generations renewed daily and hourly. It is true that in the former case the generation, when at 21 years of age, may contract a debt for 34 years, because a majority of them will live so long. But a generation consisting of all ages, and which legislates by all its members above the age of 21 years, cannot contract for so long a time, because their majority will be dead much sooner. Buffon gives us a table of 23,004 deaths, stating the ages at which they happened. To draw from these the result I have occasion for, I suppose a society in which 23,004 persons are born every year and live to the ages stated in Buffon's table. Then the following inferences may be drawn. Such a society will consist constantly of 617,703 persons of all ages. Of those living at one instant of time, one-half will be dead in 24 years 8 months. In such a society, 10,675 will arrive every year at the age of 21 years complete. It will constantly have 348,417 persons of all ages above 21 years, and the half of those of 21 years and upwards living at any one instant of time will be dead in 18 years 8 months, or say 10 years. "Then, the contracts, constitutions and laws of every such society become void in 10 years from their date."—To DR. GEM. iii, 108. FORD ED., v, 124. (P., 1789.)

powers can only belong to persons, not to things, not to mere matter, unendowed with will. The dead are not even things. The particles of matter which composed their bodies, make part now of the bodies of other animals, vegetables, or minerals, of a thousand forms. To what, then, are attached the rights and powers they held while in the form of men? A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, holds all the rights and powers their predecessors once held, and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves. Nothing, then, is unchangeable but the inherent and unalienable rights of man.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 359. (M., 1824.)

3403. GENERATIONS, Government and.—Let us * * * not weakly believe that one generation is not as capable as another of taking care of itself, and of ordering its own affairs. Let us, as our sisters have done, avail ourselves of our reason and experience, to correct the crude essays of our first and unexperienced, although wise, virtuous, and well-meaning councils. And lastly, let us provide in our constitution for its revision at stated periods. What these periods should be, nature herself indicates. By the European tables of mortality, of the adults living at any one moment of time, a majority will be dead in about nineteen years. At the end of that period, then, a new majority is come into place; or, in other words, a new generation. Each generation is as independent of the one preceding as that was of all which had gone before. It has, then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness; consequently, to accommodate to the circumstances in which it finds itself, that received from its predecessors; and it is for the peace and good of mankind, that a solemn opportunity of doing this every nineteen or twenty years, should be provided by the constitution; so that it may be handed on, with periodical repairs, from generation to generation, to the end of time, if anything human can so long endure. It is now forty years since the constitution of Virginia was formed. The same tables inform us that, within that period, two-thirds of the adults then living are now dead. Have, then, the remaining third, even if they had the wish, the right to hold in obedience to their will, and to the laws heretofore made by them, the other two-thirds, who, with themselves, compose the present mass of adults? If they have not, who has? The dead? But the dead have no rights. They are nothing and nothing cannot own something. Where there is no substance, there can be no accident. This corporeal globe, and everything upon it, belong to its present corporeal inhabitants, during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction; and this declaration can only be made by their majority.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 15. FORD ED., x, 43. (M., 1816.)

3404. — — —. My wish is * * * to leave to those who are to live under it the settlement of their own constitution, and to pass in peace the remainder of my time.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 35. FORD ED., x, 45. (M., 1816.)

3405. — — —. I willingly acquiesce in the institutions of my country, perfect or imperfect; and think it a duty to leave their modifications to those who are to live under them, and are to participate of the good or evil they may produce. The present generation has the same right of self-government which the past one has exercised for itself.—To JOHN H. PLEASANTS. vii, 346. FORD ED., x, 303. (M., 1824.)

3406. — — —. I willingly leave to the present generation to conduct their affairs as they please.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 392. FORD ED., x, 335. (M., 1825.)

3407. GENERATIONS, Succession of.—It is a law of nature that the generations of men should give way, one to another, and I hope that the one now on the stage will preserve for their sons the political blessings delivered into their hands by their fathers.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 211. FORD ED., x, 188. (M., 1821.)

3408. — — —. I yield the concerns of the world with cheerfulness to those who are appointed in the order of nature to succeed to them.—To GENERAL BRECKENRIDGE. vii, 206. (M., 1821.)

3409. GENERATIONS, Wisdom and.—Those who will come after us will be as wise as we are, and as able to take care of themselves as we have been.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 584. FORD ED., ix, 322. (M., 1811.)

3410. — — —. I withdraw from all contests of opinion, and resign everything cheerfully to the generation now in place. They are wiser than we were, and their successors will be wiser than they, from the progressive advance of science.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 136. FORD ED., x, 142. (P.F., 1819.)

3411. — — —. The daily advance of science will enable the existing generation to administer the commonwealth with increased wisdom.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 327. FORD ED., x, 283. (M., 1823.)

3412. GENEROSITY, Pleasures of.—Take more pleasure in giving what is best to another than in having it yourself, and then all the world will love you, and I more than all the world.—To MARY JEFFERSON. D. L. J., 181. (N.Y., 1790.)

3413. GENET (E. C.), Arrival.—We expect M. Genet in Philadelphia within a few days. It seems as if his arrival would furnish occasion for the people to testify their affections without respect to the cold caution of their government.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 232. (Pa., April 1793.)

3414. GENET (E. C.), Calamitous appointment.—Never, in my opinion was so calamitous an appointment made as that of the present minister of France here. Hot-headed, all imagination, no judgment, passionate, disrespectful, and even indecent towards the President, in his written as well as verbal communications, talking of appeals from him to Congress, from them to the people, urging the most unreasonable and groundless propositions, and in the most dictatorial style, &c., &c., &c. If ever it should be necessary to lay his communications before Congress or the public, they will excite universal indignation. He renders my position immensely difficult. He does me justice personally, and, giving him time to vent himself, and then cool, I am on a footing to advise him freely, and he respects it; but he breaks out again on the very first occasion, so as to show that he is incapable of correcting himself. To complete our misfortune, we have no channel of our own through which we can correct the irritating representations he may make.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 338. (July 1793.)

3415. ——. Mr. Genet had been then but a little time with us; and but a little more was necessary to develop in him a character and conduct so unexpected, and so extraordinary, as to place us in the most distressing dilemma, between our regard for his nation, which is constant and sincere, and a regard for our laws, the authority of which must be maintained, which the Executive Magistrate is charged to preserve; for its honor, offended in the person of that Magistrate; and for its character grossly traduced in the conversations and letters of this gentleman.—To GOVERNEUR MORRIS. iv, 31. FORD ED., vi, 372. (Pa., Aug. 1793.)

3416. GENET, Correspondence with.—We have kept the correspondence with Genet merely personal, convinced his nation will disapprove him. To them we have with the utmost assiduity given every proof of inviolate attachment.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 86. (G., Nov. 1793.)

3417. GENET, Functions.—Your functions as the missionary of a foreign nation here, are confined to the transactions of the affairs of your nation with the Executive of the United States; and the communications which are to pass between the Executive and Legislative branches, cannot be a subject for your interference. The President must be left to judge for himself what matters his duty or the public good may require him to propose to the deliberations of Congress.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 100. FORD ED., vi, 496. (Pa., Dec. 1793.)

3418. GENET, Ignorance of.—Genet has been fully heard on his most unfounded pretensions under the treaty. His ignorance of everything written on the subject is astonishing. I think he has never read a book of any sort in that branch of science.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 362. (Aug. 1793.)

3419. GENET (E. C.), Impetuosity.—I do not augur well of the mode of conduct of the new French minister; I fear he will enlarge the circle of those disaffected to his country. I am doing everything in my power to moderate the impetuosity of his movements, and to destroy the dangerous opinion which has been excited in him, that the people of the United States will disavow the acts of their Government, and that he has an appeal from the Executive to Congress, and from both to the people.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 7. FORD ED., vi, 323. (Pa., June 1793.)

* Marshall, in his Life of Washington says: "The partiality for France that was conspicuous through the whole of the correspondence, detracted nothing from its merit in the opinion of the friends of the Administration, because, however decided their determination to support their own Government in any controversy with any nation whatever, they felt all the partialities for that Republic which the correspondence expressed. The hostility of his [Jefferson's] enemies, therefore, was, for a time considerably lessened, without a corresponding diminution of the attachment of his friends."—EDITOR.

† Genet had sent to Jefferson translations of the instructions given him by the Executive Council of France with a request that they should be laid before Congress by the President. Jefferson returned the papers to Genet.—EDITOR.

3420. GENET (E. C.), Indefensible conduct.—His conduct is indefensible by the most furious Jacobin.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 20. FORD ED., vi, 348. (Pa., July 1793.)

3421. ——. His conduct has given room for the enemies of liberty and of France, to come forward in a style of acrimony against that nation, which they never would have dared to have done. The disapprobation of the agent mingles with the reprehension of his nation, and gives a toleration to that which it never had before. He has still some defenders in Freneau, and Greenleaf's paper, who they are I know not; for even Hutcheson and Dallas give him up. * * * Hutcheson says that Genet has totally overturned the republican interest in Philadelphia. However, the people going right themselves, if they always see their republican advocates with them, an accidental meeting with the monocrats will not be a coalescence.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 53. FORD ED., vi, 402. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

3422. GENET (E. C.), Instructions.—It is impossible for anything to be more affectionate, more magnanimous than the purport of [M. Genet's] mission. "We know that under present circumstances we have a right to call upon you for the guarantee of our Islands. But we do not desire it. We wish you to do nothing but what is for your own good, and we will do all in our power to promote it. Cherish your own peace and prosperity. You have expressed a willingness to enter into a more liberal treaty of commerce with us; I bring full powers (and he produced them) to form such a treaty, and a preliminary decree of the National Convention to lay open our country and its Colonies to you for every purpose of utility, without your participating the burthens of maintaining and defending them. We see in you the only person on earth who can love us sincerely, and merit to be so loved." In short, he offers everything, and asks nothing. Yet I know the offers will be opposed, and suspect they will not be accepted. In short, it is impossible for you to conceive what is passing in our conclave; and it is evident that one or two at least, under pretence of avoiding war on the one side have no great antipathy to run foul of it on the other, and to make a part in the confederacy of princes against human liberty.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 563. FORD ED., vi, 260. (Pa., May 1793.)

3423. GENET, Libelous attack on.—The Minister Plenipotentiary of France has enclosed to me the copy of a letter * * * which he addressed to you, stating that some libelous publications had been made against him by Mr. Jay, Chief-Justice of the United States, and Mr. King, one of the Senators for the State of New York, and desiring that they might be prosecuted. This letter has been laid before the President, according to the request of the Minister; and the President, never doubting your readiness on all occasions to perform the functions of your office, yet thinks it incumbent on him to recommend it specially on the present occasion, as it concerns a public character peculiarly entitled to the protection of the laws. On the other hand, as our citizens ought not to be vexed with groundless prosecutions, duty to them requires it to be added, that if you judge the prosecution in question to be of that nature, you consider this recommendation as not extending to it; its only object being to engage you to proceed in this case according to the duties of your office

[Attorney General], the laws of the land, and the privileges of the parties concerned.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. iv, 97. FORD ED., vi, 484. (Pa., Dec. 1793.)

3424. GENET (E. C.), Opposition to Law.—Genet has, at New York, forbidden a marshal to arrest a vessel, and given orders to the French squadron to protect her by force. Was there ever an instance before of a diplomatic man overawing and obstructing the course of the law in a country by an armed force?—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 64. FORD ED., vi, 418. (Sep. 1793.)

3425. GENET, Recall of.—[At a cabinet meeting] to consider what was to be done with Mr. Genet, * * * the following propositions were made: 1. That a full statement of Mr. Genet's conduct be made in a letter to G. Morris, and be sent with his correspondence, to be communicated to the Executive Council of France; the letter to be so prepared, as to serve for the form of communication to the Council. Agreed unanimously. 2. That in that letter his recall be required. Agreed by all, although I expressed a preference of expressing that desire with great delicacy; the others were for peremptory terms. 3. To send him off. This was proposed by Knox; but rejected by every other. 4. To write a letter to Mr. Genet, the same in substance with that written to G. Morris, and let him know we had applied for his recall. I was against this, because I thought it would render him extremely active in his plans, and endanger confusion. But I was overruled by the other three gentlemen and the President. 5. That a publication of the whole correspondence, and statement of the proceedings, should be made by way of appeal to the people. Hamilton made a jury speech of three-quarters of an hour, as inflammatory and declamatory as if he had been speaking to a jury. E. Randolph opposed it. I chose to leave the contest between them.—THE ANAS. ix, 162. FORD ED., i, 252. (Aug. 1793.)

3426. ——. The renvoi of Genet was proposed [in cabinet] by the President. I opposed it on these topics. France, the only nation on earth sincerely our friend. The measure so harsh a one, that no precedent is produced where it has not been followed by war. Our messenger has now been gone eighty-four days; consequently, we may hourly expect the return, and to be relieved by their revocation of him. Were it now resolved on, it would be eight or ten days before the matter on which the order should be founded, could be selected, arranged, discussed, and forwarded. This would bring us within four or five days of the meeting of Congress. Would it not be better to wait and see how the pulse of that body, new as it is, would beat? They are with us now, probably, but such a step as this may carry many over to Genet's side. Genet will not obey the order, &c., &c. The President asked me what I would do if Genet sent the accusation to us to be communicated to Congress, as he threatened in a letter to Moultrie? I said I would not send it to Congress; but either put it in the newspapers, or send it back to him to be published if he pleased.*—THE ANAS. ix, 179. FORD ED., i, 267. (Nov. 1793.)

will sink the republican interest if they do not abandon him.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 361. (Aug. 1793.)

3428. * ——. Lay the case * * * immediately before his government. Accompany it with assurances, which cannot be stronger than true, that our friendship for the nation is constant and unabating; that, faithful to our treaties, we have fulfilled them in every point to the best of our understanding; that if in anything, however, we have construed them amiss, we are ready to enter into candid explanations, and to do whatever we can be convinced is right; that in opposing the extravagances of an agent, whose character they seem not sufficiently to have known, we have been urged by motives of duty to ourselves and justice to others, which cannot but be approved by those who are just themselves; and finally, that after independence and self-government, there is nothing we more sincerely wish than perpetual friendship with them.*—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iv, 50. FORD ED., vi, 393. (P., Aug. 16, 1793.)

3429. ——. It is with extreme concern I have to inform you that the proceedings of the person, whom the [French government] have unfortunately appointed their Minister Plenipotentiary here, have breathed nothing of the friendly spirit of the nation which sent him. Their tendency, on the contrary, has been to involve us in a war abroad, and discord and anarchy at home. So far as his acts, or those of his agents, have threatened our immediate commitment in the war, or flagrant insult to the authority of the laws, their effect has been counteracted by the ordinary cognizance of the laws, and by an exertion of the powers confided to me. Where their danger was not imminent, they have been borne with, from sentiments of regard to his nation, and from a sense of their friendship towards us, from a conviction that they would not suffer us to remain long exposed to the action of a person who has so little respected our mutual dispositions, and, I will add, from a firm reliance on the firmness of my fellow citizens in their principles of peace and order.—DRAFT OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE. FORD ED., vi, 457. (Nov. 1793.)

3430. GENET (E. C.), Reception of.—It was suspected that there was not a clear mind in the President's counsellors to receive Genet. The citizens, however, determined to receive him. Arrangements were taken for meeting him at Gray's Ferry in a great body. He escaped that by arriving in town with the letters which brought information that he was on the road. * * * The citizens determined to address Genet. Rittenhouse, Hutcheson, Dallas, Sargent, &c., were at the head of it. Though a select body of only thirty was appointed to present it, yet a vast concourse of people attended them. I have not seen it; but it is understood to be the counter address to the one presented to the President on the neutrality proclaimed, by the merchants, i. e., Fitzsimmons & Co. It contained much wisdom but no affection.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 562. FORD ED., vi, 260. (Pa., May 1793.)

3431. GENET (E. C.), Treachery.—I sometimes cannot help seriously believing Genet to be a Dumouriez, endeavoring to draw us into the war against France as Dumouriez.

* This quotation is the closing paragraph of the instructions to Gouverneur Morris, respecting the recall of Genet.—EDITOR.

while a minister, drew on her the war of the empire.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 419. (1793.)

3432. GENET (E. C.), Washington and.—His inveteracy against the President leads him to meditate the embroiling him with Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 75. FORD ED., vi, 439. (Nov. 1793.)

3434. — — —. Genet has thrown down the gauntlet to the President by the publication of his letter and my answer, and is himself forcing that appeal to the people, and risking that disgust which I had so much wished should have been avoided. The indications from different parts of the continent are already sufficient to show that the mass of the republican interest has no hesitation to disapprove of this intermeddling by a foreigner, and the more readily as his object was evidently, contrary to his professions, to force us into the war. I am not certain whether some of the more furious republicans may not schimatize with him.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 52. FORD ED., vi, 397. (Pa., Aug. 1793.)

3435. GENIUS, Encouraging.—For promoting the public happiness, those persons whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue, should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth, birth, or other accidental condition or circumstance.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1779.)

3436. GENIUS, Higher.—Though * * * I am duly impressed with a sense of the arduousness of government, and the obligation those are under who are able to conduct it, yet I am also satisfied there is an order of geniuses above that obligation, and, therefore, exempted from it. Nobody can conceive that nature ever intended to throw away a Newton upon the occupations of a crown. * * * Cooperating with nature in her ordinary economy, we should dispose of and employ the geniuses of men according to their several orders and degrees.—To DAVID RITTENHOUSE. FORD ED., ii, 163. (M., 1778.)

3437. GEOGRAPHICAL LINES, Divisions on.—A geographical division * * * is a most fatal of all divisions, as no authority will submit to be governed by a majority acting merely on a geographical principle.—To SAMUEL H. SMITH. FORD ED., x, 191. (M., 1821.) See MISSOURI.

3438. GEORGE III., Appeal to.—No longer persevere in sacrificing the rights of one part of the empire to the inordinate desires of the other; but deal out to all equal and impartial right. Let no act be passed by any one legislature, which may infringe on the rights and liberties of another. This is the important post in which fortune has placed you, holding the balance of a great, if a well-poised empire. This, Sire, is the advice of your great American council, on the observance of which may perhaps depend your felicity and future fame, and the preservation of that harmony which alone can continue, both to Great Britain and America, the reciprocal advantages of their connection. It is neither our wish nor our interest to separate from her. We are willing, on our part, to sacrifice everything which reason can ask to the restoration of that tranquillity for which all most wish. On their part, let them be ready to establish union on a generous plan. Let them name their terms, but let them be just. * * * The God who gave us life, gave us liberty at the same time: the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them. This, Sire, is our last, our determined resolution. And that you will be pleased to interpose with that efficacy which your earnest endeavors may insure to procure redress of these our great grievances, to quiet the minds of your subjects in British America against any apprehensions of future encroachment, to establish fraternal love and harmony through the whole empire, and that that may continue to the latest ages of time, is the fervent prayer of all British America.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

3439. GEORGE III., Bitterness of.—His obstinacy of character we know; his hostility we have known, and it is embittered by ill success. If ever this nation, during his life, enter into arrangements with us, it must be in consequence of events of which they do not at present see a possibility.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE. i, 541. FORD ED., iv, 207. (L., 1786.)

3440. GEORGE III., Control of.—His [George III.] minister is able, and that satisfies me that ignorance or wickedness, somewhere, controls him [the King].*—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 203. FORD ED., i, 493. (Pa., 1775.)

3441. GEORGE III., Deposed.—Be it enacted by the authority of the people that George — Guelf be, and he hereby is, deposed from the kingly office within this government [of Virginia], and absolutely divested of all its rights, powers, and prerogatives: and that he and his descendants and all persons acting by or through him, and all other persons whatsoever shall be, and forever remain, incapable of the same: and that the said office shall henceforth cease and never more, either in name or substance, be reestablished within this Colony.—PROPOSED VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 12. (June 1776.)

3442. — — —. George Guelf has forfeited the kingly office, and has rendered it necessary for the preservation of the people that he should be immediately deposed from the same, and divested of all its privileges, powers and prerogatives.—PROPOSED VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 12. (June 1776.)

3443. GEORGE III., Early reign of.—The following is an epitome of the first sixteen years of his reign: The Colonies were taxed internally and externally; their essential interests sacrificed to individuals in Great Britain: their legislatures suspended; charters annulled;

* Parton in his Life of Jefferson. p. 180. says: "This remark is interesting, as showing that Jefferson, at a time when the fact was not generally known, felt that a man of the calibre of Lord North was out of place in the cabinet of George III., and did not in his heart approve the King's policy."—EDITOR.

trials by jury taken away; their persons subjected to transportation across the Atlantic, and to trial before foreign judicatories; their supplications for redress thought beneath answer; themselves published as cowards in the councils of their mother country and courts of Europe; armed troops sent among them to enforce submission to these violences; and actual hostilities commenced against them. No alternative was presented but resistance, or unconditional submission. Between these could be no hesitation. They closed in the appeal to arms. They declared themselves independent States. They confederated together into one great republic; thus securing to every State the benefit of an union of their whole force.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 358. FORD ED., iii, 221. (1782.)

3444. GEORGE III., History and.—Open your breast, Sire, to liberal and expanded thought. Let not the name of George the Third be a blot on the page of history.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

3445. GEORGE III., Injuries and usurpations.—The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of [unremitting]* injuries and usurpations [among which appears no solitary fact to contradict the uniform tenor of the rest, but all have] in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world [for the truth of which we pledge a faith yet unsullied by falsehood].—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3447. GEORGE III., Ministers of.—You are surrounded by British counsellors, but remember that they are parties. You have no ministers for American affairs, because you have none taken from among us, nor amenable to the laws on which they are to give you advice. It behooves you, therefore, to think and to act for yourself and your people.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

3448. GEORGE III., Our bitterest enemy.—It is an immense misfortune to the whole empire, to have a King of such a disposition at such a time. We are told, and everything proves it true, that he is the bitterest enemy we have. His minister is able, and that satisfies me that ignorance or wickedness, somewhere, controls him. In an earlier part of this contest, our petitions told him, that from our King there was but one appeal. The admonition was despised, and that appeal forced on us. To undo his empire, he has but one truth more to learn; that, after the Colonies have drawn the sword, there is but one step more they can take. That step is now pressed upon us, by the measures adopted, as if they were afraid we would not take it.—TO JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 203. FORD ED., i, 492. (Pa., November 1775.)

3449. GEORGE III., Perversity of.—Our friend George is rather remarkable for doing exactly what he ought not to do.—TO DR. RAMSAY. ii, 217. (P., 1787.)

3450. — — —. Has there been a better rule of prognosticating what he would do than to examine what he ought not to do?—TO JOHN JAY. ii, 291. (P., 1787.)

3451. GEORGE III., Policy of.—I am pleased to see the answer of the King. It bears the marks of suddenness and surprise, and as he seems not to have had time for reflection, we may suppose he was obliged to find his answer in the real sentiments of his heart, if that heart has any sentiment. I have no doubt, however, that it contains the real creed of an Englishman, and that the word which he has let escape, is the true word of the enigma. "The moment I see such sentiments as yours prevail, and a disposition to give this country the preference, I will, &c." All this I steadily believe. But the condition is impossible. Our interest calls for a perfect equality in our conduct towards these two nations; but no preference anywhere. If, however, circumstances should ever oblige us to show a preference, a respect for our character, if we had no better motive, would decide to which it should be given.—TO JOHN ADAMS. i, 436. (P., September 1785.)

3452. GEORGE III., Ruinous rule of.—It is a subject of deep regret to see a great nation reduced from an unexampled height of prosperity to an abyss of ruin, by the long-continued rule of a single chief.—TO MR. RODMAN. vi, 54. (M., April 1812.)

3453. GEORGE III., Rumored death of.—We have a rumor that the King of England is dead. As this would ensure a general peace, I do not know that it would be any misfortune to humanity.—TO HARRY INNES. iv, 315. FORD ED., vii, 412. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

3454. GEORGE III., Services to America.—We have a blind story here [Paris] of somebody attempting to assassinate your* King. No man upon earth has my prayers for his continuance in life more sincerely than he. He is truly the American Messias, the most precious life that ever God gave. And may God continue it. Twenty long years has he been laboring to drive us to our good, and he labors and will labor still for it, if he can be spared. We shall have need of him for twenty more. The Prince of Wales on the throne, Lansdowne and Fox in the ministry and we are undone! We become chained by our habits to the tails of those who hate and despise us. I repeat it, then, that my anxieties are all alive for the health and long life of the King. He has not a friend on earth who would lament his loss as much and so long as I should.—TO MRS. JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., iv, 261. (P., 1786.)

3456. GEORGE III., Unfit to rule.—A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a people who mean to be free. Future ages will scarcely believe that the hardness of one man adventured within the short compass of twelve years only, to lay a foundation, so broad and undisguised for tyranny over a people fostered and fixed in principles of freedom.*—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3457. GEORGE IV., Character of.—As the character of the Prince of Wales is becoming interesting, I have endeavored to learn what it truly is. This is less difficult in his case than in that of other persons of rank, because he has taken no pains to hide himself from the world. * * * The total of his education was the learning a little Latin, but he speaks French without the slightest foreign accent, from the circumstance that, when very young, his father had put only French servants about him. He has not a single element of mathematics, of natural or moral philosophy, or of any other science on earth, nor has the society he has kept been such as to supply the void of education. It has been of the lowest, the most illiterate and profligate persons of the Kingdom, without choice of rank or mind, and with whom the subjects of conversation are only horses, drinking-matches, bawdy houses, and in terms the most vulgar. The young nobility, who begin by associating with him, soon leave him, disgusted with the insupportable profligacy of his society; and Mr. Fox, who has been supposed his favorite, and not over-nice in the choice of company, would never keep him company habitually. In fact, he never associated with a man of sense. He has not a single idea of justice, morality, religion, or of the rights of men, or any anxiety for the opinion of the world. He carries that indifference for fame so far, that he would probably be hurt were he to lose his throne, provided he could be assured of having always meat, drink, horses and women. * * * He had a fine person, but it is becoming coarse. He possesses good native common sense, is affable, polite and very good-humored. * * * The Duke of York, who was for some time cried up as the prodigy of the family, is as profligate, and of less understanding.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 559. FORD ED., v, 60. (P., 1789.)

3459. ———. I could not offer myself as geological correspondent in this State, because of all the branches of science it was the one I had the least cultivated. Our researches into the texture of our globe could be but so superficial, compared with its vast interior construction, that I saw no safety of conclusion from the one, as to the other; and therefore have pointed my own attentions to other objects in preference, as far as a heavy load of business would permit me to attend to anything else.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 531. (M., 1810.)

3460. GEOLOGY, Limited usefulness.—To learn * * * the ordinary arrangement of the different strata of minerals in the earth,

* The first sentence was changed so as to read, "A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people", and the second one was struck out.—EDITOR.

to know from their habitual collocations and proximities where we find one mineral; whether another, for which we are seeking, may be expected to be in its neighborhood, is useful. But the dreams about the modes of creation, inquiries whether our globe has been formed by the agency of fire or water, how many millions of years it has cost Vulcan or Neptune to produce what the fiat of the Creator would effect by a single act of will, is too idle to be worth a single hour of any man's life.—To DR. JOHN P. EMMETT. vii, 443. (M., 1826.)

3461. GEOLOGY, Man's reason defied.—The several instances of trees, &c., found far below the surface of the earth * * * seem to set the reason of man at defiance.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 67. FORD ED., iv, 335. (P., 1786.)

3462. GEOLOGY, Theories of.—With respect to the inclination of the strata of rocks, I had observed them between the Blue Ridge and North Mountains in Virginia, to be parallel with the pole of the earth. I observed the same thing in most instances in the Alps, between Cette and Turin; but in returning along the precipices of the Apennines, where they hang over the Mediterranean, their direction was totally different and various. You mention that in our Western country they are horizontal. This variety proves they have not been formed by subsidence, as some writers of the theories of the earth have pretended; for then they should always have been in circular strata, and concentric. It proves, too, that they have not been formed by the rotation of the earth on its axis, as it might have been suspected, had all these strata been parallel with that axis. They may, indeed, have been thrown up by explosions, as Whitehurst supposes, or have been the effect of convulsions. But there can be no proof of the explosion, nor is it probable that convulsions have deformed every spot of the earth. It is now generally agreed that rock grows, and it seems that it grows in layers in every direction, as the branches of trees grow in all directions. Why seek further the solution of this phenomenon? Everything in nature decays. If it were not reproduced then by growth there should be a chasm.—To CHARLES THOMSON. ii, 276. FORD ED., iv, 448. (P., 1787.)

3463. GERRY (Elbridge), Federalist hatred of.—As soon as it was known that you had consented to stay in Paris, there was no measure observed in the execrations of the war party. They openly wished you might be guillotined, or sent to Cayenne, or anything else.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 273. FORD ED., vii, 335. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

3464. ———. The people will support you, notwithstanding the howlings of the ravenous crew from whose jaws they are escaping.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 390. FORD ED., viii, 41. (W., March 1801.)

3465. GERRY (Elbridge), French negotiations.—You suppose that you have been abused by both parties. As far as has come to my knowledge, you are misinformed. I have never seen or heard a sentence of blame uttered against you by the republicans; unless we were so to construe their wishes that you had more boldly cooperated in a project of a treaty, and would more explicitly state, whether there was in your colleagues [Marshall and Pinckney] that flexibility, which persons earnest after peace would have practiced? Whether, on the contrary, their demeanor was not cold, re-

President of the United States

Executive Order of the President of the United States, dated August 1, 1802, relating to the removal of the Cherokee Indians from Georgia to the West. The President is authorized to remove the Cherokee Indians from Georgia to the West, and to provide for their transportation and subsistence.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES
DOES hereby order and direct that the Cherokee Indians be removed from Georgia to the West, and that the necessary provisions be made for their transportation and subsistence.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the President of the United States has hereunto set his hand and the seal of the United States, at the City of Washington, this first day of August, 1802.

has continued with a free press, a free market, and a free people. The only thing that has changed is the government. The new government is a free government, and it is a government that is free to the people. It is a government that is free to the people, and it is a government that is free to the people.

3476. GOVERNMENT, Art of.—The whole art of government consists in the art of being honest.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

3477. GOVERNMENT, Censors.—No government ought to be without censors; and where the press is free, no one ever will.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 467. FORD ED., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

3478. ——. If virtuous, the government need not fear the fair operation of attack and defence. Nature has given to man no other means of sifting out the truth, either in religion, law, or politics.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 467. FORD ED., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

3479. ——. I think it is as honorable to the government neither to know, nor notice, its sycophants or censors, as it would be undignified and criminal to pamper the former and persecute the latter.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 467. FORD ED., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

— GOVERNMENT, Centralization.—See CENTRALIZATION.

3480. GOVERNMENT, Changing.—Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established, should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3481. GOVERNMENT, Consent of governed.—Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3483. ——. Civil government being the sole object of forming societies, its administration must be conducted by common consent.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 331. FORD ED., iii, 189. (1782.)

3484. ——. The General Assembly of Virginia, at their session in 1785, passed an act declaring that the district, called Kentucky shall be a separate and independent State, on these conditions. 1. That the people of that district shall consent to it.—TO M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 258. FORD ED., iv, 162. (P., 1786.)

* "Deriving" in the Declaration.—EDITOR

3485. ——. [We] first in modern times [took] the ground of government founded on the will of the people.—TO GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 325. FORD ED., v, 428. (Pa., 1792.)

3486. ——. I do not indeed wish to see any nation have a form of government forced on them; but if it is to be done, I should rejoice at its being a freer one.—TO PEREGRINE FITZHUGH. iv, 218. FORD ED., vii, 211. (Pa., 1798.)

3487. ——. The will of the people is the only legitimate foundation of any government.—TO BENJAMIN WARING. iv, 379. (W., March 1801.)

3488. ——. There is only one passage in President Monroe's message which I disapprove, and which I trust will not be approved by our Legislature. It is that which proposes to subject the Indians to our laws without their consent. A little patience and a little money are so rapidly producing their voluntary removal across the Mississippi, that I hope this immorality will not be permitted to stain our history. He has certainly been surprised into this proposition, so little in concord with our principles of government.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., x, 115. (M., Nov. 1818.)

3489. ——. The will [of the nation is] the only legitimate basis [of government]. —TO ——. vii, 414. (M., 1825.)

3490. GOVERNMENT, Control of.—Unless the mass retains sufficient control over those entrusted with the powers of their government, these will be perverted to their own oppression, and to the perpetuation of wealth and power in the individuals and their families selected for the trust. Whether our Constitution has hit on the exact degree of control necessary, is yet under experiment; and it is a most encouraging reflection that distance and other difficulties securing us against the brigand governments of Europe, in the safe enjoyment of our farms and firesides, the experiment stands a better chance of being satisfactorily made here than on any occasion yet presented by history.—TO M. VAN DER KEMP. vi, 45. (M., 1812.)

3491. GOVERNMENT, Corruption and.—In every government on earth is some trace of human weakness, some germ of corruption and degeneracy, which cunning will discover, and wickedness insensibly open, cultivate and improve.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 390. FORD ED., iii, 254. (1782.)

3492. GOVERNMENT, De Facto.—There are some matters which, I conceive, might be transacted with a government de facto; such, for instance, as the reforming the unfriendly restrictions on our commerce and navigation.—TO GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 489. FORD ED., vi, 131. (Pa., Nov. 1792.)

tive and judiciary, result to the legislative body [under the first Virginia Constitution]. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the Republic of Venice.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 361. FORD ED., iii, 223. (1782.)

3494. ——. I think the government in France is a pure despotism in theory, but moderated in practice by the respect which the public opinion commands. But the nation repeats, after Montesquieu, that the different bodies of magistracy, of priests and nobles, are barriers between the King and the people. It would be easy to prove that these barriers can only appeal to public opinion, and that neither these bodies, nor the people, can oppose any legal check to the will of the monarch.—To MR. CUTTING. ii, 438. (P., 1788.)

3495. GOVERNMENT, Elective.—Elective government is * * * the best permanent corrective of the errors or abuses of those entrusted with power.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv, 387. (W., March 1801.)

3496. GOVERNMENT, Energetic.—American reputation in Europe is not such as to be flattering to its citizens. Two circumstances are particularly objected to us,—the non-payment of our debts and the want of energy in our government. These discourage a connection with us.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 188. (P., 1786.)

3497. ——. I am not a friend to a very energetic government. It is always oppressive.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 331. FORD ED., iv, 479. (P., 1787.)

3498. ——. A free government is of all others the most energetic.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 366. FORD ED., viii, 8. (W., March 1801.)

3499. ——. The energy of the government depends mainly on the confidence of the people in the Chief Magistrate.—To DR. HORATIO TURPIN. v, 90. (W., 1807.)

— GOVERNMENT, English.—See ENGLAND.

3500. GOVERNMENT, Experiments in.—This I hope will be the age of experiments in government, and that their basis will be founded in principles of honesty, not of mere force. We have seen no instance of this since the days of the Roman Republic, nor do we read of any before that.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., vii, 56. (M., 1796.)

— GOVERNMENT, Extensive territory and.—See TERRITORY.

3501. GOVERNMENT, Extremes of.—We are now vibrating between too much and too little government, and the pendulum will rest finally in the middle.—To WILLIAM STEPHENS SMITH. FORD ED., v, 3. (P., 1788.)

3502. GOVERNMENT, Fallibility.—

—Was the government to prescribe to us our medicine and diet, our bodies would be in such keeping as our souls are now. Thus in France the emetic was once forbidden as a medicine, and the potato as an article of food. Government is just as infallible, too, when it fixes systems in physics. Galileo was sent to the Inquisition for affirming that the earth was a sphere; the government had declared it to be as flat as a trencher, and Galileo was obliged to abjure his error. This error, however, at length prevailed, the earth became a globe, and Descartes declared it was whirled round its axes by a vortex. The government in which he lived was wise enough to see that this was no question of civil jurisdiction, or we should all have been involved by authority in vortices. In fact, vortices have been exploded, and the Newtonian principle of gravitation is now more firmly established, on the basis of reason, than it would be were the government to step in, and to make it an article of necessary faith. Reason and experiment have been indulged, and error has fled before them. It is error alone which needs the support of government. Truth can stand by itself.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 400. FORD ED., iii, 264. (1782.)

3503. GOVERNMENT, Fear and.—No government can be maintained without the principle of fear as well as of duty. Good men will obey the last, but bad ones the former only. If our government ever fails it will be from this weakness.—To J. W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 484. (M., 1814.)

— GOVERNMENT, The federal.—See FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

3504. GOVERNMENT, Field for.—Never was a finer canvas presented to work on than our countrymen. All of them engaged in agriculture, or in the pursuits of honest industry, independent in their circumstances, enlightened as to their rights, and firm in their habits of order and obedience to the laws.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., vii, 56. (M., 1796.)

3505. GOVERNMENT, Forms of.—Societies exist under three forms, sufficiently distinguishable. 1. Without government, as among our Indians. 2. Under governments, wherein the will of every one has a just influence; as is the case in England, in a slight degree, and in our States, in a great one. 3. Under governments of force; as is the case in all other monarchies, and in most of the other republics. To have an idea of the curse of existence under these last, they must be seen. It is a government of wolves over sheep. It is a problem, not clear in my mind, that the first condition is not the best. But I believe it to be inconsistent with any great degree of population. The second state has a great deal of good in it. The mass of mankind under that, enjoys a precious degree of liberty and happiness. It has its evils, too; the principle of which is the turbulence to which it is subject. But weigh this against the oppressions of monarchy, and it becomes nothing. Malo periculosam libertatem quam quietem servitutem. Even this evil is productive of good. It prevents the degeneracy of government, and nourishes a general attention to the public affairs. I hold it that a little rebellion, now and then, is a good thing, and as necessary in the political world as storms are in the physical. Unsuccessful rebellions, indeed, generally establish the encroachments on the rights of the people, which have produced them. An observation of this truth should render honest republican governors so mild in their punishment of rebellions, as not to discourage them too much. It is a medicine necessary for the sound health of government.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 105. FORD ED., iv, 362. (P., 1787.)

3508. GOVERNMENT, Frugality.—I am for a government rigorously frugal.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

3510. — — — A single good government is a blessing to the whole earth.—To GEORGE FLOWER. vii, 84. (P.F., 1817.)

3511. — — — No government can continue good, but under the control of the people.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 149. FORD ED., x, 153. (M., 1819.)

3514. — — — What a crowd of lessons do the present miseries of Holland

teach us! Never to have an hereditary officer of any sort * * * —To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 283. FORD ED., iv, 455. (P., 1787.)

3516. — — — We have chanced to live in an age which will probably be distinguished in history for its experiments in government on a larger scale than has yet taken place. But we shall not live to see the result. The grosser absurdities, such as hereditary magistracies, we shall see exploded in our day, long experience having already pronounced condemnation against them. But what is to be the substitute? This our children or grandchildren will answer. We may be satisfied with the certain knowledge that none can ever be tried, so stupid, so unrighteous, so oppressive, so destructive of every end for which honest men enter into government, as that which their forefathers had established, and their fathers alone venture to tumble headlong from the stations they have so long abused.—To M. D'IVERNOIS. iv, 115. FORD ED., vii, 5. (M., Feb. 1795.)

3518. — — — Hereditary authorities always consume the public contributions, and oppress the people with labor and poverty.—To DAVID HOWELL. v, 554. (M., 1810.)

3520. GOVERNMENT, Inattention to.—If once the people become inattentive to the public affairs, you and I, and Congress and Assemblies, Judges and Governors, shall all become wolves. It seems to be the law of our general nature, in spite of individual exceptions; and experience declares that man is the only animal which devours his own kind; for I can apply no milder term to the governments of Europe, and to the general prey of the rich on the poor.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 100. FORD ED., iv, 360. (P., 1787.)

3521. GOVERNMENT, Liberty and.—The natural progress of things is for liberty to yield and government to gain ground.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v, 20. (P., 1788.)

3522. GOVERNMENT, Monarchical.—Blessed effect of a kingly government, where a pretended insult to the sister of a king, is to produce the wanton sacrifice of a hundred or two thousand of the people who

tive and judiciary, result to the legislative body [under the first Virginia Constitution]. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the Republic of Venice.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 361. FORD ED., iii, 223. (1782.)

In fact, vortices have been exploded, and the Newtonian principle of gravitation is now more firmly established, on the basis of reason, than it would be were the government to step in, and to make it an article of necessary faith. Reason and experiment have been indulged, and error has fled before them. It is error alone which needs the support of government. Truth can stand by itself.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 400. FORD ED., iii, 264. (1782.)

3503. GOVERNMENT, Fear and.—No government can be maintained without the principle of fear as well as of duty. Good men will obey the last, but bad ones the former only. If our government ever fails it will be from this weakness.—To J. W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 484. (M., 1814.)

— GOVERNMENT, The federal.—See FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

3504. GOVERNMENT, Field for.—

3505. GOVERNMENT, Forms of.—Societies exist under three forms, sufficiently distinguishable. 1. Without government, as among our Indians. 2. Under governments, wherein the will of every one has a just influence; as is the case in England, in a slight degree, and in our States, in a great one. 3. Under governments of force; as is the case in all other monarchies, and in most of the other republics. To have an idea of the curse of existence under these last, they must be seen. It is a government of wolves over sheep. It is a problem, not clear in my mind, that the first condition is not the best. But I believe it to be inconsistent with any great degree of population. The second state has a great deal of good in it. The mass of mankind under that, enjoys a precious degree of liberty and happiness. It has its evils, too; the principle of which is the turbulence to which it is subject. But weigh this against the oppressions of monarchy, and it becomes nothing. Malo periculosam libertatem quam quietem servitutem. Even this evil is productive of good. It prevents the degeneracy of government, and nourishes a general attention to the public affairs. I hold it that a little rebellion, now and then, is a good thing, and as necessary in the political world as storms are in the physical. Unsuccessful rebellions, indeed, generally establish the encroachments on the rights of the people, which have produced them. An observation of this truth should render honest republican governors so mild in their punishment of rebellions, as not to discourage them too much. It is a medicine necessary for the sound health of government.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 105. FORD ED., iv, 362. (P., 1787.)

3507. — — — The true foundation of republican government is the equal right of every citizen, in his person and property, and in their management.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 11. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

3508. GOVERNMENT, Frugality.—I am for a government rigorously frugal.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

3509. GOVERNMENT, Good.—The first principle of a good government is certainly a distribution of its powers into executive, judiciary and legislative, and a subdivision of the latter into two or three branches.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 282. FORD ED., iv, 454. (P., 1787.)

3510. — — — A single good government is a blessing to the whole earth.—To GEORGE FLOWER. vii, 84. (P.F., 1817.)

3511. — — — No government can continue good, but under the control of the people.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 149. FORD ED., x, 153. (M., 1819.)

teach us! Never to have an hereditary officer of any sort * * * —To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 283. FORD ED., iv, 455. (P., 1787.)

3516. — — — We have chanced to live in an age which will probably be distinguished in history for its experiments in government on a larger scale than has yet taken place. But we shall not live to see the result. The grosser absurdities, such as hereditary magistracies, we shall see exploded in our day, long experience having already pronounced condemnation against them. But what is to be the substitute? This our children or grandchildren will answer. We may be satisfied with the certain knowledge that none can ever be tried, so stupid, so unrighteous, so oppressive, so destructive of every end for which honest men enter into government, as that which their forefathers had established, and their fathers alone venture to tumble headlong from the stations they have so long abused.—To M. D'IVERNONIS. iv, 115. FORD ED., vii, 5. (M., Feb. 1795.)

3518. — — — Hereditary authorities always consume the public contributions, and oppress the people with labor and poverty.—To DAVID HOWELL. v, 554. (M., 1810.)

3520. GOVERNMENT, Inattention to.—If once the people become inattentive to the public affairs, you and I, and Congress and Assemblies, Judges and Governors, shall all become wolves. It seems to be the law of our general nature, in spite of individual exceptions; and experience declares that man is the only animal which devours his own kind; for I can apply no milder term to the governments of Europe, and to the general prey of the rich on the poor.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 100. FORD ED., iv, 360. (P., 1787.)

3521. GOVERNMENT, Liberty and.—The natural progress of things is for liberty to yield and government to gain ground.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v, 20. (P., 1788.)

3522. GOVERNMENT, Monarchical.—Blessed effect of a kingly government, where a pretended insult to the sister of a king, is to produce the wanton sacrifice of a hundred or two thousand of the people who have entrusted themselves to his government, and as many of his enemies! And we think ours a bad government.—To GOVERNOR RUTLEDGE. ii, 234. (P., 1787.)

3523. ——. It is a government of wolves over sheep.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 105. FORD ED., iv, 362. (P., 1787.)

3524. GOVERNMENT, Moral principles.—If ever the morals of a people could be made the basis of their own government, it is our case; and who could propose to govern such a people by the corruption of a Legislature, before he could have one night of quiet sleep, must convince himself that the human soul, as well as body, is mortal.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., vii, 57. (M., 1796.)

3525. ——. When we come to the moral principles on which the government is to be administered, we come to what is proper for all conditions of society. I meet you there in all the benevolence and rectitude of your native character; and I love myself always most where I concur most with you. Liberty, truth, probity, honor, are declared to be the four cardinal principles of your Society. I believe with you that morality, compassion, generosity, are innate elements of the human constitution; that there exists a right independent of force; that a right to property is founded in our natural wants, in the means with which we are endowed to satisfy these wants, and the right to what we acquire by those means without violating the similar rights of other sensible beings; that no one has a right to obstruct another, exercising his faculties innocently for the relief of sensibilities made a part of his nature; that justice is the fundamental law of society; that the majority, oppressing an individual, is guilty of a crime, abuses its strength, and by acting on the law of the strongest breaks up the foundations of society; that action by the citizens in person, in affairs within their reach and competence, and in all others by representatives, chosen immediately, and removable by themselves, constitutes the essence of a republic; that all governments are more or less republican in proportion as this principle enters more or less into their composition; and that a government by representation is capable of extension over a greater surface of country than one of any other form. These are the essentials in which you and I agree; however in our zeal for their maintenance, we may be perplexed and divaricate, as to the structure of society most likely to secure them.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 591. FORD ED., x, 24. (P.F., 1816.)

3526. GOVERNMENT, Objects of.—Persons and property make the sum of the objects of government.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 106. FORD ED., v, 121. (P., 1789.) See GENERATIONS.

3527. ——. The care of human life and happiness, and not their destruction, is the first and only legitimate object of good government.—R. TO A. MARYLAND REPUBLICANS. viii, 165. (1809.)

3528. ——. The freedom and happiness of man * * * are the sole objects of all legitimate government.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 509. (M., 1810.)

3530. ——. The equal rights of man, and the happiness of every individual, are now acknowledged to be the only legitimate objects of government. Modern times have the signal advantage, too, of having discovered the only device by which these rights can be secured, to wit: government by the people, acting not in person, but by representatives chosen by themselves, that is to say, by every man of ripe years and sane mind, who either contributes by his purse or person to the support of his country.—To M. CORAY. vii, 319. (M., 1823.)

3531. GOVERNMENT, Origin of.—There is an error into which most of the speculators on government have fallen, and which the well-known state of society of our Indians ought, before now, to have corrected. In their hypothesis of the origin of government, they suppose it to have commenced in the patriarchal or monarchical form. Our Indians are evidently in that state of nature which has passed the association of a single family; and not yet submitted to the authority of positive laws, or of any acknowledged magistrate. Every man, with them, is perfectly free to follow his own inclinations. But if, in doing this, he violates the rights of another, if the case be slight, he is punished by the disesteem of his society, or, as we say, by public opinion; if serious, he is tomahawked as a dangerous enemy. Their leaders conduct them by the influence of their character only; and they follow, or not, as they please, him of whose character for wisdom or war they have the highest opinion. Hence the origin of the parties among them, adhering to different leaders, and governed by their advice, not by their command. The Cherokees, the only tribe I know to be contemplating the establishment of regular laws, magistrates, and government, propose a government of representatives, elected from every town. But, of all things, they least think of subjecting themselves to the will of one man. This, the only instance of actual fact within our knowledge, will be then a beginning by republican, and not by patriarchal or monarchical government, as speculative writers have generally conjectured.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 4. FORD ED., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

3532. GOVERNMENT, Participation in.—Those who bear equally the burdens of government should equally participate of its benefits.—ADDRESS TO LORD DUNMORE. FORD ED., i, 457. (1775.)

3534. GOVERNMENT, The people and.—Every government degenerates when trusted to the rulers of the people alone. The people themselves, therefore, are its only safe depositories. And to render even them safe, their minds must be improved to a certain degree.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 390. FORD ED., iii, 254. (1782.)

3535. ——. The influence over government must be shared among all the people. If every individual which composes their mass participates of the ultimate authority, the government will be safe; because the corrupting the whole mass will exceed any private resources of wealth; and public ones cannot be provided but by levies on the people. In this case, every man would have to pay his own price. The government of Great Britain has been corrupted, because but one man in ten has a right to vote for members of Parliament. The sellers of the government, therefore, get nine-tenths of their price clear.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 390. FORD ED., iii, 254. (1782.)

3536. ——. Were I called upon to decide whether the people had best be omitted in the Legislative or Judiciary department, I would say it is better to leave them out of the Legislative. The execution of the laws is more important than the making them. However, it is best to have the people in all the three departments, where that is possible.—To M. L'ABBÉ ARNOLD. iii, 82. FORD ED., v, 104. (P., 1789.)

3537. GOVERNMENT, Perversion.—[While] certain forms of government are better calculated than others to protect individuals in the free exercise of their natural rights, and are at the same time themselves better guarded against degeneracy, yet experience hath shown that, even under the best forms, those entrusted with power have, in time, and by slow operations, perverted it into tyranny.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 220. (1779.)

3538. GOVERNMENT, Powers of.—The Legislative, Executive and Judiciary offices shall be kept forever separate; no person exercising the one shall be capable of appointment to the others, or to either of them.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 13. (June 1776.)

3539. ——. The legitimate powers of government extend to such acts only as are injurious to others.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 400. FORD ED., iii, 263. (1782.)

3540. ——. The powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments, each of them to be confided to a separate body of magistracy; to wit, those which are legislative to one, those which are judiciary to another, and those which are executive to another. No person, or collection of persons, being of one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly permitted.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 442. FORD ED., iii, 322. (1783.)

3541. GOVERNMENT, Principles of modern.—Either force or corruption has been the principle of every modern government, unless the Dutch perhaps be excepted, and I am not well enough informed to accept them absolutely.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., vii, 57. (1796.)

3542. GOVERNMENT, Public welfare and.—No government has a legitimate right to do what is not for the welfare of the governed.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 461. FORD ED., vi, 103. (M., 1792.)

3543. GOVERNMENT, Purchases by.—I do not know on what principles of reasoning it is that good men think the public ought to pay more for a thing than they would themselves if they wanted it.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 293. (M., 1808.)

3544. GOVERNMENT, Purity.—A government regulating itself by what is wise and just for the many, uninfluenced by the local and selfish views of the few who direct their affairs, has not been seen, perhaps, on earth. Or if it existed, for a moment, at the birth of ours, it would not be easy to fix the term of its continuance. Still, I believe it does exist here in a greater degree than anywhere else; and for its growth and continuance, * * * I offer sincere prayers.—To WILLIAM CRAWFORD. vii, 8. FORD ED., x, 36. (M., 1816.)

3545. GOVERNMENT, Recognition of.—With what kind of government [in France] may you do business? It accords with our principles to acknowledge any government to be rightful, which is formed by the will of the nation substantially declared. The late government was of this kind, and was accordingly acknowledged by all the branches of ours. So, any alteration of it which shall be made by the will of the nation substantially declared, will doubtless be acknowledged in like manner. With such a government every kind of business may be done.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 489. FORD ED., vi, 131. (Pa., Nov. 1792.)

3546. ——. You express a wish * * * to be generally advised as to the tenor of your conduct in consequence of the late revolution in France. * * * We certainly cannot deny to other nations that principle whereon our government is founded, that every nation has a right to govern itself internally under what forms it pleases, and to change these forms at its own will; and externally to transact business with other nations through whatever organ it chooses, whether that be a king, convention, assembly, committee, president, or whatever it be. The only thing essential is, the will of the nation. Taking this as your polar star, you can hardly err.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 500. (Pa., Dec. 1792.)

3547. ——. I am apprehensive that your situation must have been difficult during the transition from the late form of government to the reestablishment of some other legitimate authority, and that you may have been at a loss to determine with whom business might be done. Nevertheless when principles are well understood their application is less embarrassing. We surely cannot deny to any nation that right whereon our own government is founded, that every one may govern itself under whatever forms it pleases, and change these forms at its own will; and that it may transact its business with foreign nations through whatever organ it thinks proper, whether king, convention, assembly, committee, president, or whatever else it may choose. The will of the nation is the only thing essential to be regarded.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. FORD ED., vi, 149. (Pa., Dec. 1792.)

3548. ——. On the dissolution of the late constitution in France, by the removal of so integral a part of it as the King, the National Assembly, to whom a part only of the public authority had been delegated, sensible of the incompetence of their powers to transact the affairs of the nation legitimately, incited their fellow citizens to appoint a national convention during this defective state of the national authority. Duty to our constituents required that we should suspend payment of the moneys yet unpaid of our debt to that country, because there was no person, or persons, substantially authorized by the nation of France to receive the moneys and give us a good acquittal. On this ground my last letter desired you to suspend payments till further orders, with an assurance, if necessary, that the suspension should not be continued a moment longer than should be necessary for us to see the reestablishment of some person, or body of persons, with authority to receive and give us a good acquittal. Since that we learn that a convention is assembled, invested with full powers by the nation to transact its affairs. Though we know that from the public papers only, instead of waiting for a formal annunciation of it, we hasten to act upon it by authorizing you, if the fact be true, to consider the suspension of payment, * * * as now taken off, and to proceed as if it had never been imposed; considering the convention, or the government they shall have established, as the lawful representative of the nation, and authorized to act for them. Neither the honor nor inclination of our country would justify our withholding our payment under a scrupulous attention to forms. On the contrary, they lent us that money when we were under their circumstances, and it seems providential that we can not only repay them the same sum, but under the same circumstances.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. FORD ED., vi, 150. (Pa., Dec. 1792.)

3549. ——. I am sensible that your situation must have been difficult during the transition from the late form of government [in France] to the reestablishment of some other legitimate authority, and that you may have been at a loss to determine with whom business might be done. Nevertheless, when principles are well understood, their application is less embarrassing. We surely cannot deny to any nation that right whereon our own government is founded, that every one may govern itself according to whatever form it pleases, and change these forms at its own will; and that it may transact its business with foreign nations through whatever organ it thinks proper, whether king, convention, assembly, committee, president, or anything else it may choose. The will of the nation is the only thing essential to be regarded.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 521. FORD ED., vi, 199. (Pa., Mar. 1793.)

3550. ——. If the nation of France shall ever reestablish such an officer as Regent (of which there is no appearance at present), I should be for receiving a minister from him; but I am not for doing it from any Regent, so christened, and set up by any other authority.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 219. (Pa., April 1793.)

3551. GOVERNMENT, Representative.—A representative government, responsible at short periods of election, * * * produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind.—R. to A. VERMONT LEGISLATURE. viii, 121. (1807.)

3552. ——. A government by representation is capable of extension over a greater surface of country than one of any other form.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 591. FORD ED., x, 24. (P.F., 1816.)

3553. ——. The advantages of representative government exhibited in England and America, and recently in other countries, will procure its establishment everywhere in a more or less perfect form; and this will insure the amelioration of the condition of the world. It will cost years of blood, and be well worth them.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., x, 262. (M., 1823.)

3554. GOVERNMENT, Republican.—The republican is the only form of government which is not eternally at open or secret war with the rights of mankind.—REPLY to ADDRESS. iii, 128. FORD ED., v, 147. (1790.)

3555. ——. A just and solid republican government maintained here, will be a standing monument and example for the aim and imitation of the people of other countries.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 366. FORD ED., viii, 8. (W., March 1801.)

3556. ——. Governments are more or less republican as they have more or less of the element of popular election and control in their composition.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi. 608. FORD ED., x, 31. (M., 1816.)

3557. ——. Governments are republican only in proportion as they embody the will of the people and execute it.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 9. FORD ED., x, 37. (M., 1816.)

3558. ——. A government is republican in proportion as every member composing it has his equal voice in the direction of its concerns (not indeed in person, which would be impracticable beyond the limits of a city, or small township, but) by representatives chosen by himself, and responsible to him at short periods.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 10. FORD ED., x, 38. (M., 1816.)

3559. ——. It is a misnomer to call a government republican, in which a branch of the supreme power is independent of the nation.—To JAMES PLEASANTS. FORD ED., x, 199. (M., 1821.)

3560. GOVERNMENT, Rights and.—To secure these rights (life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness), governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3561. ——. It is to secure our rights that we resort to government at all.—To M. D'IVERNOIS. iv, 114. FORD ED., vii, 4. (M., Feb. 1795.)

3562. GOVERNMENT, Safety of.—I deem no government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation, or its regular functionaries.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 519. FORD ED., viii, 285. (W., 1803.)

3563. GOVERNMENT, Scandalizing.—Few think there is any immorality in scandalizing governments or ministers.—To MADAME NECKER. ii, 570. (P., 1789.)

3564. GOVERNMENT, Simplicity.—I am for a government rigorously frugal and simple.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.) See SIMPLICITY.

3565. GOVERNMENT, Strongest.—The government which can wield the arm of the people must be the strongest possible.—To MR. WEAVER. v, 89. (W., 1807.)

3566. ——. That government is the strongest of which every man feels himself a part.—To GOVERNOR H. D. TIFFIN. v, 38. FORD ED., ix, 21. (W., 1807.)

3567. GOVERNMENT, Suitability of.—The excellence of every government is its adaptation to the state of those to be governed by it.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 589. FORD ED., x, 22. (P.F., 1816.)

3568. ——. The laws which must effect [their happiness] must flow from their own habits, their own feelings, and the resources of their own minds. No stranger to these could possibly propose regulations adapted to them. Every people have their own particular habits, ways of thinking, manners, &c., which have grown up with them from their infancy, are become a part of their nature, and to which the regulations which are to make them happy must be accommodated. No member of a foreign country can have a sufficient sympathy with these. The institutions of Lycurgus, for example, would not have suited Athens, nor those of Solon, Lacedæmon. The organizations of Locke were impracticable for Carolina, and those of Rousseau and Mably for Poland. Turning inwardly on myself from these eminent illustrations of the truth of my observation, I feel all the presumption it would manifest, should I undertake to do what this respectable society is alone qualified to do suitably for itself.*—To WILLIAM LEE. vii, 56. (M., 1817.)

3569. ——. The forms of government adapted to the age [of the classical writers of Greece] and [their] country are [not] practicable or to be imitated in our day. * * * The circumstances of the world are too much changed for that. The government of Athens, for example, was that of the people of one city, making laws for the whole country subjected to them. That of Lacedæmon was the rule of military monks over the laboring class of the people, reduced to abject slavery. These are not the doctrines of the present age. The equal rights of man, and the happiness of every individual, are now acknowledged to be the only legitimate objects of government. Modern times have the signal advantage, too, of having discovered the only device by which these rights can be secured, to wit: government by the people, acting not in person, but by representatives chosen by themselves, that is to say, by every man of ripe years and sane mind, who either contributes by his purse or person to the support of his country.—To M. CORAY. vii, 318. (M., 1821.)

— GOVERNMENT, Territory and.—See TERRITORY.

3570. GOVERNMENT, Too much.—The only condition on earth to be compared with ours, in my opinion, is that of the Indian, where they have still less law than we.—To GOVERNOR RUTLEDGE. ii, 234. (P., 1787.)

3571. ——. I think, myself, that we have more machinery of government than is necessary, too many parasites living on the labor of the industrious. I believe it might be much simplified to the relief of those who maintain it.—To WILLIAM LUDLOW. vii, 378. (M., 1824.)

3572. GOVERNMENT, Usurpation of.—The government of a nation may be usurped by the forcible intrusion of an individual into

* In 1817, a French society, organized for the purpose of applying to Congress for a grant of two hundred and fifty thousand acres of land on the Tombigbee River, requested Jefferson "to trace for them the basis of a social pact for their local regulations". He declined on the grounds set forth in the quotation.—EDITOR.

the throne. But to conquer its will, so as to rest the right on that, the only legitimate basis, requires long acquiescence and cessation of all opposition.—To —. vii, 413. (M., 1825.)

3573. GOVERNMENT, Works on.—In political economy, I think SMITH'S Wealth of Nations the best book extant.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 145. FORD ED., v, 173. (N.Y., 1790.)

3574. — —. Locke's little book on government is perfect as far as it goes.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 145. FORD ED., v, 173. (N.Y., 1790.)

3575. — —. Descending from theory to practice, there is no better book than the Federalist.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 145. FORD ED., v, 173. (N.Y., 1790.)

3576. — —. In the science of government, MONTESQUIEU'S Spirit of Laws is generally recommended. It contains, indeed, a great number of political truths; but also an equal number of heresies; so that the reader must be constantly on his guard.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 145. FORD ED., v, 173. (N.Y., 1790.)

3577. — —. I think there does not exist a good elementary work on the organization of society into civil government; I mean a work which presents in one full and comprehensive view the system of principles on which such an organization should be founded, according to the rights of nature. For want of a single work of that character, I should recommend LOCKE on Government, SIDNEY, PRIESTLEY'S Essay on the First Principles of Government, CHIPMAN'S Principles of Government, and the Federalist; adding, perhaps, BECCARIA on Crimes and Punishments, because of the demonstrative manner in which he has treated that branch of the subject. If your views of political inquiry go further, to the subjects of money and commerce, SMITH'S Wealth of Nations is the best book to be read, unless SAY'S Political Economy can be had, which treats the same subjects on the same principles, but in a shorter compass and more lucid manner.—To JOHN NORVELL. v, 90. FORD ED., ix, 71. (W., 1807.) See ARISTOTLE.

3578. GOVERNMENTS (American), Blessed.—My God! how little do my countrymen know what precious blessings they are in possession of, and which no other people on earth enjoy.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 352. FORD ED., iv, 59. (1785.)

3579. GOVERNMENTS (American), Contented.—There are not, on the face of the earth, more tranquil governments than ours, nor a happier and more contented people.—To BARON GEISMER. i, 427. (P., 1785.)

3580. GOVERNMENTS (American), Energy of.—It has been said that our governments, both Federal and particular, want energy; that it is difficult to restrain both individuals and States from committing wrong. This is true, and it is an inconvenience. On the other hand, that energy which absolute governments derive from an armed force, which is the effect of the bayonet constantly held at the breast of every citizen, and which resembles very much the stillness of the grave, must be admitted also to have its inconveniences. We weigh the two together, and like best to submit to the former. Compare the number of wrongs committed with impunity by citizens among us with those committed by the sovereign in other countries, and the last will be found most numerous, most oppressive on the mind, and most degrading of the dignity of man.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 292. FORD ED., iv, 147. (P., 1786.)

3581. GOVERNMENTS (American), Happy.—With all its defects, and with all those of our particular governments, the inconveniences resulting from them are so slight in comparison with those existing in every other government on earth, that our citizens may certainly be considered as in the happiest political situation which exists.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 250. (P., Aug. 1787.)

3582. — —. With all the defects of our constitutions, whether general or particular, the comparison of our governments with those of Europe, is like a comparison of heaven and hell. England, like the earth, may be allowed to take an intermediate station.—To JOSEPH JONES. ii, 249. FORD ED., iv, 438. (P., 1787.)

3583. GOVERNMENTS (American), People and.—We think in America that it is necessary to introduce the people into every department of government, as far as they are capable of exercising it; and that this is the only way to ensure a long-continued and honest administration of its powers. To M. L'ABBÉ ARNOLD. iii, 81. FORD ED., v, 103. (P., 1789.)

3584. GOVERNMENTS (American), Powers.—An elective despotism was not the government we fought for, but one which should not only be founded on true free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among general bodies of magistracy, as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 361. FORD ED., iii, 224. (1782.)

3585. GOVERNMENTS (American), Principles.—Every species of government has its specific principles. Ours perhaps are more peculiar than those of any in the universe. It is a composition of the freest principles of the English constitution, with others derived from natural right and natural reason. To these nothing can be more opposed than the maxims of absolute monarchies.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 331. FORD ED., iii, 189. (1782.)

3586. — —. We, of the United States, are constitutionally and conscientiously democrats. We consider society as one of the natural wants with which man has been created; that he has been endowed with faculties and qualities to effect its satisfaction by concurrence of others having the same want; that when, by the exercise of these faculties, he has procured a state of society, it is one of his acquisitions which he has a right to regulate and control, jointly, indeed, with all those who have concurred in the procurement, whom he cannot exclude from its use or direction more than they him. We think experience has proved it safer, for the mass of individuals composing the society, to reserve to themselves personally the exercise of all rightful powers to which they are competent, and to delegate those to which they are not competent to deputies named, and removable for unfaithful conduct, by themselves immediately. Hence, with us, the people (by which is meant the mass of individuals composing the society), being competent to judge of the facts occurring in ordinary life, they have retained the functions of judges of facts, under the name of jurors; but being unqualified for the management of affairs requiring intelligence above the common level, yet competent judges of human character, they choose, for their management, representatives, some by themselves immediately, others by electors chosen by themselves. Thus our President is chosen by ourselves directly in practice, for we vote for A as elector only on the condition he will vote for B; our representatives by ourselves immediately; our Senate and judges of law through electors chosen by ourselves. And we believe that this proximate choice and power of removal is the best security which experience has sanctioned for ensuring an honest conduct in the functionaries of society. Your three or four alembications have indeed a seducing appearance. We should conceive, primâ facie, that the last extract would be the pure alcohol of the substance, three or four times rectified. But in proportion as they are more and more sublimated, they are also farther and farther removed from the control of the society; and the human character, we believe, requires in general constant and immediate control, to prevent its being biased from right by the seductions of self-love. Your process produces, therefore, a structure of government from which the fundamental principle of ours is excluded. You first set down as zeros all individuals not having lands, which are the greater number in every society of long standing. Those holding lands are permitted to manage in person the small affairs of their commune or corporation, and to elect a deputy for the canton; in which election, too, every one's vote is to be an unit, a plurality, or a fraction, in proportion to his landed possessions. The assemblies of cantons, then, elect for the districts; those of districts for circles; and those of circles for the national assemblies. Some of these highest councils, too, are in a considerable degree self-elected, the regency partially, the judiciary entirely, and some are for life. Whenever, therefore, an esprit de corps, or of party, gets possession of them, which experience shows to be inevitable, there are no means of breaking it up, for they will never elect but those of their own spirit. Juries are allowed in criminal cases only. I acknowledge myself strong in affection to our own form, yet both of us act and think from the same motive; we both consider the people as our children, and love them with parental affection. But you love them as infants whom you are afraid to trust without nurses; and I as adults whom I freely leave to self-government. And you are right in the case referred to you; my criticism being built on a state of society not under your contemplation. It is, in fact, like a critic on Homer by the laws of the Drama.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 589. FORD ED., x, 22. (P.F., 1816.)

3587. GOVERNMENTS (American), Reforming.—We can surely boast of having set the world a beautiful example of a government reformed by reason alone without bloodshed. But the world is too far oppressed to profit by the example.—To E. RUTLEDGE. ii, 435. FORD ED., v, 42. (P., 1788.)

3588. — — —. The example we have given to the world is single, that of changing our form of government under the authority of reason only, without bloodshed.—To RALPH IZARD. ii, 429. (P., 1785.)

3589. GOVERNMENTS (American), Republican.—The governments [of the proposed new States] shall be in republican forms.—WESTERN TERRITORY REPORT. FORD ED., iii, 409. (1784.)

3590. — — —. From the moment that to preserve our rights a change of government became necessary, no doubt could be entertained that a republican form was most consonant with reason, with right, with the freedom of man, and with the character and situation of our fellow citizens. To the sincere spirit of republicanism are naturally associated the love of country, devotion to its liberty, its rights and its honor. Our preference to that form of government has been so far justified by its success, and the prosperity with which it has blessed us.—R. to A. VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE. viii, 148. (1809.)

3591. GOVERNMENTS (American), Virtuous.—I think our governments will remain virtuous for many centuries; as long as * * * [the people] are chiefly agricultural, and this will be as long as there shall be vacant lands in any part of America. When they get piled upon one another in large cities, as in Europe, they will become corrupt as in Europe.*—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 332. FORD ED., iv, 479. (P., 1787.)

3592. GOVERNMENTS (American), Ward administration.—The elementary republics of the wards, the county republics, the State republics, and the Republic of the Union, would form a gradation of authorities, standing each on the basis of law, holding every one its delegated share of powers, and constituting truly a system of fundamental balances and checks for the government. Where every man is a sharer in the direction of his ward-republic, or of some of the higher ones, and feels that he is a participator in the government of affairs, not merely at an election one day in the year, but every day; when there shall not be a man in the State who will not be a member of some one of its councils, great or small, he will let the heart be torn out of his body sooner than his power be wrested from him by a Cæsar or a Bonaparte.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 543. (M., 1816.)

* The text of the Congress edition is: "When we get piled upon one another in large cities, as in Europe, we shall become corrupt as in Europe, and go to eating one another as they do there."—EDITOR.

3593. ——. How powerfully did we feel the energy of this organization in the case of the Embargo? I felt the foundations of the Government shaken under my feet by the New England townships. There was not an individual in their States whose body was not thrown with all its momentum into action; and although the whole of the other States were known to be in favor of the measure, yet the organization of this little selfish minority enabled it to overrule the Union. What would the unwieldy counties of the middle, the south and the west do? Call a county meeting, and the drunken loungers at and about the court houses would have collected, the distances being too great for the good people and the industrious generally to attend. The character of those who really met would have been the measure of the weight they would have had in the scale of public opinion.—To JOSEPH C. BELL. vi, 544. (M., 1816.)

3594. GOVERNMENTS (European), Oppressive.—The European are governments of kites over pigeons.—To GOVERNOR RUTLEDGE. ii, 234. (P., 1787.)

3596. GRANGER (Gideon), Burr's enemy.—In the winter of 1803-4, another train of events took place which, * * * I think it but justice to yourself that I should state. I mean the intrigues which were in agitation, and at the bottom of which we believed Colonel Burr to be; to form a coalition of the five Eastern States, with New York and New Jersey, under the appellation of the seven Eastern States; either to overawe the Union by the combination of their power and their will, or by threats of separating themselves from it. Your intimacy with some of those in the secret gave you opportunities of searching into their proceedings, of which you made me daily and confidential reports. This intimacy to which I had such useful recourse, at the time, rendered you an object of suspicion with many as being yourself a partisan of Colonel Burr, and engaged in the very combination which you were faithfully employed in defeating. I never failed to justify you to all those who brought their suspicions to me, and to assure them of my knowledge of your fidelity. Many were the individuals, then members of the Legislature, who received these assurances from me, and whose apprehensions were thereby quieted. This first project of Burr having vanished in smoke, he directed his views to the Western country.—To GIDEON GRANGER. vi, 330. FORD ED., ix, 455. (M., 1814.)

3597. GRANGER (Gideon), Supreme Court.—I shall be perfectly happy if either you or [Levi] Lincoln is named, as I consider the substituting, in the place of [Judge] Cushing, a firm unequivocating republican, whose principles are born with him, and not an occasional ingraftment, as necessary to complete that great reformation in our Government to which the nation gave its fiat ten years ago.—To GIDEON GRANGER. FORD ED., ix, 286. (M., 1810.)

* From a note enclosing draft of first annual message and requesting suggestions thereon.—EDITOR.

3598. GRATITUDE, Happiness and.—I have but one system of ethics for men and for nations—to be grateful, to be faithful to all engagements, under all circumstances, to be open and generous, promoting in the long run the interests of both, and I am sure it promotes their happiness.—To LA DUCHESSE D'AUVILLE. iii, 135. FORD ED., v, 153. (N. Y. 1790.)

3599. GRATITUDE, National.—I think * * * that nations are to be governed with regard to their own interest, but I am convinced that it is their interest, in the long run, to be grateful, faithful to their engagements even in the worst of circumstances, and honorable and generous always.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 132. FORD ED., v, 152. (N. Y., 1790.)

3600. GRATITUDE, Principles of.—To say that gratitude is never to enter into the motives of national conduct is to revive a principle which has been buried for centuries with its kindred principles of the lawfulness of assassination, poison, perjury, &c. All of these were legitimate principles in the dark ages, which intervened between ancient and modern civilization, but exploded and held in just horror in the eighteenth century.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 99. FORD ED., v, 111. (P., 1789.)

—GREEK LANGUAGE.—See LANGUAGES.

3601. GREEKS, Ancient.—Should these thoughts* on the subject of national government furnish a single idea which may be useful to them [the Greeks], I shall fancy it a tribute rendered to the manes of your Homer, your Demosthenes, and the splendid constellation of sages and heroes, whose blood is still flowing in your veins, and whose merits are still resting, as a heavy debt, on the shoulders of the living, and the future races of men.—To M. CORAY. vii, 324. (M., 1823.)

3602. GREEKS, Government of.—Greece was the first of civilized nations which presented examples [in government] of what man should be.—To M. CORAY. vii, 318. (M., 1823.)

3603. GREEKS, Sympathy for.—No people sympathize more feelingly than ours with the sufferings of your countrymen, none offer more sincere and ardent prayers to heaven for their success. And nothing indeed but the fundamental principle of our government, never to entangle us with the broils of Europe, could restrain our generous youth from taking some part in this holy cause. Possessing ourselves the combined blessing of liberty and order, we wish the same to other countries, and to none more than yours, which, the first of civilized nations, presented examples of what man should be.—To M. CORAY. vii, 318. (M., 1823.)

3604. GREENE (Nathaniel), Estimate of.—Greene was truly a great man. He had not, perhaps, all the qualities which so peculiarly rendered General Washington the fittest man on earth for directing so great a contest under so great difficulties. * * * But Greene was second to no one in enterprise, in resource, in sound judgment, promptitude of decision, and in every other military talent.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. FORD ED., x, 222. (M., 1822.)

* Jefferson, at the request of M. Coray, wrote a paper outlining a system of government for Greece.—EDITOR.

3605. GRIEF, Stupefying.—Your letter found me a little emerging from the stupor of mind which had rendered me as dead to the world as was she whose loss occasioned it. *—To THE CHEVALIER DE CHATELLEUX. i, 322. FORD ED., iii, 64. (Am., 1782.)

3606. GRIEF, Value of.—When we put into the same scale the abuses [of grief] with the afflictions of soul which even the uses of grief cost us, we may consider its value in the economy of the human being, as equivocal at least. Those afflictions cloud too great a portion of life to find a counterpoise in any benefits derived from its uses. For setting aside its paroxysms on the occasions of special bereavements, all the latter years of aged men are overshadowed with its gloom. Whither, for instance, can you and I look without seeing the graves of those we have known? And whom can we call up, of our early companions, who has not left us to regret his loss? This, indeed, may be one of the salutary effects of grief.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 37. (M., 1816.)

3607. GRIMM (Baron de), Genius.—A man of genius, of taste, of point, an acquaintance, the measure and traverses of whose mind I know.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 27. (M., 1816.)

— GULF STREAM.—See CANAL, 1116.

3608. GUNBOATS, Naval views.—On this subject professional men were consulted as far as we had opportunity. General Wilkinson, and the late General Gates, gave their opinions in writing, in favor of the system, as will be seen by their letters now communicated. The higher officers of the navy gave the same opinions in separate conferences, as their appearance at the seat of government offered occasions of consulting them, and no difference of judgment appeared on the subjects. Those of Commodore Baron and Captain Tingley. * * * are * * * transmitted herewith to the Legislature.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 80. FORD ED., ix, 23. (Feb. 1807.)

3609. HABEAS CORPUS, Bill of Rights and.—I like the declaration of rights as far as it goes, but I should have been for going further. For instance, the following alterations and additions would have pleased me: * * * Article 8. "No person shall be held in confinement more than — days after he shall have demanded and been refused a writ of habeas corpus by the judge appointed by law, nor more than — days after such a writ shall have been served on the person holding him in confinement; and no order given on due examination for his remandment or discharge; nor more than — hours in any place at a greater distance than — miles from the usual residence of some judge authorized to issue the writ of habeas corpus; nor shall such writ be suspended for any term exceeding one year, nor in any place more than — miles distant from the station or encampment of enemies or of insurgents."—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 100. FORD ED., v, 112. (P., Aug. 1789.)

* The death of Mrs. Jefferson.—EDITOR.

3610. HABEAS CORPUS IN ENGLAND.—Examine the history of England. See how few of the cases of the suspension of the habeas corpus law have been worthy of that suspension. They have been either real treason, wherein the parties might as well have been charged at once, or sham plots, where it was shameful they should ever have been suspected. Yet for the few cases wherein the suspension of the habeas corpus has done real good, that operation is now become habitual, and the minds of the nation almost prepared to live under its constant suspension.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 446. FORD ED., v, 46. (P., July 1788.)

3611. HABEAS CORPUS, Force of.—I do not like [in the new Federal Constitution] the omission of a bill of rights, providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for * * * the eternal and unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 329. FORD ED., iv, 476. (P., Dec. 1787.)

3612. HABEAS CORPUS, Suspension.—By a declaration of rights, I mean one which shall stipulate * * * no suspensions of the habeas corpus * * * —To A. DONALD. ii, 355. (P., 1788.) See 818.

3613. — — — I sincerely rejoice at the acceptance of our new Constitution by nine States. It is a good canvas, on which some strokes only want retouching. What these are, I think, are sufficiently manifested by the general voice from north to south, which calls for a bill of rights. It seems pretty generally understood that this should go to * * * habeas corpus. * * * Why suspend the habeas corpus in insurrections and rebellions? The parties who may be arrested may be charged instantly with a well defined crime; of course, the judge will remand them. If the public safety requires that the Government should have a man imprisoned on less probable testimony in those than in other emergencies, let him be taken and tried, retaken and retried, while the necessity continues, only giving him redress against the Government for damages.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v, 45. (P., 1788.)

— HAMILTON (Alexander), Accounts of.—See 36.

3614. HAMILTON (Alexander), Alliance with England.—Hamilton [at a meeting of the cabinet] thought that if we were unequal to the contest [with Spain] ourselves it behooved us to provide allies for our aid. That in this view, two nations could be named, France and England. France was too intimately connected with Spain in other points, and of too great mutual value, ever to separate for us. * * * England alone, then, remained. It would not be easy to effect it with her; however, he was for trying it, and for sounding them on the proposition of a defensive treaty of alliance. * The President said the remedy would be worse than the disease.—THE ANAS. ix, 124. FORD ED., i, 206. (Oct. 1792.)

* The difficulty arose out of the execution of the treaty between the United States and the Creek Indians, and the contention as to boundaries between the United States and Spain.—EDITOR.

3615. HAMILTON (Alexander), Anglo-maniac.—His mind was really powerful, but chained by native partialities to everything English. He had formed exaggerated ideas of the superior perfection of the English constitution, the superior wisdom of their government, and sincerely believed it for the good of this country to make them its model in everything; without considering that what might be wise and good for a nation essentially commercial, and entangled in complicated intercourse with numerous and powerful neighbors, might not be so for one essentially agricultural, and insulated by nature from the abusive governments of the old world.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 6. FORD ED., x, 34. (M., 1816.)

3616. HAMILTON (Alexander), Anti-Republican Colossus.—Hamilton is really a Colossus to the anti-republican party. Without numbers, he is an host within himself. They have got themselves into a defile where they might be finished; but too much security on the republican part will give time to his talents and indefatigableness to extricate them. We have had only middling performances to oppose to him. In truth, when he comes forward, there is nobody but yourself who can meet him. His adversaries having begun the attack, he has the advantage of answering them, and remains unanswered himself. * * * For God's sake take up your pen, and give a fundamental reply to "Curtius" and "Camillus."—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 121. FORD ED., vii, 32. (M., Sept. 1795.)

3617. HAMILTON (Alexander), Coalescence with Jefferson.—He [President Washington] proceeded to express his earnest wish that Hamilton and myself could coalesce in the measures of the government, and urged the general reasons for it which he had done to me in two former conversations. He said he had proposed the same thing to Hamilton, who expressed his readiness, and he thought our coalition would secure the general acquiescence of the public. I told him my concurrence was of much less importance than he seemed to imagine; that I kept myself aloof from all cabal and correspondence on the subject of the government, and saw and spoke with as few as I could. That as to a coalition with Mr. Hamilton, if by that was meant that either was to sacrifice his general system to the other, it was impossible. We had both, no doubt, formed our conclusions after the most mature consideration; and principles conscientiously adopted, could not be given up on either side.—THE ANAS. ix, 131. FORD ED., i, 215. (Feb. 1793.)

3618. HAMILTON (Alexander), Corruption and.—Hamilton was indeed a singular character. Of acute understanding, disinterested, honest, and honorable in all private transactions, amiable in society, and duly valuing virtue in private life, yet so bewitched and perverted by the British example, as to be under thorough conviction that corruption was essential to the government of a nation.—THE ANAS. ix, 97. FORD ED., i, 166. (1818.)

3619. HAMILTON (Alexander), Defence of bank.—In Fennos's newspaper you will discover Hamilton's pen in defence of the bank, and daring to call the republican party a faction.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 95. (Pa., 1792.)

and Mr. Madison's that a special mission to England is meditated, and Hamilton the missionary. A more degrading measure could not have been proposed. And why is Pinckney to be recalled? For it is impossible he should remain after such a testimony that he is not confided in? I suppose they think him not thorough fraud enough. I suspect too the mission, besides the object of placing the aristocracy of this country under the patronage of that government, has in view that of withdrawing Hamilton from the disgrace, and the public execrations which sooner or later must fall on the man who, partly by erecting fictitious debt, partly by volunteering in the payment of the debts of others, who could have paid them so much more conveniently themselves, has alienated forever all our ordinary and easy resources, and will oblige us hereafter to extraordinary ones for every little contingency out of the common line; and who has lately brought the President forward with manifestations that the business of the Treasury had got beyond the limits of his comprehension.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vi, 504. (M., April 1794.)

3621. HAMILTON (Alexander), Funding jobbery.—It is well known that, during the [Revolutionary] war, the greatest difficulty we encountered was the want of money or means to pay our soldiers who fought, or our farmers, manufacturers and merchants, who furnished the necessary supplies of food and clothing for them. After the expedient of paper money had exhausted itself, certificates of debt were given to the individual creditors, with assurance of payment, so soon as the United States should be able. But the distresses of the people often obliged them to part with these for the half, the fifth, and even a tenth of their value; and speculators had made a trade of cozening them from the holders by the most fraudulent practices, and persuasions that they would never be paid. In the bill for funding and paying these, Hamilton made no difference between the original holders and the fraudulent purchasers of this paper. Great and just repugnance arose at putting these two classes of creditors on the same footing, and great exertions were used to pay the former the full value, and to the latter, the price only which they had paid, with interest. But this would have prevented the game which was to be played, and for which the minds of greedy members were already tutored and prepared. When the trial of strength on these several efforts had indicated the form in which the bill would finally pass, this being known within doors sooner than without, and especially, than to those who were in distant parts of the Union, the base scramble began. Couriers and relay horses by land, and swift-sailing pilot boats by sea, were flying in all directions. Active partners and agents were associated and employed in every State, town and country neighborhood, and this paper was bought up at five shillings, and often as low as two shillings in the pound, before the holder knew that Congress had already provided for its redemption at par. Immense sums were thus filched from the poor and ignorant, and fortunes accumulated by those who had themselves been poor enough before. Men thus enriched by the dexterity of a leader, would follow of course the chief who was leading them to fortune, and become the zealous instruments of all his enterprises.—THE ANAS. ix, 91. FORD ED., i, 160. (1818.)

3622. HAMILTON (Alexander), Giles resolutions and.—You have for some time past seen a number of reports from the Secretary of the Treasury on enquiries instituted by the House of Representatives. When these were all come in, a number of resolutions were prepared by Mr. Giles, expressing the truths resulting from the reports. Mr. Giles and one or two others were sanguine enough to believe that the palpableness of the truths rendered a negative of them impossible, and forced them on. Others contemplating the character of the present House, one-third of which is understood to be made up of bank directors and stock jobbers who would be voting on the case of their chief; and another third of persons blindly devoted to that party, of persons not comprehending the papers, or persons comprehending them, but too indulgent to pass a vote of censure, foresaw that the resolutions would be negated by a majority of two to one. Still they thought that the negative of palpable truth would be of service, as it would let the public see how desperate and abandoned were the hands in which their interests were placed. The vote turned out to be what was expected, not more than three or four varying from what had been conceived of them. The public will see from this the extent of their danger, and a full representation at the ensuing session will doubtless find occasion to revise the decision, and take measures for ensuring the authority of the laws over the corrupt maneuvers of the heads of departments under the pretext of exercising discretion in opposition to law.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi, 194. (Pa., 1793.)

3623. HAMILTON (Alexander), Honesty.—Hamilton was honest as a man, but, as a politician, believing in the necessity of either force or corruption to govern men.—To Dr. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 560. FORD ED., ix, 296. (M., 1811.)

— HAMILTON (Alexander), A Monarchist.—See MONARCHY.

3624. HAMILTON (Alexander), The Republic and.—I mentioned to [Alexander] Hamilton a letter received from John Adams, disavowing "Publicola", and denying that he ever entertained a wish to bring this country under a hereditary Executive, or introduce an hereditary branch of legislature, &c. Hamilton, condemning Mr. Adams's writings and most particularly "Davila", as having a tendency to weaken the present government, declared in substance as follows: "I own it is my opinion, though I do not publish it in Dan or Beersheba, that the present government is not that which will answer the ends of society, by giving stability and protection to its rights, and that it will probably be found expedient to go into the British form. However, since we have undertaken the experiment, I am for giving it a fair course, whatever my expectations may be. The success, indeed, so far, is greater than I had expected, and therefore, at present, success seems more possible than it had done heretofore, and there are still other and other stages of improvement which, if the present does not succeed, may be tried, and ought to be tried before we give up the republican form altogether; for that mind must be really depraved, which would not prefer the equality of political rights, which is the foundation of pure republicanism, if it can be obtained consistently with order. Therefore, whoever by his writings disturbs the present order of things, is really blamable, however pure his intentions may be, and he was sure Mr. Adams's were pure." This is the substance of a declaration made in much more lengthy terms, and which seemed to be more formal than usual for a private conversation between two, and as if intended to qualify some less guarded expressions which had been dropped on former occasions.—THE ANAS. ix, 99. FORD ED., i, 169. (Aug. 1791.)

3625. HAMILTON (Alexander), Subservient to England.—Hamilton is panicked, if we refuse our breach to every kick which Great Britain may choose to give it. He is for proclaiming at once the most abject principles, such as would invite and merit habitual insults; and indeed every inch of ground must be fought in our councils to desperation, in order to hold up the face of even a sneaking neutrality, for our votes are generally two and a half against one and a half. Some propositions have come from him which would astonish Mr. Pitt himself with their boldness. If we preserve even a sneaking neutrality, we shall be indebted for it to the President, and not to his counsellors.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 548. FORD ED., vi, 238. (Pa., May 1793.)

3626. HAMILTON (Alexander), Treasury management.—Alexander Hamilton's [Treasury] system flowed from principles adverse to liberty, and was calculated to undermine and demolish the Republic, by creating an influence of his Department over the members of the Legislature. I saw this influence actually produced, and its first fruits to be the establishment of the great outlines of his project by the votes of the very persons who, having swallowed his bait, were laying themselves out to profit by his plans; and that had these persons withdrawn, as those interested in a question ever should, the vote of the disinterested majority was clearly the reverse of what they had made it. These were no longer the votes then of the representatives of the people, but of deserters from the rights and interests of the people; and it was impossible to consider their decisions, which had nothing in view but to enrich themselves, as the measures of the fair majority, which ought always to be respected.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 461. FORD ED., vi, 102. (M., 1792.)

3627. ———. The most prominent suspicion excited by the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 3, 1793, is that the funds raised in Europe, and which ought to have been applied to the payment of our debts there, in order to stop interest, have been drawn over to this country, and lodged in the Bank, to extend the speculations and increase the profits of that institution.*—No ADDRESS. FORD ED., vi, 165. (Feb. 1793.)

3628. ———. I do not at all wonder at the condition in which the finances of the United States are found. Hamilton's object from the beginning, was to throw them into forms which should be utterly undecipherable. I ever said he did not understand their condition himself, nor was able to give a clear view of the excess of our debts beyond our credits, nor whether we were diminishing or increasing the debt.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 131. FORD ED., vii, 61. (M., 1796.)

* This paper contains an analysis of the receipts and disbursements of the Treasury in Europe.—EDITOR.

3629. ——. Hamilton's financial system * * * had two objects: first, as a puzzle, to exclude popular understanding and inquiry; secondly, as a machine for the corruption of the Legislature.—THE ANAS. ix, 91. FORD ED. i, 160. (1818.) See ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS and BANK.

3630. HAMILTON (Henry), Cruelties.

—The indiscriminate murder of men, women and children, with the horrid circumstances of barbarity practiced by the Indian savages, was the particular task of Governor Hamilton's employment; and if anything could have aggravated the acceptance of such an office, and have made him personally answerable in a high degree, it was that eager spirit with which he is said to have executed it; and which, if the representations before the [Virginia] Council are to be credited, seems to have shown that his own feelings and disposition were in unison with his employment.*—TO THEODORICK BLAND, JR. FORD ED. ii, 191. (W., 1779.)

3631. HAPPINESS, Attainment.—Be

assiduous in learning, take much exercise for your health, and practice much virtue. Health, learning and virtue will insure your happiness; they will give you a quiet conscience, private esteem and public honor. Beyond these, we want nothing but physical necessities, and they are easily obtained.—TO PETER CARR. ii, 409. (P., 1788.)

3632. HAPPINESS, Conditions of.—Our greatest happiness * * * does not depend on the condition of life in which chance has placed us, but is always the result of a good conscience, good health, occupation, and freedom in all just pursuits.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 389. FORD ED. iii, 253. (1782.)

3633. HAPPINESS, Conjugal love and.

—Conjugal love is the basis of domestic happiness.—TO MR. BELLINI. i, 444. (1785.)

3634. HAPPINESS, Conservators of.—

If anybody thinks that kings, nobles, or priests are good conservators of the public happiness, send him here [France]. It is the best school in the world to cure him of that folly.—TO GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 7. FORD ED. iv, 268. (P., 1786.)

3635. HAPPINESS, Domestic.—The happiest moments of my life have been the few which I have passed at home in the bosom of my family.—TO FRANCIS WILLIS. FORD ED. v, 157. (N.Y., 1790.)

3636. HAPPINESS, Education and.—In the present spirit of extending to the great mass of mankind the blessings of instruction, I see a prospect of great advancement in the happiness of the human race.—TO C. C. BLATCHLY. vii, 263. (M., 1822.)

3637. HAPPINESS, Freedom and.—My future solicitude will be * * * to be instrumental to the happiness and freedom of all.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. (1801.)

3638. ——. The freedom and happiness of man * * * are the sole objects of all legitimate government.—TO GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 509. (M., 1810.)

3639. HAPPINESS, God and.—The Giver of life * * * gave it for happiness and not for wretchedness.—TO JAMES MONROE. i, 319. FORD ED. iii, 59. (M., 1782.)

3640. HAPPINESS, Government and.—

The only orthodox object of the institution of government is to secure the greatest degree of happiness possible to the general mass of those associated under it.—TO M. VAN DER KEMP. vi, 45. (M., 1812.)

3641. HAPPINESS, Guardians of.—For promoting the public happiness, those persons, whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue, should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth, birth, or other accidental condition or circumstance.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED. ii, 221. (1779.)

3642. HAPPINESS, High office and.—

No slave is so remote from happiness as the minister of a commonwealth.—TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. i, 312. FORD ED. iii, 49. (M., 1781.)

3643. HAPPINESS, Laws and.—The laws which must affect the happiness of every people must flow from their own habits, their own feelings, and the resources of their own minds. No stranger to these could possibly propose regulations adapted to them. Every people have their own particular habits, ways of thinking, manners, &c., which have grown up with them from their infancy, are become a part of their nature, and to which the regulations which are to make them happy must be accommodated.—TO WILLIAM LEE. vii, 56. (M., 1817.)

3644. HAPPINESS, Mature.—The motion of my blood no longer keeps time with the tumult of the world. It leads me to seek for happiness in the lap and love of my family, in the society of my neighbors and my books, in the wholesome occupations of my farm and my affairs, in an interest or affection in every bud that opens, in every breath that blows around me, in an entire freedom of rest, of motion, of thought, owing account to myself alone of my hours and actions.—TO JAMES MADISON. iii, 578. FORD ED. vi, 291. (June 1793.)

3645. HAPPINESS, No perfect.—Perfect happiness, I believe, was never intended by the Deity to be the lot of one of His creatures in this world; but that He has very much put in our power the nearness of our approaches to it, is what I have steadfastly believed.—TO JOHN PAGE. i, 187. FORD ED. i, 349. (1763.)

3646. HAPPINESS, Peace and.—The happiness of mankind is best promoted by the useful pursuits of peace.—R. to A. viii, 142 (1808.)

3647. HAPPINESS, Primitive.—I am convinced that those societies (as the Indians) which live without government, enjoy in their general mass an infinitely greater degree of happiness than those who live under the European governments.—To EDWARD CARINGTON. ii, 100. FORD ED., iv, 360. (P., 1787.)

3648. HAPPINESS, Public.—That people will be happiest whose laws are best, and are best administered.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1779.)

3649. HAPPINESS, Public approbation and.—The anxieties you express to administer to my happiness, do, of themselves, confer that happiness, and the measure will be complete, if my endeavors to fulfil my duties in the several public stations to which I have been called, have obtained for me the approbation of my country.—To THE INHABITANTS OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY, VA. v, 439. FORD ED., ix, 250. (M., April 1809.)

3650. HAPPINESS, Public servants and.—To the sacrifice of time, labor, fortune, a public servant must count upon adding that of peace of mind, and even reputation.—To DR. JAMES CURRIE. iv, 132. (P., 1786.)

3651. HAPPINESS, Purchased by bloodshed.—If the happiness of the mass of mankind can be secured at the expense of a little tempest* now and then, or even of a little blood it will be a precious purchase.—To EZRA STILES. ii, 77. (P., 1786.)

3652. HAPPINESS, Retrospective.—My principal happiness is now in the retrospect of life.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 399. (P., 1785.)

3654. HAPPINESS, Simple.—This friend [Dabney Carr] of ours, in a very small house, with a table, half a dozen chairs, and one or two servants, is the happiest man in the universe. * * * He speaks, thinks and dreams of nothing but his young son. Every incident in life he so takes as to render it a source of pleasure. With as much benevolence as the heart of man will hold, but with an utter neglect of the costly apparatus of life, he exhibits to the world a new phenomenon in philosophy—the Samian sage in the tub of the cynic.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 195. FORD ED., i, 373. (1770.)

3655. HAPPINESS, Tranquillity and.—It is neither wealth nor splendor, but tranquillity and occupation, which give happiness.—To MRS. A. S. MARKS. D. L. J., 135. (P., 1788.)

* Jefferson was referring to Shays's rebellion.—EDITOR.

3656. HAPPINESS, Virtue and.—Without virtue, happiness cannot be.—To AMOS J. COOK. vi, 532. (M., 1816.)

3657. HARMONY, Affection and.—Let us restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty and even life itself are but dreary things.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 2. FORD ED., viii, 2. (1801.)

3658. HARMONY, Blessings of.—The evanition of party discussions has harmonized intercourse, and sweetened society beyond imagination.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 67. FORD ED., x, 84. (M., 1817.)

3659. HARMONY vs. DISSENSION.—I hope * * * the good sense and patriotism of the friends of free government of every shade will spare us the painful, the deplorable spectacle of brethren sacrificing to small passions the great, the immortal and immutable rights of men.—To JOHN DICKINSON. FORD ED., viii, 77. (W., July 1801.)

3660. HARMONY, Inaugural address and.—I am made very happy by learning that the sentiments expressed in my inaugural address gave general satisfaction, and holds out a ground on which our fellow citizens can once more unite. I am the more pleased, because these sentiments have been, long and radically mine, and therefore will be pursued honestly and conscientiously.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 382. FORD ED., viii, 30. (W., March 1801.)

3661. ———. It is with the greatest satisfaction I learn from all quarters that my inaugural address is considered as holding out a ground for conciliation and union. I am the more pleased with this, because the opinion therein stated as to the real ground of difference among us (to wit: the measures rendered most expedient by the French enormities), is that which I have long entertained.—To GENERAL HENRY KNOX. iv, 385. FORD ED., viii, 35. (W., March 1801.)

3662. HARMONY, Incumbent on all.—The times do certainly render it incumbent on all good citizens, attached to the rights and honor of their country, to bury in oblivion all internal differences, and rally around the standard of their country in opposition to the outrages of foreign nations. All attempts to enfeeble and destroy the exertions of the General Government, in vindication of our national rights, or to loosen the bands of union by alienating the affections of the people, or opposing the authority of the laws at so eventful a period, merit the discountenance of all.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. viii, 153. (1809.)

3663. HARMONY, Love of country and.—My earnest prayers to all my friends [are] to cherish mutual good will, to promote harmony and conciliation, and above all things to let the love of our country soar above all minor passions.—To JOHN HOLLINS. v, 597. (M., 1811.)

3664. HARMONY, Measures for.—The measures we shall pursue, and propose for the amelioration of the public affairs, will be so confessedly salutary as to unite all men not monarchists in principle.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 407. FORD ED., viii, 85. (M., 1801.)

3665. HARMONY, Monarchists and.—Of the monarchical federalists I have no expectations. They are incurables, to be taken care of in a mad-house, if necessary, and on motives of charity.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 406. FORD ED., viii, 84. (M., Aug. 1801.)

3666. HARMONY, National.—The moment which should convince me that a healing of the nation into one is impracticable, would be the last moment of my wishing to remain where I am.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 406. FORD ED., viii, 84. (M., Aug. 1801.)

3667. ——. Every wish of my heart will be completely gratified when that portion of my fellow citizens which has been misled as to the character of our measures and principles, shall, by their salutary effects, be corrected in their opinions, and joining with good will the great mass of their fellow citizens, consolidate an Union, which cannot be too much cherished.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. viii, 114. (1802.) See SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS in Appendix.

3668. HARMONY, In New England.—In the New England States union will be slower than elsewhere * * *. But we will go on attending with the utmost solicitude to their interests, doing them impartial justice, and I have no doubt they will in time do justice to us.—To HENRY KNOX. iv, 387. FORD ED., viii, 37. (W., March 1801.)

3669. HARMONY, Obstacles to.—[The federalists] now find themselves with us, and separated from their quondam leaders. If we can * * * avoid shocking their feelings by unnecessary acts of severity against their late friends, they will in a little time cement and form one mass with us, and by these means harmony and union be restored to our country, which would be the greatest good we could effect. It was a conviction that these people did not differ from us in principle, which induced me to define the principles which I deemed orthodox, and to urge a reunion on those principles; and I am induced to hope it has conciliated many. I do not speak of the desperadoes of the quondam faction in and out of Congress. These I consider as incurables, on whom all attentions would be lost, and therefore will not be wasted. But my wish is to keep their flock from returning to them.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. iv, 381. FORD ED., viii, 26. (W., March 1801.)

3670. ——. I know there is an obstacle which very possibly may check the confidence which would otherwise have been more generally reposed in my observance of these principles. This obstacle does not arise from the measures to be pursued, as to which I am no fear of giving satisfaction, but from appointments and disappointments as to office.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 382. FORD ED., viii, 30. (W., March 1801.) See OFFICE.

3671. HARMONY, Political and personal.—I never suffered a political to become a personal difference. I have been left on this ground by some friends whom I dearly loved, but I was never the first to separate. With some others, of politics different from mine, I have continued in the warmest friendship to this day, and to all, and to yourself particularly, I have ever done moral justice.—To TIMOTHY PICKERING. vii, 210. (M., 1821.)

3672. ——. I feel extraordinary gratification in addressing this letter to you, with whom shades of difference in political sentiment have not prevented the interchange of good opinion, nor cut off the friendly offices of society and good correspondence. This political tolerance is the more valued by me, who considers social harmony as the first of human felicities, and the happiest moments those which are given to the effusions of the heart.—To ——. (1798.) RAYNER, p. 545.

3673. HARMONY, Principles and.—I hope to see shortly a perfect consolidation, to effect which, nothing shall be spared on my part, short of the abandonment of the principles of our Revolution.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 366. FORD ED., viii, 7. (W., March 1801.)

3674. ——. I hope we shall once more see harmony restored among our citizens, and an entire oblivion of past feuds. Some of the leaders who have most committed themselves cannot come into this. But I hope the great body of our fellow citizens will do it. I will sacrifice everything but principle to procure it.—To SAMUEL ADAMS. iv, 389. FORD ED., viii, 39. (W., March 1801.)

3675. HARMONY, Public good.—The greatest good we can do our country is to heal its party divisions, and make them one people.—To JOHN DICKINSON. FORD ED., viii, 76. (W., July 1801.)

3676. HARMONY, Restoration of.—To restore that harmony which our predecessors so wickedly made it their object to break up, to render us again one people, acting as one nation, should be the object of every man really a patriot. I am satisfied it can be done, and I own that the day which should convince me of the contrary would be the bitterest of my life.—To THOMAS MCKEAN. FORD ED., viii, 78. (W., July 1801.)

3677. HARMONY, Sacrifices for.—I see the necessity of sacrificing our opinions sometimes to the opinions of others for the sake of harmony.—To FRANCIS EFFES. FORD ED., v, 194. (N.Y., 1790.)

3678. HARTFORD CONVENTION, American maratists.—I do not say that all who met at Hartford were under the same motive of money, nor were those of France.

Some of them are "Outs" and wish to be "Ins"; some were mere dupes of the agitators, or of their own party passions, while the Maratists alone are in the real secret; but they have very different materials to work on. The yeomanry of the United States are not the canaille of Paris. We might safely give them leave to go through the United States recruiting their ranks, and I am satisfied they could not raise one single regiment (gambling merchants and silk-stocking clerks excepted) who would support them in any effort to separate from the Union. The cement of this Union is in the heart-blood of every American. I do not believe there is on earth a government established on so immovable a basis. Let them, in any State, even in Massachusetts itself, raise the standard of separation, and its citizens will rise in mass, and do justice themselves on their own incendiaries.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vi, 425. FORD ED., ix, 509. (M., 1815.)

3679. HARTFORD CONVENTION, Anarchy and.—The paradox with me is how any friend to the union of our country can, in conscience, contribute a cent to the maintenance of any one who perverts the sanctity of his desk to the open inculcation of rebellion, civil war, dissolution of the government, and the miseries of anarchy.—To GOVERNOR PLUMER. vi, 414. (M., 1815.)

3681. HARTFORD CONVENTION, Contempt for.—If they could have induced the government to some effort of suppression, or even to enter into discussion with them, it would have given them some importance, have brought them into some notice. But they have not been able to make themselves even a subject of conversation, either of public or private societies. A silent contempt has been the sole notice they excite; consoled, indeed, some of them, by the palpable favors of Philip [England].—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vi, 426. FORD ED., ix, 509. (M., 1815.)

3682. HARTFORD CONVENTION, Crime of.—When England took alarm lest France, become republican, should recover energies dangerous to her, she employed emissaries with means to engage incendiaries and anarchists in the disorganization of all government here. These, assuming exaggerated zeal for republican government and the rights of the people, crowded their inscriptions into the Jacobin societies, and overwhelming by their majorities the honest and enlightened patriots of the original institution, distorted its objects, pursued its genuine founders under the name of Brissotines and Girondists unto death, intrigued themselves into the municipality of Paris, controlled by terrorism the proceedings of the legislature, in which they were faithfully aided by their costpendaries there, the Dantons and Marats of the Mountain, murdered their King, septembrized the nation, and thus accomplished their stipulated task of demolishing liberty and government with it. England now fears the rising force of this republican nation, and by the same means is endeavoring to effect the same course of miseries and destruction here; it is impossible where one sees like courses of events commence, not to ascribe them to like causes. We know that the government of England, maintaining itself by corruption at home, uses the same means in other countries of which she has any jealousy, by subsidizing agitators and traitors among ourselves to distract and paralyze them. She sufficiently manifests that she has no disposition to spare ours. We see in the proceedings of Massachusetts, symptoms which plainly indicate such a course, and we know as far as such practices can ever be dragged into light, that she has practiced, and with success, on leading individuals of that State. Nay, further, we see those individuals acting on the very plan which our information had warned us was settled between the parties. These elements of explanation history cannot stantly subject to his own will. The crime, of combining with the oppressors of the earth to extinguish the last spark of human hope, that here, at length, will be preserved a model government, securing to man his rights and the fruits of his labor, by an organization constantly subject to his own will. The crime indeed, if accomplished, would immortalize its perpetrators, and their names would descend in history with those of Robespierre and his associates, as the guardian geni of despotism, and demons of human liberty.—To GOVERNOR PLUMER. vi, 414. (M., 1815.)

3683. HARTFORD CONVENTION, English bribery.—But the British ministers hoped more in their Hartford convention [than in the disordered condition of our finances]. Their fears of republican France being now done away, they are directed to republican America, and they are playing the same game for disorganization here, which they played in your country. The Marats, the Dantons and Robespierres of Massachusetts are in the same pay, under the same orders, and making the same efforts to anarchise us, that their prototypes in France did there.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vi, 425. FORD ED., ix, 508. (M., 1815.)

3684. HARTFORD CONVENTION, Laughing stock.—No event, more than this, has shown the placid character of our Constitution. Under any other, their treasons would have been punished by the halter. We let them live as laughing stocks for the world, and punish them by the torment of eternal contempt.—To DR. B. WATERHOUSE. FORD ED., ix, 532. (M., 1815.)

3685. HARTFORD CONVENTION, Unpopular.—I do not mean to say that all who are acting with these men are under the same motives. I know some of them personally to be incapable of it. Nor was that the case with the disorganizers and assassins of Paris. Delusions there, and party perversions here, furnish unconscious assistants to the hired actors in these atrocious scenes. But I have never entertained one moment's fear on this subject. The people of this country enjoy too much happiness to risk it for nothing; and I have never doubted that whenever the incendiaries of Massachusetts should venture openly to raise the standard of separation, its citizens would rise in mass and do justice themselves to their own parricides.—To GOVERNOR PLUMER. vi, 415. (M., 1815.)

3686. HASTINGS (Warren), Trial of.—I presume you will remain at London to see the trial of Hastings. Without suffering yourself to be imposed on by the pomp in which it will be enveloped, I would recommend to you to consider and decide for yourself these questions. If his offense is to be decided by the law of the land, why is he not tried in that court in which his fellow-citizens are tried, that is, the King's Bench? If he is cited before another court that he may be judged, not according to the law of the land, but by the discretion of his judges, is he not disfranchised of his most precious right, the benefit of the laws of his country in common with his other fellow-citizens? I think you will find on investigating this subject that every solid argument is against the extraordinary court, and that every one in its favor is specious only. It is a transfer from a judicature of learning and integrity to one, the greatness of which is both illiterate and unprincipled. Yet such is the force of prejudice with some, and of the want of reflection in others, that many of our constitutions have copied this absurdity, without suspecting it to be one.—To WILLIAM RUTLEDGE. ii, 349. FORD ED., v, 4. (P., 1788.)

3687. HAWKINS (Benjamin), Influence with Indians.—Towards the attainment of our two objects of peace and lands, it is essential that our agent acquire that sort of influence over the Indians which rests on confidence. In this respect, I suppose, that no man has ever obtained more influence than Colonel Hawkins. Towards the preservation of peace, he is omnipotent; in the encouragement he is indefatigable and successful.—To GENERAL ANDREW JACKSON. iv, 464. (W., 1803.)

3688. HEALTH vs. LEARNING.—Health must not be sacrificed to learning. A strong body makes the mind strong.—To PETER CARR. i, 397. (P., 1785.)

3690. ———. Health is worth more than learning.—To JOHN GARLAND JEFFERSON. FORD ED., v, 181. (N.Y., 1790.)

3691. HEALTH, Morality and.—Health is the first requisite after morality.—To PETER CARR. ii, 241. FORD ED., iv, 433. (P., 1787.)

3692. HEALTH, Unhappiness without.—Without health there is no happiness. An attention to health, then, should take place of every other object. The time necessary to secure this by active exercises, should be devoted to it in preference to every other pursuit. I know the difficulty with which a studious man tears himself from his studies, at any given moment of the day; but his happiness, and that of his family depend on it. The most uninformed mind, with a healthy body, is happier than the wisest valetudinarian.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. ii, 177. FORD ED., iv, 406. (P., 1787.)

3693. HEAVEN, Blessings of.—Retiring from the charge of their affairs, I carry with me the consolation of a firm persuasion that Heaven has in store for our beloved country long ages to come of prosperity and happiness.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 111. FORD ED., ix, 225. (Nov. 1808.)

3694. HENBY (Patrick), Ambitious.—Your character of Patrick Henry is precisely agreeable to the idea I had formed of him. I take him to be of unmeasured ambition.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 35. (P., 1785.)

3696. HENRY (Patrick), Avaricious.—Mr. Henry's ravenous avarice was the only passion paramount to his love of popularity.—To WILLIAM WIRT. FORD ED., ix, 339. (M., 1812.)

3697. HENRY (Patrick), Brilliant but illogical.—In ordinary business [in the House of Burgesses] he was a very inefficient member. He could not draw a bill on the most simple subject which would bear legal criticism, or even the ordinary criticism which looks to correctness of style and ideas, for indeed there was no accuracy of idea in his head. His imagination was copious, poetical, sublime, but vague also. He said the strongest things in the finest language, but without logic, without arrangement, desultorily.—To WILLIAM WIRT. FORD ED., ix, 341. (M., 1812.)

3698. HENRY (Patrick), Declined office.—The office of Secretary of State was offered to P. H. [Patrick Henry] in order to draw him over, and gain some popularity; but not till there was a moral certainty that he would not accept it.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 59. (M., March 1796.)

3699. ———. Most assiduous court is paid to Patrick Henry. He has been offered everything which they knew he would not accept. Some impression is thought to be made, but we do not believe it is radical. If they thought they could count upon him, they would run him for their Vice-President; their first object being to produce a schism in this State.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 148. FORD ED., vii, 89. (M., July 1796.)

3700. HENRY (Patrick), Early manhood.—You ask some account of Mr. Henry's mind, information and manners in 1759-60, when I first became acquainted with him. We met at Nathan Dandridges, in Hanover, about the Christmas of that winter, and passed perhaps a fortnight together at the revelries of the neighborhood and season. His manners had something of the coarseness of the society he had frequented; his passion was fiddling, dancing and pleasantry. He excelled in the last and it attached every one to him. The occasion perhaps, as much as his idle disposition, prevented his engaging in any conversation which might give the measure either of his mind or information. Opportunity was not wanting, because Mr. John Campbell was there, who had married Mrs. Spotswood, the sister of Colonel Dandridge. He was a man of science, and often introduced conversations on scientific subjects. Mr. Henry had a little before broke up his store, or rather it had broken him up, and within three months after he came to Williamsburg for his license, and told me, I think, he had read law not more than six weeks.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vi, 487. FORD ED., ix, 475. (M., 1815.)

3701. HENRY (Patrick), Eloquence.—When the famous resolutions of 1765, against the Stamp Act, were proposed, I was yet a student of law in Williamsburg. I attended the debate, however, at the door of the lobby of the House of Burgesses and heard the splendid display of Mr. Henry's talents as a popular orator. They were great, indeed; such as I have never heard from any other man. He appeared to me to speak as Homer wrote.*—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 4. FORD ED., i, 6. (1821.)

3702. ——. Another of the great occasions on which he exhibited examples of eloquence such as probably had never been exceeded, was on the question of adopting the new Constitution in 1788. To this he was most violently opposed. To WILLIAM WIRT. FORD ED., ix, 344. (M., 1811?)

3703. HENRY (Patrick), Foe of Constitution.—Henry is the avowed foe of the new Constitution. He stands higher in public estimation [in Virginia] than he ever did, yet he was so often in the minority in the present assembly that he has quitted it, never more to return, unless an opportunity offers to overturn the new Constitution.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 136. (Dec. 1789.)

3704. HENRY (Patrick), Force of oratory.—Mr. Henry's first remarkable exhibition [in the House of Burgesses] was on the motion for the establishment of an office for lending money on mortgages of real property.

* * * I can never forget a particular exclamation of his in the debate in which he electrified his hearers. It had been urged that from certain unhappy circumstances of the Colony, men of substantial property had contracted debts, which, if exacted suddenly, must ruin them and their families, but, with a little indulgence of time, might be paid with ease. "What, Sir!" exclaimed Mr. Henry in animadverting on this, "is it proposed then to reclaim the spendthrift from his dissipation and extravagance, by filling his pockets with money?" * * * He laid open with so much energy the spirit of favoritism on which the proposition was founded, and the abuses to which it would lead, that it was crushed in its birth.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vi, 364. FORD ED., ix, 466. (M., 1814.)

3705. HENRY (Patrick), Gerryman-dering.—Mr. Henry is omnipotent in Virginia. Mr. Madison was left out as a Senator by eight or nine votes; and Henry has so modelled the districts for Representatives, as to tack Orange to counties where himself has great influence, that Madison may not be elected into the lower Federal House, which was the place he had wished to serve in, and not the Senate.—To WILLIAM SHORT. ii, 574. FORD ED., v, 70. (P., 1789.)

3706. HENRY (Patrick), Influence.—I have understood that Mr. Henry has always been opposed [to a new constitution for Virginia]; and I confess that I consider his talents and influence such as that, were it decided that we should call a convention for the purpose of amending, I should fear he might induce that convention either to fix the thing as at present, or change it for the worse. Would it not, therefore, be well that means should be adopted for coming at his ideas of the changes he would agree to, and for communicating to him those which we should propose? Perhaps he might find ours not so distant from his, but that some mutual sacrifices might bring them together.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 314. FORD ED., v, 408. (Pa., 1791.)

* Jefferson in speaking of Patrick Henry to Daniel Webster (FORD ED., x, 327) said: "He was far before all in maintaining the spirit of the Revolution. His influence was most extensive with the members from the upper counties, and his boldness and their votes overawed and controlled the more cool or the more timid aristocratic gentlemen in the lower part of the State."—EDITOR.

3707. HENRY (Patrick), Innate love of liberty.—No man ever more undervalued chartered titles than himself. He drew all natural rights from a purer source—the feelings of his own breast.—To WILLIAM WIRT. FORD ED., x, 60. (M., 1816.)

3708. HENRY (Patrick), Intrigue.—Our Legislature is filled with too great a mass of talents and principle to be now swayed by Mr. Henry. He will experience mortifications to which he has been hitherto a stranger. Still, I fear something from his intriguing and cajoling talents, for which he is still more remarkable than for his eloquence. As to the effect of his name among the people, I have found it crumble like a dried leaf, the moment they become satisfied of his apostasy.—To TENCH COXE. FORD ED., vii, 381. (M., May 1799.)

3709. HENRY (Patrick), Literary indolence.—He was the laziest man in reading I ever knew.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 8. FORD ED., i, 13. (1821.)

3710. HENRY (Patrick), Mysterious.—Henry, as usual, is involved in mystery. Should the popular tide run strongly in either direction he will fall in with it. Should it not, he will have a struggle between his enmity to the Lees, and his enmity to everything which may give influence to Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 318. (T., May 1783.)

3711. HENRY (Patrick), Philips case.—The censure of Mr. E. Randolph on Mr. Henry in the case of Philips, was without foundation. I remember the case, and took my part in it. Philips was a mere robber, who availing himself of the troubles of the times, collected a banditti, retired to the Dismal Swamp, and from thence sallied forth, plundering and maltreating the neighboring inhabitants, and covering himself, without authority, under the name of a British subject. Mr. Henry, then Governor, communicated the case to me. We both thought the best proceeding would be by bill of attainder, unless he delivered himself up for trial within a given time. Philips was afterwards taken; and Mr. Randolph being Attorney General, and apprehending he would plead that he was a British subject, taken in arms, in support of his lawful sovereign, and as a prisoner of war entitled to the protection of the law of nations, he thought the safest proceeding would be to indict him at common law as a felon and robber. Against this I believe Philips urged the same plea; he was overruled and found guilty.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vi, 369. FORD ED., ix, 470. (M., 1814.)

3712. HENRY (Patrick), Political alertness.—The people of Virginia are beginning to call for a new constitution for their State. This symptom of their wishes will probably bring over Mr. Henry to the proposition. He has been the great obstacle to it hitherto; but you know he is always alive to catch the first sensation of the popular breeze, that he may take the lead of that which in truth leads him.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., vi, 122. (Pa., 1792.)

3713. HENRY (Patrick), Political fall.—[Alexander] Hamilton * * * became his idol, and, abandoning the republican advocates of the Constitution, the Federal Government on federal principles became his political creed. * * * His apostasy sunk him to nothing in the estimation of his country. He lost at once all that influence which federalism had hoped, by cajoling him, to transfer with him to itself, and a man who through a long and active life had been the idol of his country beyond any one that ever lived, descended to the grave with less than its indifference, and verified the saying of the philosopher, that no man must be called happy till he is dead.—To WILLIAM WIRT. FORD ED., ix, 344. (M., 1811?)

3714. HENRY (Patrick), Speculator.—

The States of Virginia and North Carolina are peculiarly dissatisfied with the assumption of the State debts by the General Government. I believe, however, that it is harped on by many to mask their disaffection to the Government on other grounds. Its great foe in Virginia is an implacable one. He avows it himself, but does not avow all his motives for it. The measures and tone of the Government threaten abortion to some of his speculations; most particularly to that of the Yazoo territory. But it is too well nerved to be overawed by individual opposition.—To GOVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 198. FORD ED., v, 250. (Pa., 1790.)

3715. HENRY (Patrick), Virginia Constitution.—While Mr. Henry lives another bad constitution would be formed and forever on us.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 16. (P., Dec. 1784.)

—HEREDITARY OFFICERS.—See GOVERNMENT.

3716. HERESY, False religion and.—Heresy and false religion are withheld from the cognizance of Federal tribunals.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 466. FORD ED., vii, 295. (1798.)

3717. HERESY, Political.—Establish principles and examples which * * * [shall] fence us against future heresies, preached now, to be practiced hereafter.—To COLONEL INNES. iii, 224. FORD ED., v, 300. (1791.)

3718. HERSCHEL (Sir William), Theories of.—Herschel's volcano in the moon you have doubtless heard of, and placed among the other vagaries of a head, which seems not organized for sound induction. The wildness of the theories hitherto proposed by him, on his own discoveries, seems to authorize us to consider his merit as that of a good optician only.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 429. (P., 1788.)

3719. HESSIANS, Employment of.—His Britannic Majesty, in order to destroy our freedom and happiness, * * * commenced against us a cruel and unprovoked war, and unable to engage Britons sufficient to execute his sanguinary measures, * * * applied for aid to foreign princes who were in the habit of selling the blood of their people for money, and from them * * * procured and transported hither, a considerable number of foreigners.—PROCLAMATION. FORD ED., ii, 445. (1781.) See ARMY (DESERTERS), and IMMIGRATION.

3720. HISTORY, Ancient vs. Modern.—I feel a much greater interest in knowing what passed two or three thousand years ago than in what is passing now. I read nothing, therefore, but of the heroes of Troy, of the wars of Lacedæmon and Athens, of Pompey and Cæsar, and of Augustus, too, the Bonaparte and parricide scoundrel of that day.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 111. FORD ED., x, 120. (M., 1819.)

3721. ———. I am happier while reading the history of ancient than of modern times. The total banishment of all moral principle from the code which governs the intercourse of nations, the melancholy reflection that after the mean, wicked and cowardly cunning of the cabinets of the age of Machiavelli had given place to the integrity and good faith which dignified the succeeding one of a Chatham and Turgot, that this is to be swept away again by the daring profligacy and avowed destitution of all moral principle of a Cartouche and a Blackbeard, sicken my soul unto death. I turn from the contemplation with loathing, and take refuge in the histories of other times, where, if they also furnished their Tarquins, their Catalines and Caligulas, their stories are handed to us under the brand of a Livy, a Salust and a Tacitus, and we are comforted with the reflection that the condemnation of all succeeding generations has confirmed the sentence of the historian, and consigned their memories to everlasting infamy, a solace we cannot have with the Georges and Napoleons but by anticipation.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 109. (M., April 1813.)

3722. HISTORY, Authors and compilers.—In all cases, I prefer original authors to compilers. For a course of ancient history, therefore [in the University of Virginia], of Greece and Rome especially, I should advise the usual suite of Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Diodorus, Livy, Cæsar, Suetonius, Tacitus and Dion, in their originals if understood, and in translations, if not. For its continuation to the final destruction of the Empire we must then be content with Gibbon, a compiler, and with Segur, for a judicious recapitulation of the whole. After this general course, there are a number of particular histories filling up the chasms, which may be read at leisure in the progress of life. Such is Arrian, Q. Curtius, Polybius, Sallust, Plutarch, Dionysius, Halicarnassus, Micas, &c. The ancient Universal History should be on our shelves as a book of general reference, the most learned and most faithful perhaps that ever was written. Its style is very plain but perspicuous.—To ———. vii, 411. (M., 1825.)

3723. HISTORY, Bad government and.—History, in general, only informs us what bad government is.—To JOHN NARVELL. v, 91. FORD ED., ix, 72. (W., 1807.)

3724. HISTORY, Genuine.—A morsel of genuine history is a thing so rare as to be always valuable.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 82. (P.F., 1817.)

3725. HISTORY, False.—Man is fed with fables through life, leaves it in the belief he knows something of what has been passing, when in truth he has known nothing but what has passed under his own eye.—To THOMAS COOPER. FORD ED., x, 286. (M., 1823.)

3726. HISTORY, Lawyers and.—History, especially, is necessary to form a lawyer.—To JOHN GARLAND JEFFERSON. FORD ED., v, 180. (N.Y., 1790.)

3727. HISTORY, Neglected Material.—It is truly unfortunate that those engaged in public affairs so rarely make notes of transactions passing within their knowledge. Hence history becomes fable instead of fact. The great outlines may be true, but the incidents and coloring are according to the faith or fancy of the writer. Had Judge Marshall taken half your pains in sifting and scrutinizing facts, he would not have given to the world, as true history a false copy of a record under his eye. Burke again has copied him, and being a second writer, doubles the credit of the copy. When writers are so indifferent as to the correctness of facts, the verification of which lies at their elbow, by what measure shall we estimate their relation of things distant, or of those given to us through the obliquities of their own vision? Our records it is true in the case under contemplation, were destroyed by the malice and Vandalism of the British military, perhaps of their government, under whose orders they committed so much useless mischief. But printed copies remained, as your examination has proved. Those which were apocryphal, then, ought not to have been hazarded without examination.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vi, 370. FORD ED., ix, 471. (M., 1814.)

3728. HISTORY, Panegyric and.—You have certainly practiced vigorously [in the Life of Patrick Henry] the precept of "de mortuis nil nisi bonum." This presents a very difficult question,—whether one only or both sides of the medal shall be presented. It constitutes, perhaps, the distinction between panegyric and history.—To WILLIAM WIRT. FORD ED., x, 61. (P. F., 1816.)

3729. HISTORY, Peace and.—Wars and contentions, indeed, fill the pages of history with more matter. But more blessed is that nation whose silent course of happiness furnishes nothing for history to say.—To COUNT DIODATI. v, 62. (W., 1807.)

3730. HISTORY, Private letters and.—History may distort truth, and will distort it for a time, by the superior efforts at justification of those who are conscious of needing it most. The opening scenes of our present government will not be seen in their true aspect until the letters of the day, now held in private hoards, shall be broken up and laid open to public view.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 292. FORD ED., x, 228. (M., 1823.)

3731. — Although I decline all newspaper controversy, yet when falsehoods have been advanced, within the knowledge of no one so much as myself, I have sometimes deposited a contradiction in the hands of a friend, which, if worth preservation, may, when I am no more, nor those whom I might offend, throw light on history, and recall that into the path of truth.—To MARTIN VAN BUREN. vii, 372. FORD ED., x, 315. (M., 1824.)

3732. HISTORY, Records of.—Time and accident are committing daily havoc on the originals of the valuable historical and State papers deposited in our public offices. The late war has done the work of centuries in this business. The last cannot be recovered, but let us save what remains; not by vaults and locks which fence them from the public eye and use in consigning them to the waste of time, but by such a multiplication of copies, as shall place them beyond the reach of accident.—To MR. HAZARD. iii, 211. (Pa., 1791.)

3733. HISTORY, Truthful.—We who are retired from the business of the world, are glad to catch a glimpse of truth here and there as we can, to guide our path through the boundless field of fable in which we are bewildered by public prints, and even by those calling themselves histories. A word of truth to us is like the drop of water supplicated from the tip of Lazarus's finger. It is as an observation of latitude and longitude to the mariner long enveloped in clouds, for correcting the ship's way.—To JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. vii, 87. (M., 1817.)

3734. — True history, in which all will be believed, is preferable to unqualified panegyric, in which nothing is believed.—To JOSEPH DELAPLAINE. vii, 21. FORD ED., x, 56. (M., 1816.)

3735. HISTORY, Value of.—The most effectual means of preventing the perversion of power into tyranny are to illuminate, as far as practicable, the minds of the people at large, and more especially to give them knowledge of those facts, which history exhibits, that possessed thereby of the experience of other ages and countries, they may be enabled to know ambition under all its shapes, and prompt to exert their natural powers to defeat its purposes.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1779.)

3736. — History, by apprising the people of the past, will enable them to judge of the future; it will avail them of the experience of other times and other nations; it will qualify them as judges of the actions and designs of men; it will enable them to know ambition under every disguise it may assume; and knowing it, to defeat its views.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 390. FORD ED., iii, 254. (1782.)

3737. HISTORY, Writing.—You say I must go to writing history. While in public life I had not time, and now that I am retired, I am past the time. To write history requires a whole life of observation, of inquiry, of labor and correction. Its materials are not to be found among the ruins of a decayed memory.—To J. B. STUART. vii, 65. (M., 1817.)

3738. HISTORY (American), Collecting.—While I was in Europe, I purchased everything I could lay my hands on which related to any part of America, and particularly had a pretty full collection of the English, French, and Spanish authors on the subject of Louisiana.—To WILLIAM DUNBAR. iv, 539. (W., 1804.)

3739. HISTORY (American), Criticisms on.—It is impossible to read thoroughly such writings as those of Harper and Otis, who take a page to say what requires but a sentence, or rather, who give you whole pages of what is nothing to the purpose. A cursory race over the ground is as much as they can claim. It is easy for them, at this day, to endeavour to whitewash their party, when the greater part are dead of those who witnessed what passed, others old and become indifferent to the subject, and others indisposed to take the trouble of answering them. As to Otis, his attempt is to prove that the sun does not shine at midday; that that is not a fact which every one saw. He merits no notice. It is well known that Harper had little scruple about facts where detection was not obvious. By placing in false lights whatever admits it, and passing over in silence what does not, a plausible aspect may be presented of anything.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 389. FORD ED., x, 328. (M., 1825.)

3740. HISTORY (American), Inaccuracies.—Botta * * * has put his own speculations and reasonings into the mouths of persons whom he names, but who, you and I know, never made such speeches. In this he has followed the example of the ancients, who made their great men deliver long speeches, all of them in the same style, and in that of the author himself. The work is nevertheless a good one, more judicious, more chaste, more classical, and more true than the party diatribe of Marshall. Its greatest fault is in having taken too much from him. To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 489. FORD ED., ix, 527. (M., 1815.)

3741. HISTORY (American), Naval.—Why omit all mention of the scandalous campaigns of Commodore Morris? A two years' command of an effective squadron, with discretionary instructions, wasted in sailing from port to port of the Mediterranean, and a single half day before the port of the enemy against which he was sent. All this can be seen in the proceedings of the court on which he was dismissed; and it is due to the honorable truths with which the book abounds, to publish those which are not so.—To MATTHEW CARR. vi, 132. (M., 1813.)

3742. HISTORY (American), Preservation of.—It is the duty of every good citizen to use all the opportunities which occur to him, for preserving documents relating to the history of our country.—To HUGH P. TAYLOR. vii, 313. (M., 1823.)

3743. HISTORY (American), Revolutionary.—On the subject of the history of the American Revolution, you ask who shall write it? Who can write it? And who will ever be able to write it? Nobody; except merely its external facts; all its councils, designs, and discussions having been conducted by Congress with closed doors, and with no members, as far as I know, having even made notes of them. These, which are the life and soul of history, must forever be unknown.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 489. FORD ED., ix, 527. (M., 1815.)

3744. — — — I am now reading Botta's History of our own Revolution. Bating the ancient practice which he has adopted of putting speeches into mouths which never made them, and fancying motives of action which we never felt, he has given that history with more detail, precision and candor, than any writer I have yet met with. It is, to be sure, compiled from those writers; but it is a good secretion of their matter, the pure from the impure, and presented in a just sense of right in opposition to usurpation.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 63. (M., 1817.)

3745. HISTORY (English), Distorted.—Hume's [History], were it faithful, would be the finest piece of history which has ever been written by man. Its unfortunate bias may be partly ascribed to the accident of his having written it backwards. His maiden work was the History of the Stuarts. It was a first essay to try his strength before the public. And whether as a Scotchman he had really a partiality for that family, or thought that the lower their degradation, the more fame he should acquire by raising them up to some favor, the object of his work was an apology for them. He spared nothing, therefore, to wash them white, and to palliate their misgovernment. For this purpose he suppressed truths, advanced falsehoods, forged authorities and falsified records. All this is proved on him unanswerably by Brodie. But so bewitching was his style and manner, that his readers were unwilling to doubt anything, swallowed everything.

all England became tories by the magic of his art. His pen revolutionized the public sentiment of that country more completely than the standing armies could ever have done, which were so much dreaded and deprecated by the patriots of that day. Having succeeded so eminently in the acquisition of fortune and fame by this work, he undertook the history of the two preceding dynasties, the Plantagenets and Tudors. It was all important in this second work, to maintain the thesis of the first, that "it was the people who encroached on the sovereign, not the sovereign who usurped on the rights of the people". And, again, chapter 53d. "the grievances under which the English labored [to wit: whipping, pillorying, cropping, imprisoning, fining, &c.], when considered in themselves, without regard to the constitution, scarcely deserve the name, nor were they either burthensome on the people's properties, or anywise shocking to the natural humanity of mankind". During the constant wars, civil and foreign, which prevailed while those two families occupied the throne, it was not difficult to find abundant instances of practices the most despotic, as are wont to occur in times of violence. To make this second epoch support the third, therefore, required but a little garbling of authorities. And it then remained, by a third work, to make of the whole a complete history of England on the principles on which he had advocated that of the Stuarts. This would comprehend the Saxon and Norman Conquests, the former exhibiting the genuine form and political principles of the people constituting the nation, and founded in the rights of man; the latter built on conquest and physical force, not at all affecting moral rights, nor even assented to by the free will of the vanquished. The battle of Hastings, indeed, was lost, but the natural rights of the nation were not staked on the event of a single battle. Their will to recover the Saxon constitution continued unabated, and was at the bottom of all the unsuccessful insurrections which succeeded in subsequent times. The victors and vanquished continued in a state of living hostility, and the nation may still say, after losing the battle of Hastings,

"What though the field be lost?
All is not lost; the unconquerable will
And study of revenge, immortal hate
And courage never to submit or yield."

The government of a nation may be usurped by the forcible intrusion of an individual into the throne. But to conquer its will, so as to rest the right on that, the only legitimate basis, requires long acquiescence and cessation of all opposition. The whig historians of England, therefore, have always gone back to the Saxon period for the true principles of their constitution, while the tories and Hume, their Coryphæus, date it from the Norman Conquest, and hence conclude that the continual claim by the nation of the good old Saxon laws, and the struggles to recover them, were "encroachments of the people on the crown, and not usurpations of the crown on the people".—To — — —. vii, 412. (M., 1825.)

3746. HISTORY (English), Faithful authors.—Of England there is as yet no general history so faithful as Rapin's. He may be followed by Ludlow, Fox, Belsham, Hume and Brodie.—To — — —. vii, 412. (M., 1825.)

3747. HISTORY (English), Hume's.—There is no general history of Great Britain which can be recommended. The elegant one of Hume seems intended to disguise and discredit the good principles of the government, and is so plausible and pleasing in its style and manner, as to instil its errors and heresies insensibly into the minds of unwary readers. Baxter has performed a good operation on it. He has taken the text of Hume as his ground work, abridging it by the omission of some details of little interest, and wherever he has found him endeavoring to mislead, by either the suppression of a truth, or by giving it a false coloring, he has changed the text to what it should be, so that we may properly call it Hume's history republicanized. He has moreover continued the history (but indifferently) from where Hume left it, to the year 1800. The work is not popular in England, because it is republican. * * * Adding to this Ludlow's Memoirs, Mrs. McCauley's and Belknap's histories, a sufficient view will be presented of the free principles of the English constitution.—To JOHN NORVELL. v, 91. FORD ED., ix, 72. (W., 1807.)

3748. ——. Every one knows that judicious matter and charms of style have rendered Hume's History the manual of every student. I remember well the enthusiasm with which I devoured it when young, and the length of time, the research and reflection which were necessary to eradicate the poison it had instilled into my mind. It was unfortunate that he first took up the history of the Stuarts, became their apologist, and advocated all their enormities. To support his work, when done, he went back to the Tudors, and so selected and arranged the materials of their history as to present their arbitrary acts only, as the genuine samples of the constitutional power of the crown, and, still writing backwards, he then reverted to the early history, and wrote the Saxon and Norman periods with the same perverted view. Although all this is known, he still continues to be put into the hands of all our young people, and to infect them with the poison of his own principles of government. It is this book which has undermined the free principles of the English government, has persuaded readers of all classes that there were usurpations on the legitimate and salutary rights of the crown, and has spread universal toriosity over the land.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 533. (M., 1810.)

3749. ——. This single book [Hume's History of England] has done more to sap the free principles of the English constitution than the largest standing army of which their patriots have been so jealous. It is like the portraits of our countryman Wright, whose eye was so unhappy as to seize all the ugly features of his subject, and to present them faithfully, while it was entirely insensible to every lineament of beauty. So Hume has concentrated, in his fascinating style, all the arbitrary proceedings of the English Kings, as true evidences of the constitution, and glided over its Whig principles as the unfounded pretensions of factious demagogues. He even boasts, in his life written by himself, that of the numerous alterations suggested by the readers of his work, he had never adopted one proposed by a Whig.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 46. (P.F., 1816.)

3750. HISTORY (English), Part of American.—Our laws, language, religion, politics and manners are so deeply laid in English foundations, that we shall never cease to consider their history as a part of ours, and to study ours in that as its origin.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 533. (M., 1810.)

3751. HISTORY (English), Value of.—As we have employed some of the best materials of the British constitution in the construction of our own government, a knowledge of British history becomes useful to the American politician.—To JOHN NORVELL. v, 91. FORD ED., ix, 72. (W., 1807.)

3752. HISTORY, Roman.—I have been * * * delighted with reading a work, the title of which did not promise much useful information or amusement—L'Italia Avanti il Dominio dei Romani dal Micali. * * * Micali has given the counterpart of the Roman history for the nations over which they extended their dominion. For this he has gleaned up matter from every quarter, and furnished materials for reflection and digestion to those who, thinking as they read, have perceived that there was a great deal of matter behind the curtain, could that be fully withdrawn. He certainly gives new ideas of a nation whose splendor has masked and palliated their barbarous ambition.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 63. (M., 1817.)

3753. HOGENDORP (Count Van), Ability.—A very particular acquaintance with M. de Hogendorp * * * has led me to consider him as the best informed man of his age I have ever seen.—To GEORGE WASHINGTON. FORD ED., iii, 445. (A., 1784.)

3755. HOLLAND, Prince of Orange and.—The treasonable perfidy of the Prince of Orange, Stadtholder and Captain General of the United Netherlands, in the war which England waged against them, for entering into a treaty of commerce with the United States, is known to all. As their executive officer, charged with the conduct of the war, he contrived to baffle all the measures of the States General, to dislocate all their military plans, and played false into the hands of England against his own country on every possible occasion, confident in her protection, and in that of the King of Prussia, brother to his Princess. The States General, indignant at this patricidal conduct, applied to France for aid, according to the stipulations of the treaty concluded with her in 1785. It was assured to them readily and in cordial terms. * * * The object of the Patriots was to establish a representative and republican government. The majority of the States General were with them, but the majority of the populace of the towns was with the Prince of Orange; and that populace was played off with great effect by the triumvirate of [Sir James] Harris, the English ambassador, afterwards Lord Malmesbury, the Prince of Orange, a stupid man, and the Princess as much a man as either of her colleagues, in audaciousness, in enterprise and in the thirst of domination. By these the mobs of the Hague were excited against the members of the States General; their persons were insulted and endangered in the streets; the sanctuary of their houses was violated and the Prince, whose function and duty it was to repress and punish these violations of order, took no steps for that purpose. The States General for their own protection were, therefore, obliged to place their militia under the command of a committee. The Prince filled the courts of London and Berlin with complaints at this usurpation of his prerogatives and, forgetting that he was but the first servant of a republic, marched his regular troops against the city of Utrecht, where the States were in session. They were repulsed by the militia. His interests now became marshalled with those of the public enemy and against his own country. The States, therefore, exercising their rights of sovereignty, deprived him of all his powers. The great Frederic had died in August, 1786. He had never intended to break with France in support of the Prince of Orange. During the illness of which he died, he had, through the Duke of Brunswick, declared to the Marquis de Lafayette, * * * that he meant not to support the English interest in Holland; that he might assure the government of France his only wish was that some honorable place in the Constitution should be reserved for the Stadtholder and his children, and that he would take no part in the quarrel unless an entire abolition of the Stadtholderate should be attempted. But his place was now occupied by Frederic William, his great nephew, a man of little understanding, much caprice and very inconsiderate; and the Princess, his sister, although her husband was in arms against the legitimate authorities of the country, attempting to go to Amsterdam for the purpose of exciting the mobs of that place, and being refused permission to pass a military post on the way, he put the Duke of Brunswick at the head of twenty thousand men, and made demonstrations of marching on Holland. The King of France hereupon declared, by his Chargé des Affaires in Holland, that if the Prussian troops continued to menace Holland with an invasion, his Majesty, in quality of Ally, was determined to succor that province. In answer to this Eden gave official information to Count Montmorin, that England must consider as at an end, its convention with France relative to giving notice of its naval armaments and that she was arming generally. War being now imminent, Eden, since Lord Auckland, questioned me on the effect of our treaty with France in the case of a war, and what might be our dispositions. I told him frankly and without hesitation that our dispositions would be neutral, and that I thought it would be the interest of both these powers that we should be so; because it would relieve both from all anxiety as to feeding their West India islands; that England, too, by suffering us to remain so, would avoid a heavy land war on our continent, which might very much cripple her proceedings elsewhere; that our treaty, indeed, obliged us to receive into our ports the armed vessels of France, with their prizes, and to refuse admission to the prizes made on her by her enemies; that there was a clause also by which we guaranteed to France her American possessions, which might perhaps force us into the war, if these were attacked. "Then it will be war," said he, "for they will assuredly be attacked." Liston, at Madrid, about the same time, made the same inquiries of Carmichael. The government of France then declared a determination to form a camp of observation at Givet, commenced arming her marine, and named the Bailli de Suffrein their generalissimo on the ocean. She secretly engaged also in negotiations with Russia, Austria and Spain to form a quadruple alliance. The Duke of Brunswick, having advanced to the confines of Holland, sent some of his officers to Givet to reconnoitre the state of things there, and report them to him. * * *

Finding that there was not a single company there, he boldly entered the country, took their towns as fast as he presented himself before them, and advanced on Utrecht. The States had appointed the Rhingrave of Salm their Commander-in-Chief, a Prince without talents, without courage and without principle. He might have held out in Utrecht for a considerable time, but he surrendered the place without firing a gun, literally ran away and hid himself, so that for months it was not known what had become of him. Amsterdam was then attacked and capitulated. In the meantime the negotiations for the quadruple alliance were proceeding favorably, but the secrecy with which they were attempted to be conducted was penetrated by Fraser, Chargé des Affaires of England at St. Petersburg, who instantly notified his court, and gave the alarm to Prussia. The King saw at once what would be his situation between the jaws of France, Austria and Russia. In great dismay he besought the court of London not to abandon him, sent Alvensleben to Paris to explain and soothe, and England, through the Duke of Dorset and Eden, renewed her conferences for accommodation. The Archbishop, who shuddered at the idea of war, and preferred a peaceful surrender of right to an armed vindication of it, received them with open arms, entered into cordial conferences and a declaration and counter-declaration were cooked up at Versailles and sent to London for approbation. They were approved there, reached Paris at one o'clock of the 27th, and were signed that night at Versailles. It was said and believed at Paris that M. de Montmorin literally "pleurait comme un enfant" when obliged to sign this counter-declaration, so distressed was he by the dishonor of sacrificing the Patriots after assurances so solemn of protection and absolute encouragement to proceed. The Prince of Orange was reinstated in all his powers, now become regal. A great emigration of the Patriots took place; all were deprived of office, many exiled, and their property confiscated. They were received in France and subsisted for some time on her bounty. Thus fell Holland, by the treachery of her Chief, from her honorable independence to become a province of England; and so, also, her Stadtholder from the high station of the first citizen of a free Republic, to be the servile Viceroy of a foreign sovereign. And this was effected by a mere scene of bullying and demonstration; not one of the parties, France, England or Prussia having ever really meant to encounter actual war for the interest of the Prince of Orange. But it had all the effect of a real and decisive war.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 73. FORD ED., i, 101. (1821.)

3756. HOLY ALLIANCE, Despotism.—

What are we to think of this northern triumvirate, arming their nations to dictate despotisms to the rest of the world?—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 217. (M., 1821.)

3757. ———. With respect to the European combinations against the rights of man, I join an honest Irishman of my neighborhood in his Fourth of July toast: "The Holy Alliance,—to Hell the whole of them."—To THOMAS LEIPER. FORD ED., x, 298. (M., 1824.)

3758. HOLY ALLIANCE, Napoleon and.—Had Bonaparte reflected that such is the moral construction of the world that no national crime passes unpunished in the long run, he would not now be in the cage of St. Helena; and were your present oppressors to reflect on the same truth, they would spare to their own countries the penalties on their present wrongs which will be inflicted on them in future times. The seeds of hatred and revenge which they are now sowing with a large hand will not fail to produce their fruits in time. Like their brother robbers on the highway, they suppose the escape of the moment a final escape, and deem infamy and future risk countervailed by present gain.—To M. DE MARBOIS. vii, 76. (M., 1817.)

3759. HOLY ALLIANCE, Policy of.—During the ascendancy of Bonaparte, the word among the herd of kings, was sauve qui peut. Each shifted for himself, and left his brethren to squander and do the same as they could. After the battle of Waterloo and the military possession of France, they rallied and combined in common cause, to maintain each other against any similar and future danger. And in this alliance, Louis, now avowedly, and George, secretly but solidly, were of the contracting parties; and there can be no doubt that the allies are bound by treaty to aid England with their armies, should insurrection take place among her people. The coquetry she is now playing off between her people and her allies is perfectly understood by the latter, and accordingly gives no apprehensions to France, to whom it is all explained. The diplomatic correspondence she is now displaying, these double papers fabricated merely for exhibition, in which she makes herself talk of morals and principle, as if her qualms of conscience would not permit her to go all lengths with her Holy Allies, are all to gull her own people. It is a theatrical farce, in which the five powers are the actors, England the Tartuffe, and her people the dupes.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 289. FORD ED., x, 258. (M., June 1823.) See ALLIANCES and MONROE DOCTRINE.

3760. HOME, Better than honors.—In truth, I wish for neither honors nor offices. I am happier at home than I can be elsewhere.—To JOHN LANGDON. iv, 164. FORD ED., vii, 112. (M., 1797.)

3761. HOME, Companions.—Monroe is buying land almost adjoining me. Short will do the same. What would I not give [if] you could fall into the circle. With such a society, I could once more venture home, and lay myself up for the residue of life, quitting all its contentions which grow daily more and more insupportable. Think of it. To render it practicable only requires you to think it so. Life is of no value but as it brings us gratifications. Among the most valuable of these is rational society. It informs the mind, sweetens the temper, cheers our spirits, and promotes health. There is a little farm of 140 acres adjoining mine, and within two miles, all of good land, though old, with a small indifferent house on it, the whole not worth more than £250. Such a one might be a farm of experiment, and support a little table and household. It is on the road to Orange, and so much nearer than I am. * * * Once more think of it.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 406. (A., 1784.)

3762. ——. I once hinted to you the project of seating yourself in the neighborhood of Monticello, and my sanguine wishes made me look on your answer as not absolutely excluding the hope. Monroe is decided in settling there, and is actually engaged in the endeavor to purchase. Short is the same. Would you but make it a "partie quarée" I should believe that life had still some happiness in store for me. Agreeable society is the first essential in constituting the happiness, and, of course, the value of our existence. And it is a circumstance worthy great attention when we are making first our choice of a residence. Weigh well the value of this against the difference in pecuniary interest, and ask yourself which will add most to the sum of your felicity through life. I think that, weighing them in this balance, your decision will be favorable to all our prayers. Looking back with fondness to the moment when I am again to be fixed in my own country, I view the prospect of this society as inestimable.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 17. (P., Dec. 1784.)

3763. HOME, in France.—The domestic bonds here [France] are absolutely done away, and where can their compensation be found? Perhaps they may catch some moments of transport above the level of the ordinary tranquil joy we experience, but they are separated by long intervals, during which all the passions are at sea without rudder or compass. Yet, fallacious as the pursuits of happiness are, they seem on the whole to furnish the most effectual abstraction from a contemplation of the hardness of their government.—To MRS. TRIST. i, 394. (P., 1785.)

3764. HOME, Happy.—I employ my leisure moments in repassing often in my mind our happy domestic society when together at Monticello, and looking forward to the renewal of it. No other society gives me now any satisfaction, as no other is founded in sincere affection.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. FORD ED., vii, 405. (1800.)

3765. ——. I look forward with hope to the moment when we are all to be reunited again.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vii, 416. (Pa., 1800.)

3766. ——. My habits are formed to those of my own country. I am past the time of changing them, and am, therefore, less happy anywhere else than there.—To DR. CURRIE. ii, 220. (P., 1787.)

3767. HOME, No happiness elsewhere.—Abstracted from home, I know no happiness in this world.—To LIEUT. DE UNGER. i, 279. FORD ED., ii, 374. (R., 1780.)

3768. HOME, Independence.—I am savage enough to prefer the woods, the wilds, and the independence of Monticello, to all the brilliant pleasures of this gay capital [Paris].—To BARON GEISMER. i, 427. (P., 1785.)

3769. HOME, Longing for.—I am never a day without wishing to be with you, and more and more as the fine sunshine comes on, which was made for all the world but me.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. iii, 348. FORD ED., v, 504. (Pa., 1792.)

3770. ——. When I indulge myself in these [agricultural] speculations, I feel with redoubled ardor my desire to return home to the pursuit of them, and to the bosom of my family, in whose love alone I live or wish to live, and in that of my neighbors. To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 417. (Pa., Jan. 1792.)

3771. HOME, Pleasures of.—Having no particular subject for a letter, I find none more soothing to my mind than to indulge itself in expressions of the love I bear you, and the delight with which I recall the various scenes through which we have passed together in our wanderings over the world. These reveries alleviate the toils and inquietudes of my present situation [Secretary of State] and leave me always impressed with the desire of being at home once more, and of exchanging labor, envy, and malice for ease, domestic occupation, and domestic love and society; where I may once more be happy with you, with Mr. Randolph, and dear little Anne, with whom even Socrates might ride on a stick without being ridiculous. —To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 422. (P., 1792.)

3772. HONESTY, Common sense and.—Let common sense and common honesty have fair play and they will soon set things to rights.—To EZRA STILES. ii, 77. (P., 1786.)

3773. HONESTY, Consciousness of.—Of you, my neighbors, I may ask, in the face of the world, "whose ox have I taken, or whom have I defrauded? Whom have I oppressed, or of whose hand have I received a bribe to blind mine eyes therewith?" On your verdict I rest with conscious security.—To THE INHABITANTS OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY, VA. v, 439. FORD ED., ix, 251. (M., April 1809.)

3774. HONESTY, Examples of.—It can give no great claims to any one to manage honestly and disinterestedly the concerns of others trusted to him. Abundant examples of this are always under our eye.—To MR. WEAVER. v, 88. (W., 1807.)

3775. HONESTY, Government and.—The whole art of government consists in the art of being honest.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

3776. HONESTY, Individual.—I know but one code of morality for men, whether acting singly or collectively. He who says I will be a rogue when I act in company with a hundred others, but an honest man when I act alone, will be believed in the former assertion, but not in the latter. I would say with the poet, "hic niger est, hunc tu Romane cavato". If the morality of one man produces a just line of conduct in him, acting individually, why should not the morality of one hundred men produce a just line of conduct in them, acting together?—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 99. FORD ED., v, III. (P., 1789.)

3777. HONESTY, Interest and.—Honesty and interest are as intimately connected in the public as in the private code of morality.—To MR. MAURY. vi, 468. (M., 1815.)

3778. HONESTY, Opportunity and.—Men are disposed to live honestly, if the means of doing so are open to them.—To M. DE MARBOIS. vii, 77. (M., 1817.)

3779. HONESTY, Riches and.—I have observed men's honesty to increase with their riches.—To JEREMIAH MOOR. FORD ED., vii, 454. (M., 1800.)

3780. HONESTY, Roguery and.—Every country is divided between the parties of honest men and rogues.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. iv, 126. (1795.)

3781. HONESTY, Statesmen and.—The man who is dishonest as a statesman, would be a dishonest man in any station.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x, 68. (P.F., 1816.)

3782. HONESTY, Wisdom and.—A wise man, even if nature has not formed him honest, will yet act as if he were honest; because he will find it the most advantageous and wise part in the long run.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 40. (P., 1785.)

3783. — — — An honest heart being the first blessing, a knowing head is the second.—To PETER CARR. i, 397. (P., 1785.)

3784. — — — Honesty is the first chapter in the book of wisdom.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 112. FORD ED., x, 122. (M., 1819.)

3785. HONOR, False.—Peace and happiness are preferable to that false honor which, by eternal wars, keeps the [European] people in eternal labor, want and wretchedness.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 452. FORD ED., ix, 511. (M., 1815.)

3786. HONOR, Infraction.—As an American, I cannot help feeling a thorough mortification, that our Congress should have permitted an infraction of our public honor; as a citizen of Virginia, I cannot help hoping and confiding, that our Supreme Executive, whose acts will be considered as the acts of the Commonwealth, estimate that honor too highly to make its infraction their own act.*—To GOVERNOR PATRICK HENRY. i, 214. FORD ED., ii, 169. (Alb., 1779.)

3787. HONOR, Integrity and.—When your mind shall be well improved with science, nothing will be necessary to place you in the highest points of view, but to pursue the interests of your country, the interests of your friends, and your own interests also, with the purest integrity, the most chaste honor. The defect of these virtues can never be made up by all the other acquirements of body and mind. Make these, then, your first object.†—To PETER CARR. i, 395. (P., 1785.)

3788. HONOR, Pledge of.—And for the support of this Declaration, we mutually pledge to each other * * * sacred honor.‡—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3789. HONOR, Wounded.—It seems much the general opinion here [Virginia] that our honor has been too much wounded not to 3790. HONORS, Hostile to happiness.—There are minds which can be pleased by honors and preferments; but I see nothing in them but envy and enmity. It is only necessary to possess them, to know how little they contribute to happiness, or rather how hostile they are to it.—To A. DONALD. ii, 356. (P., 1788.)

3791. HONORS, Political.—I have seen enough of political honors to know that they are but splendid torments.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J., 245. (Pa., 1797.) See HOME.

3792. HONORS, Public approbation.—It is our happiness that honorable distinctions flow only from public approbation; and that finds no object in titled dignitaries and pageants.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. viii, 163. (1809.)

3793. HONORS, Undeserved.—I have never ceased, nor can I cease to feel that I am holding honors without yielding requital, and justly belonging to others.—To DR. ROBERT M. PATTERSON. vi, 397. (M., 1814.)

3794. ———. I cannot be easy in holding, as a sinecure, an honor* so justly due to the talents and services of others.—To DR. ROBERT M. PATTERSON. vi, 396. (M., 1814.)

3795. HOPE vs. DESPAIR.—My theory has always been, that if we are to dream, the flatteries of hope are as cheap, and pleasanter than the gloom of despair.—To M. DE MARBOIS. vii, 77. (M., 1817.)

3796. ———. Hope is sweeter than despair.—To MRS. COSWAY. ii, 41. FORD ED., iv, 321. (P., 1786.)

3797. HOPKINSON (Francis), Genius of.—He is a man of genius, gentility, and great merit * * * and as capable of [filling] the office [of Director, or Master of the Mint], as any man I know. The appointment would give general pleasure, because he is generally esteemed.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iii, 496. (Pa., 1784.)

3798. HORSES, Arabian.—The culture of wheat by enlarging our [Virginia's] pasture, will render the Arabian horse an article of very considerable profit. Experience has shown that ours is the particular climate of America where he may be raised without degeneracy. Southwardly the heat of the sun occasions a deficiency of pasture, and northwardly the winters are too cold for the short and fine hair, the particular sensibility and constitution of that race. Animals transplanted into unfriendly climates, either change their nature and acquire new senses against the new difficulties in which they are placed, or they multiply poorly and become extinct. * * * Their patience of heat without injury, their superior wind, fit them better in this and the more southern climate even for the drudgeries of the plough and wagon. Northwardly they will become an object only to persons of taste and fortune, for the saddle and light carriages.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 408. FORD ED., iii, 272. (1782.)

* Presidency of Philosophical Society.—EDITOR.

3799. HORSES, Effect on man.—The Europeans value themselves on having subdued the horse to the uses of man; but I doubt whether we have not lost more than we have gained by the use of this animal. No one has occasioned so much the degeneracy of the human body. An Indian goes on foot nearly as far in a day, for a long journey, as an enfeebled white does on his horse; and he will tire the best horses.—To PETER CARR. i, 398. (P., 1785.)

3800. HORSES, Tax on.—The proposed tax on horses, besides its partiality, is infinitely objectionable as foisting in a direct tax under the name of an indirect one.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi, 149. (1792.)

3801. HORTICULTURE, American.—Gardens [are] peculiarly worth the attention of an American [when travelling], because it is the country of all others where the noblest gardens may be made without expense. We have only to cut out the superabundant plants.—TRAVELLING HINTS. ix, 404. (1788.)

3802. HORTICULTURE, English.—The pleasure gardening in England is the article in which it surpasses all the earth.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 549. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

3803. HORTICULTURE, Love of.—I have often thought that if Heaven had given me choice of my position and calling, it should have been on a rich spot of earth, well watered, and near a good market for the productions of the garden. No occupation is so delightful to me as the culture of the earth, and no culture comparable to that of the garden. * * * Under a total want of demand except for our family table, I am still devoted to the garden. But though an old man, I am but a young gardener.—To C. W. PEALE. vi, 6. (P.F., 1811.)

3804. HOSPITALITY, Natural laws of.—Among the first of the laws of nature is that which bids us to succor those in distress. For an obedience to this law, Don Blas Gonzalez* appears to have suffered; and we are satisfied, it is because his case has not been able to penetrate to his Majesty's ministers, at least in its true colors. We would not choose to be committed by a formal solicitation, but we would wish you to avail yourself of any good opportunity of introducing the truth to the ear of the minister, and of satisfying him, that a redress of this hardship on the governor would be received here with pleasure, as a proof of respect to those laws of hospitality which we would certainly observe in a like case, as a mark of attention towards us, and of justice to an individual for whose sufferings we cannot but feel.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 139. FORD ED., iii, 155. (N.Y., 1790.)

3805. HOSPITALITY, Practice of.—You know our practice of placing our guests at their ease, by showing them we are so ourselves, and that we follow our necessary vocations, instead of fatiguing them by hanging unremittently on their shoulders.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 5. FORD ED., x, 33. (M., 1816.)

3806. HOSPITALITY, Social.—Call on me * * * whenever you come to town, and if it should be about the hour of three, I shall rejoice the more. You will find a bad dinner, a good glass of wine, and a host thankful for your favor, and desirous of encouraging repe-

3807. HOUDON (Jean Antoine), Ability.—He is among the foremost, or, perhaps, the foremost artist in the world.—To F. HOPKINSON. i, 504. (P., 1786.)

3808. HOUDON (Jean Antoine), Life insurance.—Monsieur Houdon has agreed to go to America to take the figure of General Washington. In case of his death, between his departure from Paris and his return to it, we may lose twenty thousand livres. I ask the favor of you to enquire what it will cost to insure that sum on his life, in London, and to give me as early an answer as possible, that I may order the insurance if I think the terms easy enough. He is, I believe, between thirty and thirty-five years of age, healthy enough, and will be absent about six months.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 361. (P., 1785.)

3809. HOUDON (Jean Antoine), Statue of Washington.—M. Houdon is returned [to Paris] with the necessary moulds and measures for General Washington's statue. I fear the expenses of his journey have been considerably increased by the unlucky accident of his tools, materials, clothes, &c., not arriving at Havre in time to go with him to America, so that he had to supply himself there.—To GOVERNOR HENRY. i, 513. FORD ED., iv, 134. (P., 1786.)

3810. HOWE (Lord William), Friendly to America.—Lord Howe seems to have been friendly to America, and exceedingly anxious to prevent a rupture.*—An O BIOGRAPHY. i, 110. (1821.)

3811. HOWE (Lord William), Invasion of Virginia.—What upon earth can Howe mean by the manœuvre he is now practicing? There seems to me no object in this country which can be either of utility or reputation to his cause. I hope it will prove of a piece with all the other follies they have committed. The forming a junction with the northern army up the Hudson River, or taking possession of Philadelphia might have been a feather in his cap, and given them a little reputation in Europe—the former as being the design with which they came, the latter as being a place of the first reputation abroad, and the residence of Congress. Here, he may destroy the little hamlet of Williamsburg, steal a few slaves, and lose half his army among the fens and marshes of our lower country, or by the heat of the climate.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 207. FORD ED., ii, 134. (Alb., 1777.)

3812. HULL (William), Bravery.—The detestable treason of Hull, has excited a deep anxiety in all breasts. * * * His treachery, like that of Arnold, cannot be a matter of blame on our government. His character, as an officer of skill and bravery, was established on the trials of the last war, and no previous act of his life had led to doubt his fidelity.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 80. FORD ED., ix, 368. (M., Oct. 1812.)

3813. HULL (William), Suspected treason.—Hull will of course be shot for cowardice and treachery.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Nov. 1812.)

† General Hull's character is now free from all 'n.—EDITOR.

3814. HUMBOLDT (Baron von), Esteemed.—The receipt of your Distributio Geographica Plantarum, with the duty of thanking you for a work which sheds so much new and valuable light on botanical science, excites the desire, also, of presenting myself to your recollection, and of expressing to you those sentiments of high admiration and esteem which, although long silent, have never slept.—To F. H. ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. vii, 74. FORD ED., x, 88. (M., 1817.)

3815. HUMBOLDT (Baron von), Tribute to.—We shall bear to you the honorable testimony that you have deserved well of the republic of letters. * * * You have wisely located yourself in the focus of the science of Europe. I am held by the cords of love to my family and country, or I should certainly join you.—To BARON VON HUMBOLDT. v, 435. (W., 1809.)

3816. HUMPHREYS (David), Attacks on.—Colonel Humphreys is attacked in the [American] papers for his French airs, for bad poetry, bad prose, vanity, &c. It is said his dress, in so gay a style, gives general disgust against him. * * * He seems fixed with General Washington.*—To WILLIAM SHORT. ii, 574. FORD ED., v, 71. (P., 1789.)

3817. HUMPHREYS (David), Minister.—The President has nominated you Minister Resident * * * at the Court of Lisbon, which was approved by the Senate. You will consequently receive herewith your commission.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 301. (Pa., 1791.)

3818. HUMPHREYS (David), Talents.—Colonel Humphreys is sensible, prudent, and honest, and may be firmly relied on, in any office which requires these talents.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. i, 557. (P., 1786.)

3819. — — — He is an excellent man, an able one, and in need of some provision.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 568. FORD ED., iv, 226. (P., 1786.)

3820. IDEAS, Erroneous.—It is always better to have no ideas than false ones; to believe nothing than to believe what is wrong.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 430. (P., 1788.)

— IDEAS, Property in.—See INVENTIONS and PATENTS.

3821. IDLENESS, Evils of.—Nothing can contribute more to your future happiness (moral rectitude always excepted), than the contracting a habit of industry and activity. Of all the cankers of human happiness none corrodes with so silent, yet so baneful an influence as indolence. Body and mind both unemployed, our being becomes a burden, and every object about us loathsome, even the dearest. Idleness begets ennui, ennui the hypochondriac, and that a diseased body.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 372. (1787.)

3822. IDLENESS, Needless.—In a world which furnishes so many employments which are so useful, so many which are amusing, it is our own fault if we ever know what chance is, or if we are driven to the miserable resources of gaming, which corrupts our dispositions, and teaches us a habit of hostility against all mankind.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 389. (1787.)

* Washington made him his private secretary.—EDITOR.

3823. IDLENESS, Time-destroyer.—Determine never to be idle. No person will have occasion to complain of the want of time who never loses any. It is wonderful how much may be done if we are always doing.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 387. (M., 1787.)

3824. IDLENESS, Wretchedness and.—A mind always employed is always happy. This is the true secret, the grand recipe for felicity. The idle are * * * the wretched.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 389. (Mar. 1787.)

3825. IGNORANCE, Barrier against.—We are destined to be a barrier against the return of ignorance and barbarism.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 27. (M., 1816.)

3826. IGNORANCE, Bigotry and.—Ignorance and bigotry, like other insanities, are incapable of self-government.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 67. FORD ED., x, 84. (M., 1817.)

3827. IGNORANCE, Honest.—If science produces no better fruits than tyranny, murder, rapine and destitution of national morality, I would rather wish our country to be ignorant, honest and estimable, as our neighboring savages are.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 37. FORD ED., ix, 334. (M., 1812.)

3828. IGNORANCE, Misgovernment and.—Preach a crusade against ignorance. Establish and improve the law for educating the common people. Let our countrymen know that the people alone can protect us against these evils, and that the tax which will be paid for this purpose, is not more than the thousandth part of what will be paid to kings, priests and nobles, who will rise up among us, if we leave the people in ignorance.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 8. FORD ED., iv, 269. (P., 1786.)

— ILLINOIA, Proposed State.—See WESTERN TERRITORY.

3829. ILLUMINATI, Order of.—I have lately by accident got a sight of a single volume (the 3d) of the Abbé Barruel's Antisocial Conspiracy, which gives me the first idea I have ever had of what is meant by the Illuminism against which "Illuminate Morse", as he is now called, and his ecclesiastical and monarchical associates have been making such a hue and cry. Barruel's own parts of the book are perfectly the ravings of a Bedlamite. But he quotes largely from Wishaupt whom he considers as the founder of what he calls the order. As you may not have had an opportunity of forming a judgment of this cry of "mad dog", which has been raised against his doctrines, I will give you the idea I have formed from only an hour's reading of Barruel's quotations from him, which, you may be sure, are not the most favorable. Wishaupt seems to be an enthusiastic philanthropist. He is among those (as you know, the excellent Price and Priestley also are) who believe in the infinite perfectability of man. He thinks he may in time be rendered so perfect that he will be able to govern himself in every circumstance, so as to injure none, to do all the good he can, to leave government no occasion to exercise their powers over him, and, of course, to render political government useless. This, you know, is Godwin's doctrine, and this is what Robinson, Barruel, and Morse had called a conspiracy against all government. Wishaupt believes that to promote this perfection of the human character was the object of Jesus Christ. That his intention was simply to reinstate natural religion, and by diffusing the light of his morality, to teach us to govern ourselves. His precepts are the love of God, and love of our neighbor. And by teaching innocence of conduct, he expected to place men in their natural state of liberty and equality. He says, no one ever laid a surer foundation for liberty than our grand master, Jesus of Nazareth. He believes the Free Masons were originally possessed of the true principles and objects of Christianity, and have still preserved some of them by tradition, but much disfigured. The means he proposes to effect this improvement of human nature are "to enlighten men, to correct their morals and inspire them with benevolence". As Wishaupt lived under the tyranny of a despot and priests, he knew that caution was necessary even in spreading information, and the principles of pure morality. He proposed, therefore, to lead the Free Masons to adopt this object, and to make the objects of their institution the diffusion of science and virtue. He proposed to initiate new members into his body by gradations proportioned to his fears of the thunderbolts of tyranny. This has given an air of mystery to his views, was the foundation of his banishment, the subversion of the Masonic Order, and is the color for the ravings against him of Robinson, Barruel, and Morse, whose real fears are that the craft would be endangered by the spreading of information, reason, and natural morality among men. This subject being new to me, I imagine that if it be so to you also, you may receive the same satisfaction in seeing, which I have had in forming the analysis of it; and I believe you will think with me that if Wishaupt had written here, where no secrecy is necessary in our endeavours to render men wise and virtuous, he would not have thought of any secret machinery for that purpose; as Godwin, if he had written in Germany, might probably also have thought secrecy and mysticism prudent.—To BISHOP JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 419. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

3830. IMBECILITY, Insensibility to.—Nothing betrays imbecility so much as the being insensible of it.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 4. FORD ED., ix, 328. (P.F., 1811.)

3831. IMMIGRANTS, Aged.—That it may be for the benefit of your children and their descendants to remove to a country where, for enterprise and talents, so many avenues are open to fortune and fame, I have little doubt. But I should be afraid to affirm that, at your time of life, and with habits formed on the state of society in France, a change for one so entirely different would be for your personal happiness.—To JEAN BAPTISTE SAY. vi, 436. (M., 1815.)

3832. IMMIGRANTS, Assisted.—With respect to the German redemptioners, I can do nothing unless authorized by law. It would be made a question in Congress, whether any of the enumerated objects to which the Constitution authorizes the money of the Union to be applied, would cover an expenditure for importing settlers to Orleans.—To THOMAS PAINE. iv, 582. FORD ED., viii, 360. (W., 1805.)

3833. IMMIGRANTS, Colonized.—As to other [than English] foreigners, it is thought better to discourage their settling together in large masses, wherein, as in our German settlements, they preserve for a long time their own languages, habits and principles of government, and that they should distribute themselves sparsely among the natives for quicker amalgamation. English emigrants are without this inconvenience. They differ from us little but in their principles of government, and most of those (merchants excepted) who come here, are sufficiently disposed to adopt ours.—To GEORGE FLOWER. vii, 84. (P.F., 1817.)

3834. IMMIGRANTS, Indentured.—Indentured servants formed a considerable supply. These were poor Europeans, who went to America to settle themselves. If they could pay their passage, it was well. If not, they must find means of paying it. They were at liberty, therefore, to make an agreement with any person they chose, to serve him such a length of time as they agreed on, upon condition that he would repay to the master of the vessel the expenses of their passage. If, being foreigners, unable to speak the language, they did not know how to make a bargain for themselves, the captain of the vessel contracted for them with such persons as he could. This contract was by deed indentured, which occasioned them to be called indentured servants. * * * with the master of the vessel, they could redeem themselves from his power by paying their passage, which they frequently effected by hiring themselves on their arrival. In some States I know that these people had a right of marrying themselves without their masters' leave, and I did suppose they had that right everywhere. I did not know that in any of the States they demanded so much as a week for every day's absence without leave. I suspect this must have been at a very early period while the governments were in the hands of the first emigrants, who, being mostly laborers, were narrow-minded and severe. I know that in Virginia the laws allowed their servitude to be protracted only two days for every one they were absent without leave. So mild was this kind of servitude, that it was very frequent for foreigners, who carried to America money enough, not only to pay their passage, but to buy themselves a farm, it was common I say for them to indent themselves to a master for three years, for a certain sum of money with a view to learn the husbandry of the country. I will here make a general observation. So desirous are the poor of Europe to get to America, where they may better their condition, that being unable to pay their passage, they will agree to serve two or three years on their arrival there, rather than not go.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 254. FORD ED., iv, 159. (P., 1786.)

3835. IMMIGRANTS, Irish and German.—By the close of 1785, there had probably passed over 50,000 emigrants. Most of these were Irish. The greatest number of the residue were Germans. Philadelphia received most of them, and next to that Baltimore and New York.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 284. FORD ED., iv, 140. (P., 1786.)

3836. — — — The best tenants are foreigners, who do not speak the language. Unable to communicate with the people of the country, they confine themselves to their farms and families, compare their present state to what it was in Europe, and find great reason to be contented. Of all foreigners, I should prefer Germans. They are the easiest got, the best for their landlords, and do best for themselves.—To COLONEL R. CLAIBORNE. ii, 235. (P., 1787.)

3837. IMMIGRANTS, Protection of.—It has been the wise policy of these States to extend the protection of their laws to all those who should settle among them of whatsoever nation or religion, they might be, and to admit them to a participation of the benefits of civil and religious freedom; and the benevolence of this practice, as well as its salutary effects renders it worthy of being continued in future times.—PROCLAMATION CONCERNING FOREIGNERS. FORD ED., ii, 445. (R., 1781.)

3838. IMMIGRATION, Free.—Our country is open to all men, to come and go peaceably, when they choose.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 87. FORD ED., vi, 459. (Pa., Nov. 1793.)

3839. — — — The session of the first Congress, convened since republicanism has recovered its ascendancy, * * * are opening the doors of hospitality to fugitives from the oppressions of other countries.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

3840. IMMIGRATION, Negro.—The papers from the free people of color in Grenada * * * I apprehend it will be best to take no notice of. They are parties in a domestic quarrel, which, I think, we should leave to be settled among themselves. Nor should I think it desirable, were it justifiable, to draw a body of sixty thousand free blacks and mulattoes into our country.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., v, 342. (Pa., 1791.)

3841. IMMIGRATION, Obstructions to.—He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither; and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3842. IMMIGRATION, Regulation of.—The American governments are censured for permitting this species of servitude [Indenture], which lays the foundation of the happiness of these people. But what should these governments do? Pay the passage of all who choose to go into their country? They are not able; nor, were they able, do they think the purchase worth the price? Should they exclude these people from their shores? Those who know their situation in Europe and America would not say that this is the alternative which humanity dictates. It is said that these people are deceived by those who carry them over. But this is done in Europe. How can the American governments prevent it? * * * The individuals are generally satisfied in America with their adventure, and very few of them wish not to have made it. I must add that the Congress have nothing to do, with this matter. It belongs to the legislatures of the several States.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 255. FORD ED., iv, 160. (P., 1786.)

3843. ———. I had often thought on the subject you propose as to the mode of procuring German emigrants to take the place of our blacks. To this, however, the State Legislatures are alone competent, the General Government possessing no powers but those enumerated in the Constitution, and that of obtaining emigrants at the general expense not being one of the enumerated powers. With respect to the State governments, I not only doubt, but despair, of their taking up this operation, till some strong pressure of circumstance shall force it on them.—To J. P. REIBELT. FORD ED., viii, 402. (W., Dec. 1805.)

3844. IMMIGRATION, Revolution and.—My means of being useful to you [in founding a colony of English farmers] are small, [but] they shall be freely exercised for your advantage, and that, not on the selfish principle of increasing our own population at the expense of other nations, * * * but to consecrate a sanctuary for those whom the misrule of Europe may compel to seek happiness in other climes. This refuge once known will produce reaction on the happiness even of those who remain there, by warning their task-masters that when the evils of Egyptian opposition become heavier than those of the abandonment of country, another Canaan is open where their subjects will be received as brothers, and secured against like oppressions by a participation in the right of self-government. If additional motives could be wanting with us to the maintenance of this right, they would be found in the animating consideration that a single good government becomes thus a blessing to the whole earth, its welcome to the oppressed restraining within certain limits the measure of their oppressions. But should even this be counteracted by violence on the right of expatriation, the other branch of our example then presents itself for imitation, to rise on their rulers and do as we have done. You have set to your own country a good example, by showing them a peaceable mode of reducing their rulers to the necessity of becoming more wise, more moderate, and more honest, and I sincerely pray that the example may work for the benefit of those who cannot follow it, as it will for your own.—To GEORGE FLOWER. vii, 84. (P.F., 1817.)

3845. IMMIGRATION, Too rapid.—The present desire of America is to produce rapid population by as great importations of foreigners as possible. But is this founded in good policy? The advantage proposed is the multiplication of numbers. Now let us suppose (for example only) that, in this State, [Virginia] we could double our numbers in one year by the importation of foreigners; and this is a greater accession than the most sanguine advocate for immigration has a right to expect. Then I say, beginning with a double stock, we shall attain any given degree of population only twenty-seven years and three months sooner than if we proceed on our single stock. If we propose four millions and a half as a competent population for this State, we should be fifty-four and a half years attaining it, could we at once double our numbers; and eighty-one and three-quarter years, if we rely on natural propagation, as may be seen by the following table:

| | Proceeding
on our present stock. | Proceeding on a double stock. |
|--------------------------|--|-------------------------------------|
| 1781..... | 567,614 | 1,135,228 |
| 1808 $\frac{1}{2}$ | 1,135,228 | 2,270,456 |
| 1835 $\frac{1}{2}$ | 2,270,456 | 4,540,912 |
| 1862 $\frac{1}{2}$ | 4,540,912 | |

In the first column are stated periods of twenty-seven and a quarter years; in the second are our numbers at each period, as they will be if we proceed on our actual stock; and in the third are what they would be, at the same periods, were we to set out from the double of our present stock. I have taken the term of four million and a half of inhabitants for example's sake only. Yet I am persuaded it is a greater number than the country spoken of, considering how much inarable land it contains, can clothe and feed without a material change in the quality of their diet. But are there no inconveniences to be thrown into the scale against the advantage expected from a multiplication of numbers by the importation of foreigners? It is for the happiness of those united in society to harmonize as much as possible in matters which they must of necessity transact together. Civil government being the sole object of forming societies, its administration must be conducted by common consent. Every species of government has its specific principles. Ours perhaps are more peculiar than those of any other in the universe. It is a composition of the freest principles of the English constitution, with others derived from natural right and natural reason. To these nothing can be more opposed than the maxims of absolute monarchies. Yet from such we are to expect the greatest number of emigrants. They will bring with them the principles of the governments they leave, imbibed in their early youth; or, if able to throw them off, it will be in exchange for an unbounded licentiousness, passing, as is usual, from one extreme to another. It would be a miracle were they to stop precisely at the point of temperate liberty. These principles, with their language, they will transmit to their children. In proportion to their numbers, they will share with us the legislation. They will infuse into it their spirit, warp and bias its directions, and render it a heterogeneous, incoherent, distracted mass. I may appeal to experience, during the present contest, for a verification of these conjectures. But, if they be not certain in event, are they not possible, are they not probable? Is it not safer to wait with patience twenty-seven years and three months longer, for the attainment of any degree of population desired or expected? May not our government be more homogeneous, more peaceable, more durable? Suppose twenty millions of republican Americans thrown all of a sudden into France, what would be the condition of that kingdom? If it would be more turbulent, less happy, less strong, we may believe that the addition of half a million of foreigners to our present numbers would produce a similar effect here. If they come of themselves they are entitled to all the rights of citizenship; but I doubt the expediency of inviting them by extraordinary encouragements. I mean not that these doubts should be extended to the importation of useful artificers. The policy of that measure depends on very different considerations. Spare no expense in obtaining them. They will after a while go to the plough and the hoe; but, in the meantime, they will teach us something we do not know. It is not so in agriculture. The indifferent state of that among us does not proceed from a want of knowledge merely; it is from our having such quantities of land to waste as we please. In Europe the object is to make the most of their land, labor being abundant; here it is to make the most of our labor, land being abundant.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 330. FORD ED., iii, 188. (1782.)

3846. IMMORTALITY, Belief in.—The term is not very distant, at which we are to deposit in the same cernent, our sorrows and suffering bodies, and to ascend in essence to an ecstatic meeting with the friends we have loved and lost, and whom we shall still love and never lose again.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 108. FORD ED., x, 114. (M., 1818.)

3847. IMPEACHMENT, Abuse of.—History shows that in England impeachment has been an engine more of passion than justice.*—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 212. FORD ED., vii, 203. (Pa., 1798.)

3848. IMPEACHMENT, Contempt for. Impeachment is scarcely a scarecrow.—To C. HAMMOND. vii, 216. (M., 1821.)

3849. — — — Impeachment is a bugbear which they [Judiciary] fear not at all.—To JAMES PLEASANTS. FORD ED., x, 199. (M., 1821.)

3850. — — — Experience has already shown that the impeachment the Constitution has provided is not even a scarecrow.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 134. FORD ED., x, 141. (P.F., 1819.)

3851. IMPEACHMENT, Courts of.—For misbehavior, the grand inquest of the Colony, the House of Representatives, should impeach them before the Governor and Council, when they should have time and opportunity to make their defence; and if convicted, should be removed from their offices, and subjected to such other punishment as shall be thought proper.—To GEORGE WYTHE. FORD ED., ii, 60. (1776.)

3852. — — — There shall be a Court of Impeachments, to consist of three members of the Council of State, one of each of the superior courts of Chancery, Common Law, and Admiralty, two members of the House of Delegates and one of the Senate, to be chosen by the body respectively of which they are. Before this Court any member of the three branches of government, that is to say, the governor, any member of the Council, of the two houses of legislature, or of the superior courts, may be impeached by the governor, the Council, or either of the said houses or courts, and by no other, for such misbehavior in office as would be sufficient to remove him therefrom; and the only sentence they shall have authority to pass shall be that of deprivation and future incapacity of office. Seven members shall be requisite to make a court, and two-thirds of those present must concur in the sentence. The offences cognizable by this court shall be cognizable by no other, and they shall be triers of the fact as well as judges of the law.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 449. FORD ED., iii, 329. (1783.)

* A sketch of some of the principles and practices of England with respect to impeachments is given in the Parliamentary Manual, ix, 82.—EDITOR.

3853. IMPEACHMENT, Faction and.—I see nothing in the mode of proceeding by impeachment but the most formidable weapon for the purposes of dominant faction that ever was contrived. It would be the most effectual one for getting rid of any man whom they consider as dangerous to their views.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 211. FORD ED., vii, 202. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

3854. IMPEACHMENT, A farce.—Impeachment is a farce which will not be tried again.—To W. B. GILES. v, 68. FORD ED., ix, 46. (M., 1807.)

3855. IMPEACHMENT, Inefficient.—Experience has proved that impeachment in our forms is completely inefficient.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 404. (M., 1825.)

3856. IMPEACHMENT, The judiciary and.—Having found from experience that impeachment is an impracticable thing, a mere scarecrow, they [the Judiciary] consider themselves secure for life.—To THOMAS RITCHIE. vii, 192. FORD ED., x, 170. (M., 1820.)

3857. — — — In the General Government in this instance, we have gone even beyond the English caution, by requiring a vote of two-thirds, in one of the Houses, for removing a Judge; a vote so impossible, where any defence is made, before men of ordinary prejudices and passions, that our Judges are effectually independent of the nation. But this ought not to be.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 81. FORD ED., i, 112. (1821.)

3858. — — — Our different States have differently modified their several judiciaries as to the tenure of office. Some appoint their judges for a given term of time; some continue them during good behavior, and that to be determined on by the concurring vote of two-thirds of each legislative house. In England they are removable by a majority only of each house. The last is a practicable remedy; the second is not. The combination of the friends and associates of the accused, the action of personal and party passions, and the sympathies of the human heart, will forever find means of influencing one-third of either the one or the other house, will thus secure their impunity, and establish them in fact for life. The first remedy is the better, that of appointing for a term of years only, with a capacity of reappointment if their conduct has been approved.—To M. CORAY. vii, 321. (M., 1823.)

3859. IMPEACHMENT, Juries and.—The Senate have before them a bill for regulating proceedings in impeachment. This will be made the occasion of offering a clause for the introduction of juries into these trials. (Compare the paragraph in the Constitution which says, that all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, with the eighth amendment, which says, that in all criminal prosecutions the trial shall be by jury.) There is no expectation of carrying this; because the division in the Senate is of two to one, but it will draw forth the principles of the parties, and concur in accumulating proofs on which side all the sound principles are to be found.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 208. FORD ED., vii, 192. (Pa., Jan. 1798.)

3860. ———. You mentioned that some of your Committee admitted that the introduction of juries into trials by impeachment under the VIIIth amendment depended on the question whether an impeachment for a misdemeanor be a criminal prosecution? I devoted yesterday evening to the extracting passages from the law authors, showing that in law-language, the term crime is in common use applied to misdeemeanors, and that impeachments, even when for misdeemeanors only are criminal prosecutions. Those proofs were so numerous that my patience could go no further than two authors, Blackstone and Woodeson. They show that you may meet that question without the danger of being contradicted. The Constitution closes the proofs by explaining its own meaning when speaking of impeachments, crimes, and misdeemeanors.—To HENRY TAZEWELL. FORD ED., vii, 194. (Pa., Jan. 1798.)

3861. ———. The object in supporting this engraftment into impeachments is to lessen the dangers of the court of impeachment under its present form, and to induce dispositions in all parties in favor of a better constituted court of impeachment, which I own I consider as an useful thing, if so composed as to be clear of the spirit of faction.—To HENRY TAZEWELL. FORD ED., vii, 195. (Pa., 1798.)

3862. IMPEACHMENT, Law Courts vs.—I know of no solid purpose of punishment which the courts of law are not equal to.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 212. FORD ED., vii, 203. (Pa., 1798.)

3863. IMPEACHMENT, Power of.—An opinion [has been] declared, that not only officers of the State governments, but every private citizen of the United States, are impeachable. Whether they think this the time to make the declaration, I know not; but if they bring it on, I think there will not be more than two votes north of the Potomac against the universality of the impeaching power.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 215. FORD ED., vii, 207. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

3864. IMPEACHMENT, The Senate and.—The articles of impeachment against Blount have been received by the Senate. Some great questions will immediately arise. 1. Can they prescribe their own oath, the forms of pleadings, issue process against person or goods by their own orders, without the formality of a law authorizing it? Has not the 8th amendment of the Constitution rendered a trial by jury necessary? Is a Senator impeachable?—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 198. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

— IMPOST.—See EXCISE.

3865. IMPRESSMENT, Certificates and.—From the debates on the subject of our seamen. I am afraid as much harm as good will be done by our endeavors to arm our seamen against impressments. It is proposed to register them and give them certificates of citizenship to protect them. But these certificates will be lost in a thousand ways; a sailor will neglect to take his certificate; he is wet twenty times in a voyage; if he goes ashore without it, he is impressed; if with it, he gets drunk; it is lost, stolen from him, taken from him, and then the want of it gives authority to impress, which does not exist now.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. iv, 133. FORD ED., vii, 65. (M., March 1796.)

3866. IMPRESSMENT, Embargo and.—The stand which has been made on behalf of our seamen enslaved and incarcerated in foreign ships, and against the prostration of our rights on the ocean under laws of nature acknowledged by all civilized nations, was an effort due to the protection of our commerce, and to that portion of our fellow citizens engaged in the pursuits of navigation. The opposition of the same portion to the vindication of their peculiar rights, has been as wonderful as the loyalty of their agricultural brethren in the assertion of A. MASSACHUSETTS CITIZENS. viii, 160. (1809.)

3867. ———. Enough of the non-importation law should be reserved to pinch the English into a relinquishment of impressments.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 442. FORD ED., ix, 251. (M., April 1809.)

3868. IMPRESSMENT, George III. and.—He has constrained our fellow citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

3869. IMPRESSMENT, Pretexts for.—You are desired to persevere till you obtain a regulation to guard our vessels from having their hands impressed, and to inhibit the British navy-officers from taking them under the pretext of their being British subjects.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 552. FORD ED., vi, 243. (Pa., May 1793.)

protecting our seamen from impressment] which was the subject of conversation between Mr. [Gouverneur] Morris and the British minister, which was, that our seamen should always carry about them certificates of their citizenship. This is a condition never yet submitted to by any nation, one with which seamen would never have the precaution to comply. The casualties of their calling would expose them to the constant destruction or loss of this paper evidence, and thus, the British government would be armed with legal authority to impress the whole of our seamen. The simplest rule will be, that the vessel being American, shall be evidence that the seamen on board her are such. If they apprehend that our vessels might thus become asylums for the fugitives of their own nation from impress-gangs, the number of men to be protected by a vessel may be limited by her tonnage, and one or two officers only be permitted to enter the vessel in order to examine the numbers on board; but no press-gang should be allowed ever to go on board an American vessel, till after it shall be found that there are more than their stipulated number on board, nor till after the master shall have refused to deliver the supernumeraries (to be named by himself) to the press-officer who has come on board for that purpose; and even then, the American consul should be called in.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 443. FORD ED., vi, 76. (Pa., June 1792.)

3871. IMPRESSMENT, Remonstrances against.—On the impressment of our seamen, our remonstrances have never been intermitted. A hope existed at one moment of an arrangement which might have been submitted to, but it soon passed away, and the practice, though relaxed at times in the distant seas, has been constantly pursued in those in our neighborhood.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 58. FORD ED., viii, 417. (Jan. 1806.)

3872. IMPRESSMENT, Renunciation of.—Nothing will be deemed security but a renunciation of the practice of taking persons out of our vessels, under the pretence of their being English.—To JOHN ARMSTRONG. v, 134. FORD ED., ix, 116. (W., 1807.)

3873. IMPRESSMENT, Resistance to.—Our particular and separate grievance is only the impressment of our citizens. We must sacrifice the last dollar and drop of blood to rid us of that badge of slavery.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 418. FORD ED., ix, 502. (M., Feb. 1815.)

3874. IMPRESSMENT, Treaty of Peace and.—No provision being made [in the treaty of peace] against the impressment of our seamen, it is in fact but an armistice, to be terminated by the first act of impressment committed on an American citizen.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 420. FORD ED., ix, 504. (M., 1815.)

ment in an article of the treaty, she will concur in a convention for relinquishing it. Without this, she must understand that the present is but a truce, determinable on the first act of impressment of an American citizen, committed by an officer of hers.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 453. FORD ED., ix, 512. (M., March 1815.)

3876. IMPRESSMENT, War against.—Continued impressments of our seamen by her naval commanders, whose interest it was to mistake them for theirs, her innovations on the law of nations to cover real piracies, could illy be borne; and perhaps would not have been borne, had not contraventions of the same law by France, fewer in number but equally illegal, rendered it difficult to single the object of war. England, at length, singled herself, and took up the gauntlet, when the unlawful decrees of France being revoked as to us, she, by the proclamation of her Prince Regent, protested to the world that she would never revoke hers until those of France should be removed as to all nations. Her minister, too, about the same time, in an official conversation with our Chargé, rejected our substitute for her practice of impressment; proposed no other; and declared explicitly that no admissible one for this abuse could be proposed. Negotiation being thus cut short, no alternative remained but war, or the abandonment of the persons and property of our citizens on the ocean. The last one, I presume, no American would have preferred. War was therefore declared, and justly declared; but accompanied with immediate offers of peace on simply doing us justice.—To DR. GEORGE LOGAN. vi, 215. FORD ED., ix, 422. (M., Oct. 1813.)

3877. — — — On that point [impressment] we have thrown away the scabbard, and the moment an European war brings England back to this practice, adds us again to her enemies.—To MR. MAURY. vi, 467. (M., 1815.)

3878. INCORPORATION, Enumerated powers and.—[It has been] proposed to Congress to incorporate an Agricultural Society. I am against that, because I think Congress cannot find in all the enumerated powers any one which authorizes the act, much less the giving the public money to that use. I believe, too, if they had the power, it would soon be used for no other purpose than to buy with sinecures useful partisans.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. FORD ED., vii, 493. (W., Feb. 1801.)

3879. INCORPORATION, Executive and.—The Administrator shall not possess the prerogative * * * of erecting corporations.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

tions at table the following fact: When the Bank bill was under discussion in the House of Representatives, Judge Wilson came in, and was standing by Baldwin. Baldwin reminded him of the following fact which passed in the grand Convention. Among the enumerated powers given to Congress was one to erect corporations. It was on debate struck out. Several particular powers were then proposed. Among others, Robert Morris proposed to give Congress a power to establish a National Bank. Gouverneur Morris opposed it, observing that it was extremely doubtful whether the Constitution they were framing could ever be passed at all by the people of America; that to give it its best chance, however, they should make it as palatable as possible, and put nothing into it not very essential which might raise up enemies; that his colleague, Robert Morris, well knew that "a bank" was in their State (Pennsylvania) the very watchword of party; that a bank had been the great bone of contention between the two parties of the State from the establishment of their constitution, having been erected, put down and erected again as either party preponderated; that, therefore, to insert this power would instantly enlist against the whole instrument the whole of the anti-bank party in Pennsylvania; whereupon, it was rejected, as was every other special power except that of giving copyrights to authors and patents to inventors, the general power of incorporation being whittled down to this shred. Wilson agreed to the fact.—THE ANAS. ix, 191. FORD ED., i, 278. (1798.)

3881. ———. A proposition was made to the Convention which formed the [Federal] Constitution to open canals, and an amendatory one to empower them to incorporate. But the whole was rejected, and one of the reasons for rejection urged in debate was, that then they would have power to erect a bank, which would render the great cities, where there were prejudices and jealousies on the subject, adverse to the reception of the Constitution.—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii, 558. FORD ED., v, 287. (1791.)

3882. INCORPORATION, General welfare clause and.—We are here [Philadelphia] engaged in improving our Constitution by construction, so as to make it what the [federal] majority think it should have been. The Senate received yesterday a bill from the Representatives incorporating a company for Roosevelt's copper mines in Jersey. This is under the sweeping clause of the Constitution, and supported by the following pedigree of necessities: Congress are authorized to defend the country; ships are necessary for that defence; copper is necessary for ships; mines are necessary to produce copper; companies are necessary to work mines; and "this is the house that Jack built".—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. FORD ED., vii, 445. (Pa., April 1800.)

for incorporating a company to work Roosevelt's copper mines in New Jersey. I do not know whether it is understood that the Legislature of Jersey was incompetent to this, or merely that we have concurrent legislation under the sweeping clause. Congress are authorized to defend the nation. Ships are necessary for defence; copper is necessary for ships; mines necessary for copper; a company necessary to work mines; and who can doubt this reasoning who has ever played at "This is the House that Jack built". Under such a process of filiation of necessities the sweeping clause makes clear work.—To E. LIVINGSTON. iv, 329. FORD ED., vii, 444. (Pa., April 1800.)

3884. INCORPORATION, Republican party and.—It has always been denied by the republican party in this country, that the Constitution had given the power of incorporation to Congress. On the establishment of the Bank of the United States, this was the great ground on which that establishment was combatted; and the party prevailing supported it only on the argument of its being an incident to the power given them for raising money. On this ground it has been acquiesced in, and will probably be acquiesced in, as subsequently confirmed by public opinion. But in no other instance have they ever exercised this power of incorporation out of this District, of which they are the ordinary Legislature.—To DR. MAESE. v, 412. (W., Jan. 1809.) See BANK (U. S.), CONSTITUTIONALITY OF, GENERAL WELFARE and MONOPOLY.

3885. INDEMNIFICATION, Adequate.—To demand satisfaction beyond what is adequate is a wrong.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 628. FORD ED., vi, 258. (1793.)

3886. INDEMNIFICATION, Effectual.—One thousand ships taken, six thousand seamen impressed, savage butcheries of our citizens, and incendiary machinations against our Union, declare that they and their allies, the Spaniards, must retire from the Atlantic side of our continent as the only security or indemnification which will be effectual.—To THOMAS LETRE. vi, 79. (M., Aug. 1812.)

3887. INDEMNIFICATION, Frigate Chesapeake and.—We now send a vessel to call upon the British government for reparation for the past outrage [attack on the Chesapeake] and security for the future.—To JOHN ARMSTRONG. v, 134. FORD ED., ix, 116. (W., 1807.)

3888. ———. Reparation for the past and security for the future is our motto.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 127. FORD ED., ix, 111. (W., July 1807.)

3889. ———. An armed vessel of the United States was dispatched with instructions to our ministers at London to call on that government for the satisfaction and security required by the outrage. [Attack on the Chesapeake].—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 84. FORD ED., ix, 153. (1807.)

3890. INDEMNIFICATION, National retribution.—That retribution which the laws of every country mean to extend to those who suffer unjustly.—To COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 486. (P., 1785.)

3891. INDEMNIFICATION, National usage.—The usage of nations requires that we shall give the offender an opportunity of making reparation and avoiding war.—To VICE-PRESIDENT CLINTON. v, 116. FORD ED., ix, 100. (W., 1807.)

3892. INDEMNIFICATION, Principle of.—I take the true principle to be, that "for violations of jurisdiction, with the consent of the sovereign, or his voluntary sufferance, indemnification is due; but that for others he is bound only to use all reasonable means to obtain indemnification from the aggressor, which must be calculated on his circumstances, and these endeavors bonâ fide made; and failing, he is no further responsible". It would be extraordinary, indeed, if we were to be answerable for the conduct of belligerents through our whole coasts, whether inhabited or not.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 69. FORD ED., ix, 47. (M., April 1807.)

3893. INDEMNIFICATION, Security and.—The sword once drawn, full justice must be done. "Indemnification for the past and security for the future" should be painted on our banners.—To MR. WRIGHT. vi, 78. (M., Aug. 1812.)

3894. INDEMNIFICATION, For slaves.—The President * * * authorized Mr. Gouverneur Morris to enter into conference with the British ministers in order to discover their sentiments on the * * * indemnification for the negroes carried off against the stipulations of the treaty of peace. The letters of Mr. Morris * * * [to the President] state the communications, oral and written, which have passed between him and the ministers; and from these the Secretary of State draws the following inference: That as to indemnification for the negroes, their measures for concealing them were in the first instance so efficacious, as to reduce our demand for them, so far as we can support it by direct proof, to be very small indeed. Its smallness seems to have kept it out of discussion. Were other difficulties removed, they would probably make none of this article. * * * The Secretary of State is of opinion * * * that the demands * * * of indemnification should not be again made till we are in readiness to do ourselves the justice which may be refused.—REPORT ON BRITISH NEGOTIATIONS. vii, 517. FORD ED., v, 261. (1790.)

favor.*—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 363. FORD ED., iii, 225. (1782.) See COLONIES, DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, PARLIAMENT and REVOLUTION (AMERICAN).

3896. INDIANS, Agriculture and.—The decrease of game rendering their subsistence by hunting insufficient, we wish to draw them to agriculture, to spinning and weaving. The latter branches they take up with great readiness, because they fall to the women, who gain by quitting the labors of the field for those which are exercised within doors.—To GOVERNOR HARRISON. iv, 472. (W., 1803.)

3897. ———. I consider the business of hunting as already become insufficient to furnish clothing and subsistence to the Indians. The promotion of agriculture, therefore, and household manufacture, are essential in their preservation, and I am disposed to aid and encourage it liberally.—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. iv, 467. FORD ED., viii, 213. (1803.)

3898. INDIANS AS ALLIES.—They are a useless, expensive, ungovernable ally.—To JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., ii, 88. (Pa., 1776.)

3899. INDIANS, Amalgamation.—The ultimate point of rest and happiness for them is to let our settlements and theirs meet and blend together, to intermix, and become one people. Incorporating themselves with us as citizens of the United States, this is what the natural progress of things will of course bring on, and it will be better to promote than to retard it.—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. iv, 467. FORD ED., viii, 214. (1803.)

3900. ———. Our settlements will gradually circumscribe and approach the Indians, and they will in time either incorporate with us as citizens of the United States, or remove beyond the Mississippi. The former is certainly the determination of their history most happy for themselves; but, in the whole course of this it is essential to cultivate their love.—To GOVERNOR HARRISON. iv, 472. (W., 1803.)

3901. ———. I shall rejoice to see the day when the red men, our neighbors, become truly one people with us, enjoying all the rights and privileges we do, and living in peace and plenty as we do, without any one to make them afraid, to injure their persons, or to take their property without being punished for it according to fixed laws.—To THE CHEROKEE CHIEFS. viii, 214. (1808.)

3902. INDIANS, American Nations and.—[It is] an established principle of public law among the white nations of America, that while the Indians included within their limits retain all other natural rights, no other white nations can become their patrons, protectors or mediators, nor in any shape intermeddle between them and those within whose limits they are.—ANAS. ix, 433. FORD ED., i, 210. (1792.)

3903. ———. We consider it as established by the usage of different nations into a

* In the FORD EDITION (iii, 226) attention is called to a letter written by Jefferson from Philadelphia, May, 16, 1776, to Thomas Nelson, in which he said: "I wish much to see you here, yet hope you will contrive to bring on as early as you can in convention the great questions of the session. I suppose they will tell us what to say on the subject of Independence, but hope respect will be expressed to the right opinion in other Colonies who may happen to differ from them. When at home I took great pains to enquire into the sentiments of the people on that head, in the upper counties I think I may safely say nine out of ten are for it."—EDITOR.

kind of Jus gentium for America, that a white nation settling down and declaring that such and such are their limits, makes an invasion of those limits by any other white nation an act of war, but gives no right of soil against the native possessors.—THE ANAS. ix, 429. FORD ED., i, 197. (1792.)

3904. INDIANS, Brotherhood of.—Made by the same Great Spirit, and living in the same land with our brothers, the red men, we consider ourselves as of the same family; we wish to live with them as one people, and to cherish their interests as our own.—ADDRESS TO INDIANS. viii, 184. (1802.)

3905. INDIANS, Catherine of Russia and.—What Professor Adelung mentions of the Empress Catherine's having procured many vocabularies of our Indians, is correct. She applied to M. de Lafayette, who, through the aid of General Washington, obtained several; but I never learnt of what particular tribes.—TO MR. DUPONCEAU. vii, 96. (M., 1817.)

3906. INDIANS, Citizenship and.—We have already had an application from a settlement of Indians to become citizens of the United States. It is possible, perhaps probable, that this idea may be so novel as that it might shock the Indians, were it even hinted to them. Of course, you will keep it for your own reflection; but, convinced of its soundness, I feel it consistent with pure morality to lead them towards it, to familiarize them to the idea that it is for their interest to cede lands at times to the United States, and for us to procure gratifications to our citizens, from time to time, by new acquisitions of land.—TO BENJAMIN HAWKINS. iv, 468. FORD ED., viii, 215. (W., 1803.)

3909. ———. The plan of civilizing the Indians is undoubtedly a great improvement on the ancient and totally ineffectual one of beginning with religious missionaries. Our experience has shown that this must be the last step of the process. The following is what has been successful: 1st, to raise cattle, &c., and thereby acquire a knowledge of the value of property; 2d, arithmetic, to calculate that value; 3d, writing, to keep accounts, and here they begin to enclose farms, and the men to labor, the women to spin and weave; 4th, to read "Aesop's Fables" and "Robinson Crusoe" are their first delight. The Creeks and Cherokees are advanced thus far, and the Cherokees are now instituting a regular government.—TO JAMES JAY. v, 440. (M., April 1809.)

3910. ———. The civilization and improvement of the Indian tribes * * * I have ever had much at heart, and never omitted an occasion of promoting while I have been in situations to do it with effect; and nothing, even now, in the calm of age and retirement, would excite in me a more lively interest than an approvable plan of raising that respectable and unfortunate people from the state of physical and moral abjection, to which they have been reduced by circumstances foreign to them.—TO JEDEDIAH MORSE. vii, 233. FORD ED., x, 203. (M., 1822.) See CIVILIZATION.

3911. INDIANS, Coercing.—Nothing ought more to be avoided than the embarking ourselves in a system of military coercion on the Indians. If we do this, we shall have general and perpetual war.—TO MERIWETHER LEWIS. v, 350. (M., 1808.)

3912. INDIANS, Commiseration.—In the early part of my life, I was very familiar with the Indians, and acquired impressions of attachment and commiseration for them which have never been obliterated.—TO JOHN ADAMS. vi, 61. FORD ED., ix, 358. (M., 1812.)

3913. INDIANS, Controlling.—The Indians can be kept in order only by commerce or war. The former is the cheaper.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 227. (W., 1808.)

3914. INDIANS, Descent of.—Moreton's deduction of the origin of our Indians from the fugitive Trojans, * * * and his manner of accounting for the sprinkling of their Latin with Greek, is really amusing. Adair makes them talk Hebrew. Reinold Foster derives them from the soldiers sent by Kouli Khan to conquer Japan. Brerewood, from the Tartars, as well as our bears, wolves, foxes, &c., which, he says, "must of necessity fetch their beginning from Noah's ark, which rested, after the deluge in Asia, seeing they could not proceed by the course of nature, as the imperfect sort of living creatures do, from putrefaction". Bernard Romans is of opinion that God created an original man and woman in this part of the globe. Doctor Barton thinks they are not specifically different from the Persians; but, taking afterwards a broader range, he thinks, "that in all the vast countries of America, there is but one language, nay, that it may be proven, or rendered highly probable, that all the languages of the earth bear some affinity together". This reduces it to a question of definition, in which every one is free to use his own: to wit, what constitutes identity, or difference in two things, in the common acceptation of sameness. All languages may be called the same, as being all made up of the same primitive sounds, expressed by the letters of the different alphabets. But, in this sense, all things on earth are the same as consisting of matter. This gives up the useful distribution into genera and species, which we form, arbitrarily indeed, for the relief of our imperfect memories. To aid the question, from whence our Indian tribes are descended, some have gone into their religion, their morals, their manners, customs, habits, and physical forms. By such helps it may be learnedly proved, that our trees and plants of every kind are descended from those of Europe; because, like them, they have no locomotion, they draw nourishment from the earth, they clothe themselves with leaves in spring, of which they divest themselves in autumn for the sleep of winter, &c. Our animals, too, must be descended from those of Europe, because our wolves eat lambs, our deer are gregarious, our ants hoard, &c. But, when for convenience we distribute languages, according to common understanding, into classes originally different, as we choose to consider them, as the Hebrew, the Greek, the Celtic, the Gothic; and these again into genera, or families, as the Icelandic, German, Swedish, Danish, English; and these last into species, or dialects, as English, Scotch, Irish, we then ascribe other meanings to the terms "same" and "different". In some of these senses, Barton, and Adair, and Foster, and Brerewood, and Morton, may be right, every one according to his own definition of what constitutes "identity". Romans, indeed, takes a higher stand, and supposes a separate creation. On the same unscriptural ground, he had but to mount one step higher, to suppose no creation at all, but that all things have existed without beginning in time, as they now exist, and may forever exist, producing and reproducing in a circle, without end. This would very summarily dispose of Mr. Moreton's learning, and show that the question of Indian origin, like many others, pushed to a certain height, must receive the same answer, "Ignoro".—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 121. (M., May 1813.) See ABORIGINES.

3915. INDIANS, Driven westward.—I am sorry to hear that the Indians have commenced war, but greatly pleased you have been so decisive on that head. Nothing will reduce those wretches so soon as pushing the war into the heart of their country. But I would not stop there. I would never cease pursuing them while one of them remained on this side the Mississippi.—To JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., ii, 73. (Pa., 1776.)

3916. ——. The Indians backward [in civilization] will yield, and be thrown further back. They will relapse into barbarism and misery, lose numbers by war and want, and we shall be obliged to drive them with the beasts of the forest into the stony mountains.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 62. FORD ED., ix, 358. (M., 1812.)

3917. INDIANS, Fire-hunting by.—You ask if the usage of hunting in circles has ever been known among any of our tribes of Indians? It has been practiced by them all; and is to this day, by those still remote from the settlements of the whites. But their numbers and enabling them like Genghis Khan's seven hundred thousand, to form themselves into circles of one hundred miles diameter, they make their circle by firing the leaves fallen on the ground, which gradually forcing the animals to a centre, they there slaughter them with arrows, darts and other missiles.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 122. (M., 1813.)

3918. INDIANS, Fortifications.—I believe entirely with you that the remains of fortifications, found in the western country, have been the works of the natives.—To HARRY INNES. iii, 217. FORD ED., v, 294. (Pa., 1791.)

3919. INDIANS, Friendship.—It is on their interests we must rely for their friendship, and not on their fears.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 349. (M., 1808.)

3920. INDIANS, Genius.—It is in North America we are to seek their [the Indians'] original character. And I am safe in affirming, that the proofs of genius given by the Indians of North America place them on a level with whites in the same uncultivated state. The North of Europe furnishes subjects enough for comparison with them, and for a proof of their equality, I have seen some thousands myself, conversed much with them, and have found a masculine, sound understanding. I believe the Indian to be in body and mind equal to the white man.—To GENERAL CHASTELLUX. i, 341. FORD ED., iii, 137. (P., 1785.)

3921. INDIANS, Government.—The practice [of dividing themselves into small societies] results from the circumstance of their having never submitted themselves to any laws. any coercive power, any shadow of government. Their only controls are their manners, and that moral sense of right and wrong, which, like the sense of tasting and feeling in every man, makes a part of his nature. An offence against these is punished by contempt, by exclusion from society, or, where the case is serious, as that of murder, by the individuals whom it concerns. Imperfect as this species of coercion may seem, crimes are very rare among them; in-somuch that were it made a question, whether no law, as among the savage Americans, or too much law, as among the civilized Europeans, submits man to the greatest evil, one who has seen both conditions of existence would pronounce it to be the last; and that the sheep are happier of themselves, than under the care of the wolves. It will be said that great societies cannot exist without government. The savages, therefore, break them into small ones.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 338. FORD ED., iii, 195. (1782.)

3922. INDIANS, Great Britain and.—You know the benevolent plan we were pursuing here for the happiness of the aboriginal inhabitants in our vicinities. We spared nothing to keep them at peace with one another. To teach them agriculture and the rudiments of the most necessary arts, and to encourage industry by establishing among them separate property. In this way they would have been enabled to subsist and multiply on a moderate scale of landed possession. They would have mixed their blood with ours, and been amalgamated and identified with us within no distant period of time. On the commencement of the present war [with Great Britain], we pressed on them the observance of peace and neutrality, but the interested and unprincipled policy of England has defeated all our labors for the salvation of these unfortunate people. They have seduced the greater part of the tribes within our neighborhood, to take up the hatchet against us, and the cruel massacres they have committed on the women and children of our frontiers taken by surprise will oblige us now to pursue them to extermination, or drive them to new seats beyond our reach. * * * The confirmed brutalization, if not the extermination of this race in our America, is therefore to form an additional chapter in the English history of the same colored man in Asia, and of the brethren of their own color in Ireland, and wherever else Anglo-mercantile cupidity can find a two-penny interest in deluging the earth with human blood.—To BARON DE HUMBOLDT. vi, 269. FORD ED., ix, 431. (Dec. 1813.)

3923. INDIANS, Justice to.—The two principles on which our conduct towards the Indians should be founded are justice and fear. After the injuries we have done them, they cannot love us, which leaves us no alternative but that of fear to keep them from attacking us. But justice is what we should never lose sight of and, in time, it may recover their esteem.—To MR. HAWKINS. ii, 3. (P., 1786.)

3924. ——. Nothing must be spared to convince the Indians of the justice and liberality we are determined to use towards them, and to attach them to us indissolubly.—To DR. SIBLEY. iv, 581. (W., 1805.)

3926. — — — When they withdraw themselves to the culture of a small piece of land, they will perceive how useless to them are their extensive forests, and will be willing to pare them off from time to time in exchange for necessities for their farms and families.—To GOVERNOR HARRISON. iv, 472. (W., 1803.)

3927. — — — To promote the disposition to exchange lands, which they have to spare and we want, for necessities, which we have to spare and they want, we shall push our trading uses, and be glad to see the good and influential individuals among them run in debt, because we observe that when these debts get beyond what the individuals can pay, they become willing to lop them off by a cession of lands. At our trading houses, too, we mean to sell so low as merely to repay us cost and charges, so as neither to lessen nor enlarge our capital.—To GOVERNOR HARRISON. iv, 472. (W., 1803.)

3928. — — — I am myself alive to the obtaining lands from the Indians by all honest and peaceable means, and I believe that the honest and peaceable means adopted by us will obtain them as fast as the expansion of our settlements with due regard to compactness, will require.—To ANDREW JACKSON. iv, 464. (W., 1803.)

— INDIANS, Languages of.—See AB-ORIGINES.

3929. INDIANS, Outacite.—Before the Revolution, the Indians were in the habit of coming often and in great numbers to the seat of government [in Virginia], where I was very much with them. I knew much the great Outacite, the warrior and orator of the Cherokees; he was always the guest of my father on his journeys to and from Williamsburg. I was in his camp when he made his great farewell oration to his people the evening before his departure for England. The moon was in full splendor, and to her he seemed to address himself in his prayers for his own safety on the voyage, and that of his people during his absence; his sounding voice, distinct articulation, animated action, and the solemn silence of his people at their several fires, filled me with awe and veneration, although I did not understand a word he uttered.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 61. FORD ED., ix, 358. (M., 1812.)

3930. INDIANS, Peace with.—Our system is to live in perpetual peace with the Indians, to cultivate an affectionate attachment from them, by everything just and liberal which we can do for them within the bounds of reason, and by giving them effectual protection against wrongs from our own people.—To GOVERNOR HARRISON. iv, 472. (W., 1803.)

— INDIANS, Policy respecting.—See SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS, in APPENDIX.

3931. INDIANS, Priesthood.—You ask if the Indians have any order of priesthood among them, like the Druids, Bards or Minstrels of the Celtic nations? Adair alone, determined to see what he wished to see in every object, metamorphoses their conjurers into an order of priests, and describes their sorceries as if they were the great religious ceremonies of the nation. Laftau called them by their proper names, Jongleurs, Devins, Sortileges; De Bry, prestigitores; Adair himself sometimes Magi, Archimagi, cunning men, Seers, rain-makers; and the modern Indian interpreters call them conjurers and witches. They are persons pretending to have communications with the devil and other evil spirits, to foretell future events, bring down rain, find stolen goods, raise the dead, destroy some and heal others by enchantment, lay spells, &c. And Adair, without departing from his parallel of the Jews and Indians, might have found their counterpart much more aptly among the sooth-sayers, sorcerers and wizards of the Jews, their Gannes and Gambres, their Simon Magus, Witch of Endor, and the young damsel whose sorceries disturbed Paul so much; instead of placing them in a line with their high-priest, their chief-priests, and their magnificent hierarchy generally. In the solemn ceremonies of the Indians, the persons who direct or officiate, are their chiefs, elders and warriors, in civil ceremonies or in those of war; it is the head of the cabin in their private or particular feasts or ceremonies; and sometimes the matrons, as in their corn feasts. And even here, Adair might have kept up his parallel, without ennobling his conjurers. For the ancient patriarchs, the Noahs, the Abrahams, Isaacs and Jacobs, and even after the consecration of Aaron, the Samuels and Elijahs, and we may say further, every one for himself offered sacrifices on the altars. The true line of distinction seems to be, that solemn ceremonies, whether public or private, addressed to the Great Spirit, are conducted by the worthies of the nation, men or matrons, while conjurers are resorted to only for the invocation of evil spirits. The present state of the Indian tribes, without any public order of priests, is proof sufficient that they never had such an order. Their steady habits permit no innovations, not even those which the progress of science offers to increase the comforts, enlarge the understanding, and improve the morality of mankind. Indeed, so little idea have they of a regular order of priests, that they mistake ours for their conjurers, and call them by that name.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 60. FORD ED., ix, 357. (M., 1812.)

3932. INDIANS, Protection of.—It is a leading object of our present government to guarantee the Indians in their present possessions, and to protect their persons with the same fidelity which is extended to its own citizens.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 260. (Pa., 1791.)

3933. INDIANS, The Revolution and.—At the commencement of the war [of the Revolution], the United States laid it down as a rule of their conduct, to engage the Indian tribes within their neighborhood to remain strictly neutral. They accordingly strongly pressed it on them, urging that it was a family quarrel with which they had nothing to do, and in which we wished them to take no part; and we strengthened these recommendations by doing them every act of friendship and good neighborhood, which circumstances left in our power. With some, these solicitations prevailed; but the greater part of them suffered themselves to be drawn into the war against us. They waged it in their usual cruel manner, murdering and scalping men, women and children, indiscriminately, burning their houses, and desolating the country. They put us to vast expense, as well by the constant force we were obliged to keep up in that quarter, as by the expeditions of considerable magnitude which we were under the necessity of sending into their country from time to time.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT. iv, 9. FORD ED., vi, 331. (Pa., 1793.)

3934. ———. Peace being at length concluded with England, we had it also to conclude with them. They had made war on us without the least provocation or pretence of injury. They had added greatly to the cost of that war. They had insulted our feelings by their savage cruelties. They were by our arms completely subdued and humbled. Under all these circumstances, we had a right to demand substantial satisfaction and indemnification. We used that right, however, with real moderation. Their limits with us under the former government were generally ill defined, questionable, and the frequent cause of war. Sincerely desirous of living in their peace, of cultivating it by every act of justice and friendship, and of rendering them better neighbors by introducing among them some of the most useful arts, it was necessary to begin by a precise definition of boundary. Accordingly, at the treaties held with them, our mutual boundaries were settled; and notwithstanding our just right to concessions adequate to the circumstances of the case, we required such only as were inconsiderable; and for even these, in order that we might place them in a state of perfect conciliation, we paid them a valuable consideration, and granted them annuities in money which have been regularly paid, and were equal to the prices for which they have usually sold their lands.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT. iv, 10. FORD ED., vi, 331. (Pa., 1793.)

3935. INDIANS, Rights of.—The want of attention to their rights is a principal source of dishonor to the American character.—To MR. HAWKINS. ii, 3. (P., 1786.)

3936. INDIANS, Schools for.—The teaching the Indian boys and girls to read and write, agriculture and mechanic trades to the former, spinning and weaving to the latter, may perhaps be acceded to by us advantageously for the Indians.—To HENRY DEARBORN. vii, 278. (1808.)

3937. INDIANS, Sioux.—On the Sioux nation we wish most particularly to make a friendly impression, because of their immense power, and because we learn that they are very desirous of being on the most friendly terms with us.—To CAPTAIN MERIWETHER LEWIS. iv, 522. (W., 1804.)

3938. INDIANS, Temperance.—Our endeavors are to impress on them all profoundly, temperance, peace and agriculture; and I am persuaded they begin to feel profoundly the soundness of the advice.—To DR. LOGAN. v, 404. (W., 1808.)

3939. INDIANS, Trade vs. Armies.—As soon as our factories on the Missouri and Mississippi can be in activity, they will have more powerful effects than so many armies.—To MERIWETHER LEWIS. v, 351. (M., 1808.)

3940. ———. Have you thought of the Indian drawback? The Indians can be kept in order only by commerce or war. The former is the cheaper. Unless we can induce individuals to employ their capital in that trade, it will require an enormous sum of capital from the public treasury, and it will be badly managed. A drawback for four or five years is the cheapest way of getting that business off our hands.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 227. (W., 9.)

3941. INDIANS, Traditions.—Some scanty accounts of the traditions of the Indians, but fuller of their customs and characters, are given us by most of the early travelers among them; these you know were mostly French. Lafitau, among them, and Adair an Englishman, have written on this subject. * * * But unluckily Lafitau had in his head a preconceived theory on the mythology, manners, institutions, and government of the ancient nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and seems to have entered on those of America only to fit them into the same frame, and to draw from them a confirmation of his general theory. He keeps up a perpetual parallel, in all those articles, between the Indians of America and the ancients of the other quarters of the globe. He selects, therefore, all the facts and adopts all the falsehoods which favor his theory, and very gravely retails such absurdities as zeal for a theory could alone swallow. He was a man of much classical and scriptural reading, and has rendered his book not unenterprising. He resided five years among the northern Indians as a missionary, but collects his matter much more from the writings of others, than from his own observation. Adair, too, had his kink. He believed all the Indians of America to be descended from the Jews; the same laws, usages, rites and ceremonies, the same sacrifices, priests, prophets, fasts and festivals, almost the same religion, and that they all spoke Hebrew. For, although he writes particularly of the southern Indians only, the Catawbas, Creeks, Cherokees, Chickasaws and Choctaws, with whom alone he was personally acquainted, yet he generalizes whatever he found among them, and brings himself to believe that the hundred languages of America, differing fundamentally every one from every other, as much as Greek from Gothic, yet have all one common prototype. He was a trader, a man of learning, a self-taught Hebraist, a strong religionist, and of as sound a mind as Don Quixote in whatever did not touch his religious chivalry. His book contains a great deal of real instruction on its subject, only requiring the reader to be constantly on his guard against the wonderful obliquities of his theory.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 59. FORD ED., ix, 355 (M., 1812.)

3942. INDUSTRY, Fruits of.—Our wish is that * * * [there be] maintained that state of property, equal or unequal, which results to every man from his own industry, or that of his fathers.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 44. FORD ED., viii, 347. (1805.)

3943. ———. The rights of the people to the exercise and fruits of their own industry, can never be protected against the selfishness of rulers not subject to their control at short periods.—To ISAAC H. TIFFANY. vii, 32. (M., 1816.)

3944. ———. To take from one, because it is thought that his own industry and that of his father's has acquired too much, in order to spare to others, who, or whose fathers have not exercised equal industry and skill, is to violate arbitrarily the first principle of association—the guarantee to every one of a free exercise of his industry, and the fruits acquired by it.—NOTE IN DESTUTT TRACY'S POLITICAL ECONOMY. vi, 574. (1816.)

3945. ———. The Republican party believed that men, enjoying in ease and security

the full fruits of their own industry, enlisted by all their interests on the side of law and order, habituated to think for themselves, and to follow their reason as their guide, would be more easily and safely governed, than with minds nourished in error, and vitiated and debased, as in Europe, by ignorance, indigence and oppression.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 292. FORD ED., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

3946. INDUSTRY, Gambling and.—I told the President [Washington] that a system had there [in the Treasury Department] been contrived for deluging the States with paper money instead of gold and silver, for withdrawing our citizens from the pursuits of commerce, manufactures, buildings, and other branches of useful industry, to occupy themselves and their capitals in a species of gambling, destructive of morality, and which had introduced its poison into the government itself.—THE ANAS. ix, 104. FORD ED., i, 177. (Feb. 1792.)

3947. INDUSTRY, Goodness and.—Be good and be industrious and you will be what I most love in the world.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 389. (1787.)

3948. INDUSTRY, Improvement and.—Restrain men from injuring one another, * * * [but] leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 3. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

3949. INDUSTRY, Shackles on.—Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review the * * * shackles on industry by guilds and corporations.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

3950. INDUSTRY, Taxing.—Sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen but from the temptations offered by that treasure.—FIRST INAUGURAL MESSAGE. viii, 9. FORD ED., viii, 119. (1801.)

— INFLATION.—See BANKS, and PAPER MONEY.

3951. INFORMATION, Essential to Executive.—It is essential for the public interest that I should receive all the information possible respecting either matters or persons connected with the public. To induce people to give this information, they must feel assured that when deposited with me it is secret and sacred. Honest men might justifiably withhold information, if they expected the communication would be made public, and commit them to war with their neighbors and friends. This imposes the duty on me of considering such information as mere suggestions for inquiry, and to put me on my guard; and to injure no man by forming any opinion until the suggestion be verified. Long experience in this school has by no means strengthened the disposition to believe too easily. On the contrary, it has begotten an incredulity which leaves no one's character in danger from any hasty conclusion.—To JOHN SMITH. v, 77. (M., 1807.) See PUBLICITY.

3952. INJURY, Accumulated.—The Indian chief said he did not go to war for every petty injury by itself, but put it into his pouch, and when that was full, he then made war. Thank Heaven, we have provided a more peaceable and rational mode of redress.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 295. FORD ED., x, 230. (M., 1823.)

3953. INJURY, The Colonies and.—[During] the reigns which preceded his Majesty's [George III.], the violations of our rights were less alarming, because repeated at more distant intervals than that rapid and bold succession of injuries which is likely to distinguish the present from all other periods of American history. Scarcely have our minds been able to emerge from the astonishment into which one stroke of parliamentary thunder had involved us, before another more heavy, and more alarming, is fallen on us.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 130. FORD ED., i, 435. (1774.) See COLONIES.

3954. — — — Our complaints were either not heard at all, or were answered with new and accumulated injuries.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 481. (July 1775.)

3955. — — — The rapid and bold succession of injuries, which, during a course of eleven years, have been aimed at the Colonies.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 481. (July 1775.)

3956. INJURY, By George III.—He, [George III.], has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by answering our repeated petitions for redress with a repetition of injuries.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 12. (June 1776.)

3957. INJURY, Peaceable Remedy.—Some of these injuries may perhaps admit a peaceable remedy. Where that is competent, it is always the most desirable.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 49. FORD ED., viii, 391. (1805.)

3958. INJURY, Private.—An individual, thinking himself injured, makes more noise than a state.—To GEORGIA DELEGATES IN CONGRESS. i, 501. (1785.)

3959. INJURY, Redressed by war.—I did not think war the surest means of redressing the French injuries.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 269. FORD ED., vii, 329. (Pa., 1799.)

3960. — — — If nations go to war for every degree of injury, there would never be peace on earth.—To MADAME DE STAEL. v, 133. (W., 1807.)

3961. INJURY, Unceasing.—To show they [Parliament] mean no discontinuance of injury, they pass acts, at the very time of holding out this proposition, for restraining the commerce and fisheries of the province of New England, and for interdicting the trade of the other colonies with all foreign nations.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 480. (July 1775.)

3963. INHERITANCES, Equal.—If the overgrown wealth of an individual be deemed dangerous to the State, the best corrective is the law of equal inheritance to all in equal degree; and the better, as this enforces a law of nature, while extra taxation violates it.—NOTE TO TRACY'S POLITICAL ECONOMY. vi, 575. (1816.)

3964. ——. Equal partition of inheritances [is] the best of all agrarian laws.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 49. FORD ED., i, 69. (1821.)

3966. INNES (Henry), Ability.—I wish you would come forward to the Federal Legislature, and give your assistance on a larger scale than that on which you are acting at present. I am satisfied you could render essential service, and I have such confidence in the purity of your republicanism, that I know your efforts would go in a right direction. Zeal and talents added to the republican scale will do no harm in Congress.—TO HENRY INNES. iii, 224. FORD ED., v, 300. (Pa., 1791.)

3967. INNOVATION, Forced.—Great innovations should not be forced on slender majorities.—TO GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 282. (1808.)

3968. INNOVATION, Opposition to.—Innovation in England is heresy and treason.—TO JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. vii, 89. (M., 1817.)

3969. INNOVATION, Reasonable.—I am not myself apt to be alarmed at innovations recommended by reason. That dread belongs to those whose interests or prejudices shrink from the advance of truth and science.—TO DR. JOHN MANNERS. vi, 323. (M., 1814.)

3970. INSTITUTIONS, Flexibility.—Time indeed changes manners and notions and so far we must expect institutions to bend to them.—TO SPENCER ROANE. vii, 211. FORD ED., x, 188. (M., 1821.)

[Society of the Cincinnati]. They may, however, be forced into a declaration by instructions from some of the States.—TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 335. FORD ED., iii, 467. (A., 1784.)

3972. INSTRUCTIONS, Principles and.—I am in great pain for the Marquis de Lafayette. His principles * * * are clearly with the people; but having been elected for the Noblesse of Auvergne, they have laid him under express instructions to vote for the decision by orders and not persons. This would ruin him with the Tiers Etat, and it is not possible he could continue long to give satisfaction to the noblesse. I have not hesitated to press on him to burn his instructions, and follow his conscience as the one sure clew, which will eternally guide a man clear of all doubts and inconsistencies.—TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. iii, 31. FORD ED., v, 96. (1789.)

3973. INSTRUCTIONS, Representatives and.—[Your book*] settles unanswerably the right of instructing representatives, and their duty to obey.—TO JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 605. FORD ED., x, 28. (M., 1816.)

3974. INSULT, Acquiescence under.—It is an eternal truth that acquiescence under insult is not the way to escape war.—TO H. TAZEWELL. iv, 121. FORD ED., vii, 31. (M., 1795.)

3975. INSULT, National character and.—It should ever be held in mind, that insult and war are the consequences of a want of respectability in the national character.—TO JAMES MADISON. i, 531. FORD ED., iv, 192. (P., 1786.)

3976. INSULT, Pocketing.—One insult pocketed soon produces another.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. vii, 510. FORD ED., v, 239. (1790.)

3977. INSULT, Punishing.—I think it to our interest to punish the first insult; because an insult unpunished is the parent of many others.—TO JOHN JAY. i, 405. FORD ED., iv, 89. (P., 1785.)

3978. INSULT, Reparation for.—Both reason and the usage of nations required we should give Great Britain an opportunity of disavowing and repairing the insult of their officers. It gives us at the same time an opportunity of getting home our vessels, our property and our seamen,—the only means of carrying on the kind of war we should attempt.—TO THOMAS COOPER. v, 121. FORD ED., ix, 102. (W., July 1807.)

3979. INSULT, Resenting.—It is inconsistent for a nation which has been patiently bearing for ten years the grossest insults and injuries from their late enemies [the British] to rise at a feather against their friends and benefactors [the French].—OPINION ON LITTLE SARAH. ix, 154. 3981. INSURRECTION, American people and.—My long and intimate knowledge of my countrymen satisfies me, that let there be occasion to display the banners of the law, and the world will see how few and pitiful are those who shall array themselves in opposition.—TO JAMES BROWN. v, 379. FORD ED., ix, 211. 3982. ———. (M., 1808.)

3983. INSURRECTION, George III. and.—He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the Kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by inciting insurrections of our fellow subjects with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 11. (June 1776.)

3986. INSURRECTION, Precautions against.—In a country whose Constitution is derived from the will of the people, directly expressed by their free suffrages; where the principal executive functionaries, and those of the legislature, are renewed by them at short periods; where under the character of jurors, they exercise in person the greatest portion of the judiciary powers; where the laws are consequently so framed and administered as to bear with equal weight and favor on all, restraining no man in the pursuits of honest industry, and securing to every one the property which that acquires, it would not be supposed that any safeguards could be needed against insurrection or enterprise on the public peace or authority. The laws, however, aware that these should not be trusted to moral restraints only, have wisely provided punishments for these crimes when committed. But would it not be salutary to give also the means of preventing their commission? Where an enterprise is meditated by private individuals against a foreign nation in amity with the United States, powers of prevention to a certain extent are given by the laws; would they not be as reasonable and useful were the enterprise preparing against the United States? While advertent to this branch of the law, it is proper to observe, that in enterprises meditated against foreign nations, the ordinary process of binding to the observance of the peace and good behavior, could it be extended to acts to be done out of the jurisdiction of the United States, would be effectual in some cases where the offender is able to keep out of sight every indication of his purpose which could draw on him the exercise of the powers now given by law.—SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 65. FORD ED., viii, 490. (Dec. 1806.)

3987. INSURRECTION, Provoking.—An exasperated people, who feel that they possess power, are not easily restrained within limits strictly regular.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 132. FORD ED., i, 437. (1774.)

3988. INSURRECTION, Punishing.—Where to stay the hand of the executioner is an important question. Those who have escaped from the immediate danger, must have feelings which would dispose them to extend the executions. Even here, where everything has been perfectly tranquil, but where a familiarity with slavery, and a possibility of danger from that quarter prepare the general mind for some severities, there is a strong sentiment that there has been hanging enough. The other States, and the world at large will forever condemn us if we indulge a principle of revenge, or go one step beyond absolute necessity. They cannot lose sight of the rights of the two parties, and the object of the unsuccessful one. Our situation is, indeed, a difficult one; for I doubt whether these people can ever be permitted to go at large among us with safety. To relieve them and keep them in prison till the meeting of the Legislature will encourage efforts for their release. Is there no fort or garrison of the State or of the Union, where they could be confined, and where the presence of the garrison would preclude all ideas of attempting a rescue? Surely the Legislature would pass a law for their exportation, the proper measure on this and all similar occasions.—TO JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 457. (M., Sep. 1800.)

3989. INSURRECTION, Suppressing.—I hope, on the first symptom of an open opposition to the law [Embargo] by force, you will fly to the scene and aid in suppressing any commotion.—TO HENRY DEARBORN. v, 334. (M., Aug. 1808.) See REBELLION.

3992. INTEMPERANCE, Restriction.—

The drunkard, as much as the maniac, requires restrictive measures to save him from the fatal infatuation under which he is destroying his health, his morals, his family, and his usefulness to society. One powerful obstacle to his ruinous self-indulgence would be a price beyond his competence.—TO SAMUEL SMITH. vii, 285. FORD ED., x, 252. (M., 1823.)

3993. INTEREST, Government and.—

Alexander Hamilton avowed the opinion that man could be governed by one of two motives only,—force or interest. Force, he observed, in this country was out of the question; and the interests, therefore, of the members must be laid hold of to keep the Legislature in unison with the Executive. And with grief and shame it must be acknowledged that his machine was not without effect; that even in this, the birth of our government, some members were found sordid enough to bend their duty to their interests, and to look after personal rather than public good.—THE ANAS. ix, 91. 3994. INTEREST, Judgment and.—

The known bias of the human mind from motives of interest should lessen the confidence of each party in the justice of their reasoning.—TO JAMES ROSS. i, 562. FORD ED., iv, 218. (P., 1786.)

3996. INTEREST, The passions and.—

Interest is not the strongest passion in the human breast.—TO JAMES ROSS. i, 561. FORD ED., iv, 217. (P., 1786.)

3997. INTEREST, Private.—

In selecting persons for the management of affairs, I am influenced by neither personal nor family interests.—TO DR. HORATIO TURPIN. v, 90. (W., 1807.)

3998. ———. Bringing into office no desires of making it subservient to the advancement of my own private interests, it has been no sacrifice, by postponing them, to strengthen the confidence of my fellow citizens.—TO DR. HORATIO TURPIN. v, 90. (W., 1807.)

3999. INTEREST, Virtue and.—

Virtue and interest are inseparable.—TO GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x, 69. (P.F., 1816.)

4000. INTEREST (Money), Forfeited.—

There is one rule of your [the English] and our law, which, while it proves that every title of debt is liable to a disallowance of interest under special circumstances, is so applicable to our case, that I shall cite it as a text, and apply it to the circumstances of our case. It is laid down in Vin. Abr. Interest. c. 7, and 2 Abr. Eq. 5293, and elsewhere in these words: "Where, by a general and national calamity, nothing is made out of lands which are assigned for payment of interest, it ought not to run on during the time of such calamity." This is exactly the case in question. Can a more general national calamity be conceived than that universal devastation which took place in many of these States during the war? Was it ever more exactly the case anywhere, that nothing was made out of the lands which were to pay the interest? The produce of those lands, for want of the opportunity of exporting it safely, was down to almost nothing in real money. For example, tobacco was less than a dollar the hundred weight. Imported articles of clothing or consumption were from four to eight times their usual price. A bushel of salt was usually sold for 100 lbs. of tobacco. At the same time, these lands, and other property, in which the money of the British creditor was vested, were paying high taxes for their own protection, and the debtor, as nominal holder, stood ultimate insurer of their value to the creditor, who was the real proprietor, because they were bought with his money. And who will estimate the value of this insurance, or say what would have been the forfeit, in a contrary event of the war? Who will say that the risk of the property was not worth the interest of its price? General calamity, then, prevented profit, and, consequently, stopped interest, which is in lieu of profit. The creditor says, indeed, he has laid out his money; he has, therefore, lost the use of it. The debtor replies, that, if the creditor has lost, he has not gained it; that this may be a question between two parties, both of whom have lost. In that case, the courts will not double the loss of the one, to save all loss from the other. That is a rule of natural as well as municipal law, that in questions "de damno evitando melior est conditio possidentis". If this maxim be just, where each party is equally innocent, how much more so, where the loss has been produced by the act of the creditor? For, a nation, as a society, forms a moral person, and every member of it is personally responsible for his society. It was the act of the lender, or of his nation, which annihilated the profits of the money lent; he cannot then demand profits which he either prevented from coming into existence, or burned, or otherwise destroyed, after they were produced. If, then, there be no instrument, or title of debt so formal and sacred as to give right to interest under all possible circumstances, and if circumstances of exemption, stronger than in the present case, cannot possibly be found, then no instrument or title of debt, however formal or sacred, can give right to interest under the circumstances of our case. Let us present the question in another point of view. Your own law forbade the payment of interest, when it forbade the receipt of American produce into Great Britain, and made that produce fair prize on its way from the debtor to the creditor, or to any other, for his use of reimbursement. All personal access between creditor and debtor was made illegal; and the debtor who endeavored to make a remittance of his debt, or interest, must have done it three times, to ensure its getting once to hand; for two out of three vessels were generally taken by the creditor nation, and, sometimes, by the creditor himself, as many of them turned their trading vessels into privateers.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 418. FORD ED., vi, 58. (Pa., 1792.)

4001. INTEREST (Money), Law and custom.—Nothing is said [in the treaty of peace] of interest on these debts; and the sole question is, whether, where a debt is given, interest thereon flows from the general principles of the law? Interest is not a part of the debt, but something added to the debt by way of damage for the detention of it. This is the definition of the English lawyers themselves, who say, "Interest is recovered by way of damages ratione detentionis debiti". 2 Salk. 622, 623. Formerly, all interest was considered as unlawful, in every country of Europe. It is still so in Roman Catholic countries, and countries little commercial. From this, as a general rule, a few special cases are excepted. In France, particularly, the exceptions are those of minors, marriage portions, and money, the price of lands. So thoroughly do their laws condemn the allowance of interest, that a party who has paid it voluntarily may recover it back again whenever he pleases. Yet this has never been taken up as a gross and flagrant denial of justice, authorizing national complaint against those governments. In England, also, all interest was against law, till the stat. 37, H. 8, c. 9. The growing spirit of commerce, no longer restrained by the principles of the Roman Church, then first began to tolerate it. The same causes produced the same effect in Holland, and, perhaps, in some other commercial and Catholic countries. But, even in England, the allowance of interest is not given by express law, but rests on the discretion of judges and juries, as the arbiters of damages.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 416. FORD ED., vi, 57. (Pa., 1792.)

4002. INTEREST (Money), Right to.—There is not a single title to debt so formal and sacred as to give a right to interest under all possible circumstances either in England or America.—To MR. HAMMOND. iii, 426. (1792.)

4003. INTEREST (Money), Sacred obligation.—A sacred payment of interest is the only way to make the most of our resources, and a sense of that renders your income from our funds more certain than mine from lands.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 402. (M., 1814.)

4004. INTEREST (Money), Tax for.—The new government should by no means be left by the old, to the necessity of borrowing a stiver, before it can tax for its interest. This will be to destroy the credit of the new government in its birth.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 378. (P., 1788.)

4005. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Advocated.—I experience great satisfaction at seeing my country proceed to facilitate the intercommunications of its several parts, by opening rivers, canals and roads. How much more rational is this disposal of public money, than that of waging war.—To JAMES ROSS. i, 560. FORD ED., iv, 216. (P., 1786.)

4006. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Constitutional Amendment.—For authority to apply the surplus [taxes imposed for the support of the government and the payment of the Revolutionary debt] to objects of [internal] improvement, an amendment of the Constitution would have been necessary.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 195. FORD ED., ix, 395. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

4008. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Demand for.—I have for some time considered the question of internal improvement as desperate. The torrent of general opinion sets so strongly in favor of it as to be irresistible.—To JAMES MADISON. vii, 422. FORD ED., x, 348. (M., 1825.)

4009. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Provision for.—I am a great friend to the improvement of roads, canals, and schools. But I wish I could see some provision for the former as solid as that of the latter,—something better than fog.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 517. FORD ED., x, 4. (M., 1816.)

4010. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Reserved Powers.—[The Federal authorities] claim and have commenced the exercise of the right to construct roads, open canals, and effect other internal improvements within the territories and jurisdictions exclusively belonging to the several States, which this Assembly [Virginia] does declare has not been given to that branch by the constitutional compact, but remains to each State among its domestic and unalienated powers, exercisable within itself and by its domestic authorities alone.—VIRGINIA PROTEST. ix, 497. FORD ED., x, 350. (1825.)

4011. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, State rights and.—When we consider the extensive and deep-seated opposition to this assumption [power of Internal Improvements], the conviction entertained by so many, that this deduction of powers by elaborate construction prostrates the rights reserved to the States, the difficulties with which it will rub along in the course of its exercise; that changes of majorities will be changing the system backwards and forwards, so that no undertaking under it will be safe; that there is not a State in the Union which would not give the power willingly, by way of amendment, with some little guard, perhaps, against abuse; I cannot but think it would be the wisest course to ask an express grant of the powers. * * * This would render its exercise smooth and acceptable to all and insure to it all the facilities which the States could contribute, to prevent that kind of abuse which all will fear, because all know it is so much practiced in public bodies, I mean the bartering of votes. It would reconcile everyone, if limited by the proviso, that the federal proportion of each State should be expended within the State. With this single security against partiality and corrupt bargaining, I suppose there is not a State, perhaps not a man in the Union, who would not consent to add this to the powers of the General Government.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 343. FORD ED., x, 300. (M., 1824.)

4012. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Surplus taxes and.—The fondest wish of my heart ever was that the surplus portion of these taxes, destined for the payment of that [Revolutionary] debt, should, when that object was accomplished, be continued by annual or biennial reenactments, and applied, in time of peace, to the improvement of our country by canals, roads and useful institutions, literary or others; and in time of war to the maintenance of the war.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 195. FORD ED., ix, 395. (P.F., 1813.)

4013. — — —. We consider the employment [in public improvements] of the contributions which our citizens can spare, after feeding, and clothing, and lodging themselves comfortably, as more useful, more moral, and even more splendid, than that preferred by Europe, of destroying human life, labor, and happiness.—To BARON VON HUMBOLDT. vii, 75. FORD ED., x, 89. (M., 1817.)

4014. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Veto of Bill for.—An act for internal improvement, after passing both Houses, was negatived by the President. The act was founded, avowedly, on the principle that the phrase in the Constitution which authorizes Congress "to lay taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare", was an extension of the powers specifically enumerated to whatever would promote the general welfare; and this, you know, was the federal doctrine. Whereas, our tenet ever was, and, indeed, it is almost the only landmark which now divides the federalists from the republicans, that Congress had not unlimited powers to provide for the general welfare, but were restrained to those specifically enumerated; and that, as it was never meant they should provide for that welfare but by the exercise of the enumerated powers, so it could not have been meant they should raise money for purposes which the enumeration did not place under their action; consequently, that the specification of powers is a limitation of the purposes for which they may raise money. I think the passage and rejection of this bill a fortunate incident. Every State will certainly concede the power; and this will be a national confirmation of the grounds of appeal to them, and will settle forever the meaning of this phrase, which, by a mere grammatical quibble, has countenanced the General Government in a claim of universal power. For in the phrase, "to lay taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare", it is a mere question of syntax, whether the two last infinitives are governed by the first or are distinct and coordinate powers; a question unequivocally decided by the exact definition of powers immediately following. It is fortunate for another reason, as the States, in conceding the power, will modify it, either by requiring the Federal ratio of expense in each State, or otherwise, so as to secure us against its partial exercise. Without this caution, intrigue, negotiation, and the barter of votes might become as habitual in Congress, as they are in those Legislatures which have the appointment of officers, and which, with us, is called "logging", the term of the farmers for their exchanges of aid in rolling together the logs of their newly-cleared grounds.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 78. FORD ED., x, 91. (M., 1817.)

4015. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, War and.—Farewell, then [should war with England take place], all our useful improvements of canals and roads, reformation of laws, and other rational employments.—To JAMES ROSS. i, 563. FORD ED., iv, 219. (P., 1786.)

4016. — — —. Give us peace till our revenues are liberated from debt, and then, if war be necessary, it can be carried on without a new tax or loan, and during peace we may chequer our whole country with canals, roads, &c. This is the object to which all our endeavors should be directed.—To MR. LIEFER. v, 296. (M., May 1808.)

4017. — — —. The late pacification with England gives us a hope of eight years of peaceable and wise administration, within which time our revenue will be liberated from debt, and be free to commence that splendid course of public improvement and wise application of the public contributions, of which it remains for us to set the first example.—To DR. E. GRIFFITH. v, 451. (M., May 1809.)

4018. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, Western people and.—A majority of the people are against us on this question. The Western States have especially been bribed by local considerations to abandon their ancient brethren, and enlist under banners alien to them in principles and interest.—To WILLIAM F. GORDON. FORD ED., x, 338. (M., Jan. 1826.)

4019. INTOLERANCE, Defiance of.—I never will, by any word or act, bow to the shrine of intolerance, or admit a right of inquiry into the religious opinions of others.—To EDWARD DOWSE. iv, 478. (1803.)

4020. INTOLERANCE, Delusion through.—Your part of the Union, though as absolutely republican as ours, had drunk deeper of the delusion, and is, therefore, slower in recovering from it. The ægis of government, and the temples of religion and of justice, have all been prostrated there to toll us back to the times when we burned witches. But your people will rise again. They will awake like Samson from his sleep, and carry away the gates and posts of the city.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 390. FORD ED., viii, 41. (W., March 1801.)

4021. INTOLERANCE, Religious and political.—Having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained little if we countenance a political intolerance as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 2. FORD ED., viii, 2. (1801.)

4022. INTOLERANCE, Victims.—I have seen with great grief yourself and so many other venerable patriots, retired and weeping in silence over the rapid subversion of those principles for the attachment of which you had sacrificed the ease and comforts of life; but I rejoice that you have lived to see us revindicate our rights, and regain manfully the ground from which fraud, not force, had for a moment driven us.—To GENERAL WARREN. iv, 375. (W., 1801.)

4023. INTRIGUE, Abhorrence of.—I meddled in no intrigues, pursued no concealed object.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 65. FORD ED., i, 91. (1821.)

4024. INTRODUCTION (Letters of), Apology for.—Solicitations, which cannot be directly refused, oblige me to trouble you often, with letters recommending and introducing to you persons who go hence from America. I will beg the favor of you to distinguish the letters wherein I appeal to recommendations from other persons, from those which I write on my own knowledge. In the former, it is never my intention to compromise myself, nor you. In both instances, I must beg you to ascribe the trouble I give you to circumstances which do not leave me at liberty to decline it.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 447. FORD ED., v, 48. (P., 1788.)

4025. INTRODUCTION (Letters of), Refused.—I have been obliged to make it a rule to give no letters of introduction while in my present office.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 286. (W., 1804.)

4026. INTRODUCTION (Letters of), Value of.—It is rendering mutual service to men of virtue and understanding to make them acquainted with one another.—To DR. PRICE. ii, 354. (P., 1788.)

4027. INVASION, Not feared.—I as little fear foreign invasion [as domestic insurrection]. I have indeed thought it a duty to be prepared to meet even the most powerful, that of a Bonaparte, for instance, by the only means competent, that of a classification of the militia, and placing the junior classes at the public disposal; but the lesson he receives in Spain extirpates all apprehensions from my mind. If, in a peninsula, the neck of which is adjacent to him and at his command, where he can march any army without the possibility of interception or obstruction from any foreign power, he finds it necessary to begin with an army of three hundred thousand men, to subdue a nation of five millions, brutalized by ignorance, and enervated by long peace, and should find constant reinforcements of thousands after thousands, necessary to effect at last a conquest as doubtful as deprecated, what numbers would be necessary against eight millions of free Americans, spread over such an extent of country as would wear him down by mere marching, by want of food, autumnal diseases, &c.? How would they be brought, and how reinforced across an ocean of three thousand miles, in possession of a bitter enemy, whose peace, like the repose of a dog, is never more than momentary? And for what? For nothing but hard blows. If the Orleanese Creoles would but contemplate these truths, they would cling to the American Union, soul and body, as their first affection, and we would be as safe there as we are everywhere else.—To DR. JAMES BROWN. v, 379. FORD ED., ix, 211. (W., 1808.)

4028. INVENTIONS, Air screw propeller.—I went some time ago to see a machine which offers something new. A man had applied to a light boat a very large screw. the thread of which was a thin plate, two feet broad, applied by its edge spirally around a small axis. It somewhat resembled a bottle brush, if you will suppose the hairs of the bottle brush joining together, and forming a spiral plane. This, turned on its axis in the air, carried the vessel across the Seine. It is, in fact, a screw which takes hold of the air and draws itself along by it; losing, indeed, much of its effort by the yielding nature of the body it lays hold of to pull itself on by. I think it may be applied in the water with much greater effect and to very useful purposes. Perhaps it may be used also for the balloon.—To PROFESSOR JAMES MADISON. i, 447. (P., 1785.)

4029. INVENTIONS, Copying press.—When I was in England, I formed a portable copying press on the principle of the large one they make here [Paris] for copying letters. I had a model made there, and it has answered perfectly. A workman here has made several from that model. * * * You must do me the favor to accept of one.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 81. FORD ED., iv, 347. (P., 1786.)

is, as you are apprised, kept secret here [Paris]. There is no getting at it, therefore, openly. A friend has undertaken to try whether it can be obtained either by proposing the partnership you mention, or by finding out the process.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. FORD ED., iv, 270. (P., 1786.)

4031. ——. Your two phials of Essence d'Orient * * * got separated from the letters which accompanied them. * * * The pearl merchant * * * said you had a very considerable knowledge in the manner of preparing, but that there was still one thing wanting which made the secret of the art; that this is not only a secret of the art, but of every individual workman who will not communicate to his fellows, believing his own method best; that of ten different workmen, all will practice different operations, and only one of the ten be the right one; that the secret consists only in preparing the fish, all the other parts of the process in the pearl manufactory being known. That experience has provide it to be absolutely impossible for the matter to cross the sea without being spoiled; but that if you will send some in the best state you can, he will make pearls of it, and send to you that you may judge of them yourself.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. ii, 202. (P., 1787.)

4032. INVENTIONS, Feller Hydraulique.—I am thankful to you for the trouble you have taken in thinking of the feller hydraulique. To be put in motion by the same power which was to continue the motion was certainly wanting to that machine, as a better name still is. I would not give you the trouble of having a model made, as I have workmen who can execute from the drawing.—To ROBERT FULTON. v, 517. (M., 1810.)

4033. INVENTIONS, Government interposition.—Though the interposition of government in matters of invention has its use, yet it is in practice so inseparable from abuse that the government of my country think it better not to meddle with it.—To M. HOMMANDE. ii, 236. (P., 1787.)

4034. INVENTIONS, Hemp-brake.—The braking and beating hemp, which has been always done by hand, is so slow, so laborious, and so much complained of by our laborers, that I had given it up and purchased and manufactured cotton for their shirting. The advanced price of this, however, makes it a serious item of expense; and, in the meantime, a method of removing the difficulty of preparing hemp occurred to me, so simple and so cheap, that I return to its culture and manufacture. To a person having a threshing machine, the addition of a hemp-brake will not cost more than twelve or fifteen dollars. You know that the first mover in that machine is a horizontal horse-wheel with cogs on its upper face. On these is placed a wallower and shaft, which give motion to the threshing apparatus. On the opposite side of this same wheel I place another wallower and shaft, through which, and near its outer end, I pass a cross-arm of sufficient strength, projecting on each side fifteen inches in this form:

Nearly under the cross-arm is placed a very strong hemp-brake, much stronger and heavier than those for the hand. Its head block particularly is massive, and four feet high, and near its upper end in front, is fixed a strong pin (which we may call its horn); by this the cross-arm lifts and lets fall the brake twice in every revolution of the wallower. * * * Something of this kind has been so long wanted by the cultivators of hemp, that as soon as I can speak of its effect with certainty I shall probably describe it anonymously in the public papers, in order to forestall the prevention of its use by some interfering patentee.—To GEORGE FLEMING. vi, 506. (M., 1815.)

— INVENTIONS, Patents for.—See PATENTS.

4035. INVENTIONS, Pedometer.—I send your pedometer. To the loop at the bottom of it, you must sew a tape, and at the other end of the tape, a small hook. * * * Cut a little hole in the bottom of your left watch pocket, pass the hook and tape through it, and down between the breeches and drawers, and fix the hook on the edge of your knee band, an inch from the knee buckle; then hook the instrument itself by its swivel hook, on the upper edge of the watch pocket. Your tape being well adjusted in length. Your double steps will be exactly counted by the instrument.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 379. (P., 1788.)

4036. INVENTIONS, Polygraph.—A Mr. Hawkins, of Frankford, near Philadelphia, has invented a machine which he calls a polygraph, and which carries two, three, or four pens. That of two pens, is best; and is so perfect that I have laid aside the copying press, for a twelve-month past, and write always with the polygraph. I have directed one to be made, of which I ask your acceptance.—To C. F. VOLNEY. iv, 572. (W., 1805.)

4037. ——. It is for copying with one pen while you write with the other, and without the least additional embarrassment or exertion to the writer. I think it the finest invention of the present age. * * * As a secretary which copies for us what we write without the power of revealing it, I find it a most precious possession to a man in public business.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. vi, 17. (W., 1806.)

4038. INVENTIONS, Preserving flour.—Every discovery which multiplies the subsistence of man must be a matter of joy to every friend of humanity. As such, I learn with great satisfaction, that you have found the means of preserving flour more perfectly than has been done hitherto. But I am not authorized to avail my country of it, by making any offer to its communication. Their policy is to leave their citizens free, neither restraining nor aiding them in their pursuits.—To MONSIEUR L'HOMMANDE. ii, 236. (P., 1787.)

4039. INVENTIONS, Seed box.—The seed-box described in the agricultural transactions of New York, reduces the expense of seeding from six shillings to two shillings and three pence the acre, and does the business better than is possible to be done by the human hand.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 117. FORD ED., vii, 11. (M., 1795.)

4040. INVENTIONS, Stylograph.—The apparatus for stylographic writing * * * is certainly very ingenious. * * * I had never heard of the invention till your letter announced it, for these novelties reach us very late.—To WILLIAM LYMAN. v, 279. (W., 1808.)

4041. INVENTIONS, Threshing machine.—My threshing machine has arrived at

New York. Mr. Pinckney writes me word that the original from which this is copied threshes one hundred and fifty bushels of wheat in eight hours, with six horses and five men. It may be moved either by water or horses. Fortunately the workman who made it (a millwright) is come in the same vessel to America. I have written to persuade him to go on immediately to Richmond, offering him the use of my model to exhibit, and to give him letters to get him into immediate employ in making them.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 54. FORD ED., vi, 403. (Pa., 1793.)

4042. INVENTIONS, Useful.—I am not afraid of new inventions or improvements, nor bigoted to the practices of our forefathers. * * * Where a new invention is supported by well known principles, and promises to be useful, it ought to be tried.—To ROBERT FULTON. v, 516. (M., 1810.) See TORPEDO.

4043. INVENTIONS, Wooden wheels.—I was in Philadelphia when the first set of wheels arrived from London, and were spoken of by the gentleman (an Englishman) who brought them as a wonderful discovery. The idea of its being a new discovery was laughed at by the Philadelphians, who, in their Sunday parties across the Delaware, had seen every farmer's cart mounted on such wheels. The writer in the paper supposes the English workman got his idea from Homer. But it is more likely the Jersey farmer got his idea thence, because ours are the only farmers who can read Homer; because, too, the Jersey practice is precisely that statu by Homer: the English practice very different. Homer's words are (comparing a young hero killed by Ajax to a poplar felled by a workman) literally thus: "He fell on the ground, like a poplar, which has grown smooth, in the west part of a great meadow; with its branches shooting from its summit. But the chariot maker, with the sharp axe, has felled it, that he may bend a wheel for a beautiful chariot. It lies drying on the banks of the river." Observe the circumstances which coincide with the Jersey practice. 1. It is a tree growing in a moist place, full of juices and easily bent. 2. It is cut while green. 3. It is bent into the circumference of a wheel. 4. It is left to dry in that form. You should write a line for the Journal to reclaim the honor of our farmers.—To M. DE CREVECOEUR. ii, 97. (P., 1787.)

4044. ——. I see by the Journal that they are robbing us of another of our inventions to give it to the English. The writer, indeed, only admits them to have revived what he thinks was known to the Greeks, that is, the making the circumference of a wheel of one single piece. The farmers in New Jersey were the first who practiced it commonly. Dr. Franklin, in one of his trips to London, mentioned this practice to the man now in London, who has the patent for making those wheels. The idea struck him. The Doctor promised to go to his shop, and assist him in trying to make the wheel of one piece. The Jersey farmers do it by cutting a young sapling, and bending it, while green and juicy, into a circle; and leaving it so until it becomes perfectly seasoned. But in London there are no saplings. The difficulty was, then, to give to old wood the pliancy of young. The Doctor and the workman labored together some weeks, and succeeded; and the man obtained a patent for it, which has made his fortune. I was in his shop in London; he told me the story himself, and acknowledged, not only the origin of the idea, but how much the assistance of Dr. Franklin had contributed to perform the operation on dry wood. He spoke of him with love and gratitude.—To M. DE CREVECOEUR. ii, 97. (P., 1787.)

4045. INVENTORS, Rights of.—It has been pretended by some (and in England especially) that inventors have a natural and exclusive right to their inventions, and not merely for their own lives, but inheritable to their heirs. But while it is a moot question whether the origin of any kind of property is derived from nature at all, it would be singular to admit a natural and even an hereditary right to inventors. It is agreed by those who have seriously considered the subject, that no individual has, of natural right, a separate property in an acre of land, for instance. By an universal law, indeed, whatever, whether fixed or movable, belongs to all men equally and in common, is the property for the moment of him who occupies it; but when he relinquishes the occupation, the property goes with it. Stable ownership is the gift of social law, and is given late in the progress of society. It would be curious, then, if an idea, the fugitive fermentation of an individual brain, could, of natural right, be claimed in exclusive and stable property. If nature has made any one thing less susceptible than all others of exclusive property, it is the action of the thinking power called an idea, which an individual may exclusively possess as long as he keeps it to himself; but the moment it is divulged, it forces itself into the possession of every one, and the receiver cannot dispossess himself of it. Its peculiar character, too, is that no one possesses the less, because every other possesses the whole of it. He who receives an idea from me, receives instruction himself without lessening mine; as he who lights his taper at mine, receives light without darkening mine. That ideas should freely spread from one to another over the globe, for the moral and mutual instruction of man, and improvement of his condition, seems to have been peculiarly and benevolently designed by nature. When she made them like fire, expansible over all space, without lessening their density in any point, and like the air in which we breathe, move, and have our physical being, incapable of confinement or exclusive appropriation. Inventions then cannot, in nature, be a subject of property. Society may give an exclusive right to the profits arising from them, as an encouragement to men to pursue ideas which may produce utility, but this may or may not be done according to the will and convenience of the society, without claim or complaint from anybody. Accordingly, it is a fact, as far as I am informed, that England was, until we copied her the only country on earth which ever, by a general law, gave a legal right to the exclusive use of an idea. In some countries it is sometimes done, in a great case, and by a special and personal act, but generally speaking, other nations have thought that these monopolies produce more embarrassment than advantage to society; and it may be observed that the nations which refuse monopolies of invention, are as fruitful as England in new and useful devices.—To ISAAC MCPHERSON. vi, 180. (M., 1813.)

4046. IRELAND, America and.—You shall find me zealous in whatever may concern the interests of the two countries. [United States and Ireland.]—To W. W. SEWARD. i, 479. (P., 1785.)

4047. ——. The freedom of commerce between Ireland and America is undoubtedly very interesting to both countries. If fair play be given to the natural advantages of Ireland, she must come in for a distinguished share of that commerce. She is entitled to it from the excellence of some of her manufactures, the cheapness of most of them, their correspondence with the American taste, a sameness of language, laws and manners, a reciprocal affection between the people, and the singular circumstance of her being the nearest European land to the United States.*—To W. W. SEWARD. i, 478. (P., 1785.)

4048. — — —. The defeat of the Irish propositions is also in our favor.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 414. (P., 1785.)

4049. IRELAND, Commerce.—It is to be considered how far an exception in favor of Ireland in our commercial regulations might embarrass the councils of England on the one hand, and on the other how far it might give room to an evasion of the regulations.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 41. (P., 1785.)

4050. — — —. I am sure the United States would be glad, if it should be found practicable, to make that discrimination between Great Britain and Ireland, which their commercial principles, and their affection for the latter, would dictate.—To W. W. SEWARD. i, 479. (P., 1785.)

4051: — — —. I am not at present so well acquainted with the trammels of Irish commerce, as to know what they are, particularly, which obstruct the intercourse between Ireland and America; nor, therefore, what can be the object of a fleet stationed in the western ocean, to intercept that intercourse. Experience, however, has taught us to infer that the fact is probable, because it is impossible.—To W. W. SEWARD. i, 478. (P., 1785.)

4052. IRELAND, Great Britain and.—Bonaparte * * * seems to be looking towards the East Indies, where a most formidable cooperation has been prepared for demolishing the British power. I wish the affairs of Ireland were as hopeful.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 280. FORD ED., vii, 341. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

— IRISH, The.—See 474 and 480.

4053. IRON, Indians and.—Nothing I have ever yet heard of proves the existence of a nation here who knew the use of iron. I have never heard even of burnt bricks, though they might be made without iron. The statue you * * * send me would, because of the hardness of the stone, be a better proof of the use of iron than I ever yet saw; but as it is a solitary fact, and possible to have been made with implements of stone, and great patience, for which the Indians are remarkable, I consider it to have been so made. It is certainly the best piece of workmanship I ever saw from their hands.—To HARRY INNESS. iii, 217. FORD ED., v, 294. (Pa., 1791.)

nation of Europe, where labor is so much cheaper.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 493. (P., 1785.)

4055. — — —. The United States have much occasion for the productions of Sweden, particularly for its iron.—To BARON STAHE. FORD ED., iv, 242. (P., 1786.)

4056. IVERNOIS (Francois d'), Patriot.—M. d'Ivernois is a Genevan of considerable distinction for science and patriotism, and that, too, of the republican kind, though he does not carry it so far as our friends of the National Assembly of France. While I was in Paris, I knew him as an exile from his democratic principles, the aristocracy having then the upper hand in Geneva. He is now obnoxious to the democratic party.—To WILSON NICHOLAS. iv, 109. FORD ED., vi, 513. (M., 1794.) See ACADEMY, GENEVA.

4057. JACKSON (Andrew), Faithful.—Be assured that Tennessee, and particularly General Jackson are faithful.*—To GENERAL WILKINSON. v, 25. FORD ED., ix, 2. (W., Jan. 1807.)

4058. JACKSON (Andrew), Invitation to.—In your passages to and from Washington, should your travelling convenience ever permit a deviation to Monticello, I shall receive you with distinguished welcome. * * * I recall with pleasure the remembrance of our joint labors while in Senate together in times of great trial and of hard battling. Battles, indeed, of words, not of blood, as those you have since fought so much for your own glory, and that of your country.—To ANDREW JACKSON. FORD ED., x, 286. (M., 1823.)

4059. JACKSON (Andrew), Life of.—I have lately read, with great pleasure, Reid and Eaton's Life of Jackson, if "Life" may be called what is merely a history of his campaign of 1814. Reid's part is well written. Eaton's continuation is better for its matter than style. The whole, however, is valuable.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 82. (P.F., 1817.)

4060. JACKSON (Andrew), Passionate.—I feel much alarmed at the prospect of seeing General Jackson President. He is one of the most unfit men I know of for such a place. He has had very little respect for laws or constitutions, and is, in fact, an able military chief. His passions are terrible. When I was President of the Senate he was a Senator; and he could never speak on account of the rashness of his feelings. I have seen him attempt it repeatedly, and as often choke with rage. His passions are no doubt cooler now; he has been much tried since I knew him, but he is a dangerous man.—DANIEL WEBSTER'S INTERVIEW WITH JEFFERSON. FORD ED., x, 331. (1824.)

4061. JACKSON (Andrew), Presidential contest.—A threatening cloud has very suddenly darkened [General Jackson's] horizon. A letter has become public, written by him when Colonel Monroe first came into office, advising him to make up his administration without regard to party. (No suspicion has been entertained of any indecision in his political principles, and this evidence of it threatens a revolution of opinion respecting him.†) The solid republicanism of Pennsylvania, his principal support, is thrown into great fermentation by this apparent indifference to political principle.—To RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., x, 304. (1824.)

4062. JACKSON (Andrew), Seminole War and.—I observe Ritchie imputes to you and myself opinions against Jackson's conduct in the Seminole war. I certainly never doubted that the military entrance into Florida, the temporary occupation of their posts, and the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister were all justifiable. * * * I at first felt regret at the execution; but I have ceased to feel [manuscript torn] on mature reflection, and a belief the example will save much blood.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., x, 124. (M., 1819.)

4063. JACOBINS, Battle for liberty.—In the struggle which was necessary, many guilty persons fell without the forms of trial, and with them some innocent. These I deplore as much as anybody, and shall deplore some of them to the day of my death. But I deplore them as I should have done had they fallen in battle. It was necessary to use the arm of the people, a machine not quite so blind as balls and bombs, but blind to a certain degree. A few of their cordial friends met at their hands the fate of enemies. But time and truth will rescue and embalm their memories, while their posterity will be enjoying that very liberty for which they would never have hesitated to offer up their lives. The liberty of the whole earth was depending on the issue of the contest, and was ever such a prize won with so little innocent blood? My own affections have been deeply wounded by some of the martyrs to this cause, but rather than it should have failed I would have seen half the earth desolated; were there but an Adam and Eve left in every country, and left free, it would be better than as it now is.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 502. FORD ED., vi, 153. (Pa., January 1793.)

4064. JACOBINS, Censured.—The tone of your letters had for some time given me pain, on account of the extreme warmth with which they censured the proceedings of the Jacobins of France. I considered that sect as the same with the republican patriots, and the Feuillants as the monarchical patriots, well known in the early part of the Revolution, and but little distant in their views, both having in object the establishment of a free constitution, differing only on the question whether their chief Executive should be hereditary or not. The Jacobins (as since called) yielded to the Feuillants, and tried the experiment of retaining their hereditary Executive. The experiment failed completely, and would have brought on the reestablishment of despotism had it been pursued. The Jacobins saw this, and that the expunging that office was of absolute necessity. And the nation was with them in opinion, for however they might have been formerly for the constitution framed by the first assembly, they were come over from their hope in it, and were now generally Jacobins.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 501. FORD ED., vi, 153. (Pa., January 1793.)

4065. JACOBINS, Degeneration.—The society of Jacobins was instituted on principles and views as virtuous as ever kindled the hearts of patriots. It was the pure patriotism of their purposes which extended their association to the limits of the nation, and rendered their power within it boundless; and it was this power which degenerated their principles and practices to such enormities as never before could have been imagined.—To JEDEDIAH MORSE. vii, 235. FORD ED., x, 205. (M., 1822.)

4066. JACOBINS, Favorable to America.—The Jacobin party cannot but be favorable to America. Notwithstanding the very general abuse of the Jacobins, I begin to consider them as representing the true revolution-spirit of the whole nation, and as carrying the nation with them.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 96. (Pa., June 1792.)

4067. JACOBINS, Inexperience.—The only things wanting with the Jacobins is more experience in business, and a little more conformity to the established style of communication with foreign powers. The latter want will, I fear, bring enemies into the field, who would have remained at home. The former leads them to domineer over their executive, so as to render it unequal to its proper objects.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 96. (Pa., 1792.)

4068. JACOBINS, Republicanism.—The reserve of President Washington had never permitted me to discover the light in which he viewed [your censure of the Jacobins], and as I was more anxious that you should satisfy him than me, I had still avoided explanations with you on the subject. But your letter induced him to break silence, and to notice the extreme acrimony of your expressions. He added that he had been informed the sentiments you expressed in your conversations were equally offensive to our allies, and that you should consider yourself as the representative of your country, and that what you say might be imputed to your constituents. He desired me, therefore, to write to you on this subject. He added that he considered France as the sheet anchor of this country, and its friendship as a first object. There are in the United States some characters of opposite principles; some of them are high in office, others possessing great wealth, and all of them hostile to France, and fondly looking to England as the staff of their hope. * * * Their prospects have certainly not brightened. Excepting them, this country is entirely republican, friends to the Constitution, anxious to preserve it, and to have it administered according to its own republican principles. The little party above mentioned have espoused it only as a stepping-stone to monarchy, and have endeavored to approximate it to that in its administration in order to render its final transition more easy. The successes of republicanism in France have given the coup de grace to their prospects, and I hope to their projects.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 502. FORD ED., vi, 154. (Pa., Jan. 1793.)

4069. JAY (John), Chief Justice.—Jay [has been] nominated Chief Justice. We were afraid of something worse.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 343. FORD ED., vii, 471. (W., Dec. 1800.)

4070. JAY (John), Monarchical principles.—Jay, covering the same [monarchical] principles under the veil of silence, is rising steadily on the ruins of his friends.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 268. FORD ED., v, 352. (Pa., 1791.)

4071. JAY (John), Newspaper attacks.—I observe by the public papers that Mr. Littlepage has brought on a very disagreeable altercation with Mr. Jay, in which he has given to the character of the latter a coloring which does not belong to it. * * * In truth it is afflicting that a man who has passed his life in serving the public, who has served them in the highest stations with universal approbation, and with a purity of conduct which has silenced even party opprobrium; who, though poor, has never permitted himself to make a shilling in the public employ, should yet be liable to have his peace of mind so much disturbed by any individual who shall think proper to arraign him in a newspaper. It is, however, an evil for which there is no remedy. Our liberty depends on the freedom of the press, and that cannot be limited without being lost. To the sacrifice of time, labor, fortune, a public servant must count upon adding that of peace of mind and even reputation.—To Dr. JAMES CURRIE. FORD ED., iv, 131. (P., 1786.)

4072. ——. It is really to be lamented that after a public servant has passed a life in important and faithful services, after having given the most plenary satisfaction in every station, it should yet be in the power of every individual to disturb his quiet, by arraigning him in a gazette and by obliging him to act as if he needed a defence, an obligation imposed on him by unthinking minds which never give themselves the trouble of seeking a reflection unless it is presented to them. However it is a part of the price we pay for our liberty, which cannot be guarded but by the freedom of the press, nor that be limited without danger of losing it. To the loss of time, of labor, of money, then, must be added that of quiet, to which those must offer themselves who are capable of serving the public * * *. Your quiet may have suffered for a moment on this occasion, but you have the strongest of all supports, that of the public esteem.—To JOHN JAY. FORD ED., iv, 186. (P., 1786.)

4073. JAY (John), Treaty-founded. —Mr. Jay and his advocate, "Camillus", are completely treaty-founded.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 149. FORD ED., vii, 90. (M., July 1796.)

4074. JAY (John), Tribute to.—I cannot take my departure without paying to yourself and your worthy colleague my homage for the good work you have completed for us, and congratulating you on the singular happiness of having borne so distinguished a part both in the earliest and latest transactions of this Revolution. * * * I am in hopes you will continue at some one of the European courts most agreeable to yourself, that we may still have the benefit of your talents.—To JOHN JAY. i, 332. FORD ED., iii, 316. (Pa., April 1783.)

4075. JAY TREATY, Bad.—No man in the United States has had the effrontery to affirm that the treaty with England was not a very bad one except A. H. [Alexander Hamilton] under the signature of "Camillus". Its most zealous defenders only pretended that it was better than war, as if war was not invited, rather than avoided, by unfounded demands. I have never known the public pulse beat so full and in such universal union on any subject since the Declaration of Independence.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 58. (M., March 1796.)

4076. JAY TREATY, Dissatisfaction with.—So general a burst of dissatisfaction never before appeared against any transaction. Those who understand the particular articles of it, condemn these articles. Those who do not understand them minutely, condemn it generally as wearing a hostile face to France. This last is the most numerous class, comprehending the whole body of the people, who have taken a greater interest in this transaction than they were ever known to do in other. It has, in my opinion, completely demolished the monarchical party here.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 27. (M., Sep. 1795.)

4077. ——. A very slight notice of [the Jay treaty] sufficed to decide my mind against it. I am not satisfied we should not be better without treaties with any nation. But I am satisfied we should be better without such as this. The public dissatisfaction, too, and dissension it is likely to produce, are serious evils.—To H. TAZEWELL. iv, 120. FORD ED., vii, 30. (M., Sep. 1795.)

4078. JAY TREATY, Execrable.—I join with you in thinking the treaty an execrable thing. But both negotiators must have understood, that, as there were articles in it which could not be carried into execution without the aid of the Legislatures on both sides, that therefore it must be referred to them, and that these Legislatures being free agents, would not give it their support if they disapproved of it. I trust the popular branch of our Legislature will disapprove of it, and thus rid us of this infamous act, which is really nothing more than a treaty of alliance between England and the Anglomen of this country, against the Legislature and people of the United States.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 124. FORD ED., vii, 40. (M., Nov. 1795.)

4079. JAY TREATY, House of representatives and.—[John] Marshall's doctrine that the whole commercial part of the [Jay] treaty (and he might have added the whole unconstitutional part of it), rests in the power of the House of Representatives, is certainly the true doctrine; and as the articles which stipulate what requires the consent of the three branches of the Legislature, must be referred to the House of Representatives for their concurrence, so they, being free agents, may approve or reject them, either by a vote declaring that, or by refusing to pass acts. I should think the former mode the most safe and honorable.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 38. (Nov. 1795.)

4080. ——. It is, indeed, surprising you [the House of Representatives] have not yet received the British treaty in form. I presume you would never receive it were not your cooperation on it necessary.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 131. FORD ED., vii, 62. (M., March 1796.)

4081. ——. The British treaty has been formally, at length, laid before Congress. All America is on tiptoe to see what the House of Representatives will decide on it. We conceive the constitutional doctrine to be, that though the President and Senate have the general power of making treaties, yet, whenever, they include in a treaty matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of the Legislature, an act of legislation will be requisite to confirm these articles, and that the House of Representatives, as one branch of the Legislature, are perfectly free to pass the act or to refuse it, governing themselves by their own judgment whether it is for the good of their constituents to let the treaty go into effect or not. On the precedent now to be set will depend the future construction of our Constitution, and whether the powers of legislation shall be transferred from the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, to the President and Senate, and Piamingo or any other Indian, Algerine, or other chief. It is fortunate that the first decision is to be in a case so palpably atrocious, as to have been predetermined by all America.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 134. FORD ED., vii, 67. (M., March 1796.)

4082. ——. The House of Representatives has manifested its disapprobation of the treaty. We are yet to learn whether they will exercise their constitutional right of refusing the means which depend on them for carrying it into execution. Should they be induced to lend their hand to it, it will be hard swallowing with their constituents; but will be swallowed from the habits of order and obedience to the laws which so much distinguish our countrymen.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 59. (M., March 1796.)

4083. ——. Randolph seems to have hit upon the true theory of our Constitution; that when a treaty is made, involving matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of the Legislature conjointly, the Representatives are as free as the President and Senate were, to consider whether the national interest requires or forbids, their giving the forms and force of law to the articles over which they have a power.—To WM. B. GILES. iv, 125. FORD ED., vii, 41. (M., Nov. 1795.)

4084. ——. I am well pleased with the manner in which your House have testified their sense of the treaty. While their refusal to pass the original clause of the reported answer proved their condemnation of it, the contrivance to let it disappear silently respected appearances in favor of the President, who errs as other men do, but errs with integrity.—To W. B. GILES. iv, 125. FORD ED., vii, 41. (M., Dec. 1795.)

4085. JAY TREATY, The Merchants and.—The Chamber of Commerce in New York, against the body of the town; the merchants in Philadelphia, against the body of their town, also, and our town of Alexandria have come forward in its support. Some individual champions also appear. Marshall, Carrington, Harvey, Bushrod Washington, Doctor Stewart. A more powerful one is Hamilton, under the signature of "Camillus". Adams holds his tongue with an address above his character.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 27. (M., Sep. 1795.)

4086. ——. The merchants were certainly (except those of them who are English) as open mouthed at first against the treaty, as any. But the general expression of indignation has alarmed them for the strength of the Government. They have feared the shock would be too great, and have chosen to tack about and support both treaty and Government, rather than risk the Government. Thus it is, that Hamilton, Jay, &c., in the boldest act they ever ventured on to undermine the government, have the address to screen themselves, and direct the hue and cry against those who wish to drag them into light. A bolder party-stroke was never struck. For it certainly is an attempt of a party, who find they have lost their majority in one branch of the Legislature, to make a law by the aid of the other branch and of the Executive, under color of a treaty, which shall bind up the hands of the adverse branch from ever restraining the commerce of their patron nation. There appears a pause at present in the public sentiment, which may be followed by a revulsion. This is the effect of the desertion of the merchants, of the President's chiding answer to Boston and Richmond, of the writings of "Curtius" and "Camillus", and of the quietism into which the people naturally fall after first sensations are over.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 122. FORD ED., vii, 32. (M., Sep. 1795.)

4087. JAY TREATY, A millstone.—Jay's treaty [should never] be quoted, or looked at, or even mentioned. That form will forever be a millstone round our necks unless we now rid ourselves of it once for all.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 444. (M., April 1809.)

4088. JAY TREATY, Political effects of.—The British treaty produced a schism that went on widening and rankling till the years '98 and '99, when a final dissolution of all bonds, civil and social, appeared imminent. In that awful crisis, the people awakened from the frenzy into which they had been thrown, began to return to their sober and ancient principles, and have now become five-sixths of one sentiment, to wit, for peace, economy, and a government bottomed on popular election in its legislative and executive branches.—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. iv, 465. FORD ED., viii, 212. (W., Feb. 1803.)

4089. JAY TREATY, Publication of.—The treaty is now known here by a bold act of duty in one of our Senators.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 28. (M., 1795.)

4090. JAY TREATY, Ratification.—The campaign in Congress has closed. Though the Anglomen,* have in the end got their treaty through, and so have triumphed over the cause of republicanism, yet it has been to them a dear bought victory. It has given

* William Cobbett, who was then in the United States, was one of the newspaper and pamphleteering advocates of the ratification of the Jay treaty, and against Jefferson and his followers. Cobbett, after his return to England, writing to William Pitt, in 1804, said with respect to the Jay treaty: "The importance of that victory to England it would, perhaps, be difficult to render intelligible to the mind of Lord Melville, without the aid of a comparison; and, therefore, it may be necessary to observe, that it was infinitely more important than all his victories in the West Indies put together, which latter victories cost England thirty thousand men, and fifty millions of money." Mr. Windham, in the House of Commons, referring to this service of Cobbett, said that Cobbett had "rendered in America such service to his country as entitled him to a statue of gold".—EDITOR.

the most radical shock to their party which it has ever received; and there is no doubt, they would be glad to be replaced on the ground they possessed the instant before Jay's nomination extraordinary. They see that nothing can support them but the Colossus of the President's merits with the people, and the moment he retires, that his successor, if a monocrat, will be overborne by the republican sense of his constituents; if a republican, he will, of course, give fair play to that sense, and lead things into the channel of harmony between the governors and the governed. In the meantime, patience.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 148. (July 1796.)

4091. JEALOUSY, Doubt and.—Doubts and jealousies often beget the facts they fear.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 23. FORD ED., viii, 476. (W., 1806.)

4092. JEALOUSY, Government and.—Free government is founded in jealousy, and not in confidence; it is jealousy, and not confidence, which prescribes limited Constitutions, to bind down those whom we are obliged to trust with power.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 470. FORD ED., vii, 304. (1798.)

My teacher, Mr. Douglas, a clergyman from Scotland, with the rudiments of the Latin and Greek languages, taught me the French; and on the death of my father, I went to the Reverend M. Maury, a correct classical scholar, with whom I continued two years; and then, to wit, in the spring of 1760, went to William and Mary College where I continued two years.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 2. 4096. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Father of.—My father's education had been quite neglected; but being of a strong mind, sound judgment, and eager after information, he read much and improved himself, insomuch that he was chosen, with Joshua Fry, Professor of Mathematics in William and Mary College, to continue the boundary line between Virginia and North Carolina, which had been begun by Colonel Byrd; and was afterwards employed with the same Mr. Fry, to make the first map of Virginia which had ever been made, that of Captain Smith being merely a conjectured sketch. They possessed excellent materials for so much of the country as is below the Blue Ridge; little being then known beyond that ridge. He was the third or fourth settler, about the year 1737, of the part of the country in which I live. He died, August 17, 1757, leaving my mother a widow, who lived till 1776, with six daughters and two sons, myself the elder. To my younger brother he left his estate on James River, called Snowdon, after the supposed birthplace of the family; to myself the lands on which I was born and live.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 2. 4097. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Harvard's honors.—I have been lately honored with your letter of September 24th, 1788, accompanied by a diploma for a Doctorate of Laws, which the University of Harvard has been pleased to confer on me. Conscious how little I merit it, I am the more sensible of their goodness and indulgence to a stranger, who has had no means of serving or making himself known to them. I beg you to return them my grateful thanks, and to assure them that this notice from so eminent a seat of science is very precious to me.—To DR. WILLARD. iii, 14. (P., 1789.)

4098. JEFFERSON (Thomas), History and.—Nothing is so desirable to me, as that after mankind shall have been abused by such gross falsehoods as to events while passing, their minds should at length be set to rights by genuine truth. And I can conscientiously declare that as to myself, I wish that not only no act but no thought of mine should be unknown.—To JAMES MAIN. v, 373. (W., Oct. 1808.)

4099. — — — As to what is to be said of myself, I of course am not the judge. But my sincere wish is that the faithful historian, like the able surgeon, would consider me in his hands, while living, as a dead subject, that the same judgment may now be expressed which will be rendered hereafter, so far as my small agency in human affairs may attract future notice; and I would of choice now stand as at the bar of posterity, "cum semel occidaris, et de ultima Minos fecerit arbitria". The only exact testimony of a man is his actions, leaving the reader to pronounce on them his own judgment. In anticipating this, too little is safer than too much; and I sincerely assure you that you will please me most by a rigorous suppression of all friendly partialities. This candid expression of sentiments once delivered, passive silence becomes the future duty.—To L. H. GIRARDIN. vi, 455. (M., 1815.)

4100. ——. Of the public transactions in which I have borne a part, I have kept no narrative with a view of history. A life of constant action leaves no time for recording. Always thinking of what is next to be done, what has been done is dismissed, and soon obliterated from the memory.—To MR. SPAFFORD. vii, 118. (M., 1819.) See HISTORY.

4101. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Lawyer.—In 1767, Mr. [George] Wythe led me into the practice of the law at the bar of the General Court, at which I continued until the Revolution shut up the courts of justice.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 3. FORD ED., i, 4. (1821.) See WYTHE (GEORGE).

4103. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Marriage.—On the 1st of January, 1772, I was married to Martha Skelton, widow of Bathurst Skelton, and daughter of John Wayles, then twenty-three years old. Mr. Wayles was a lawyer of much practice, to which he was introduced more by his great industry, punctuality and practical readiness than by eminence in the science of his profession. He was a most agreeable companion, full of pleasantry and good humor, and welcomed in every society. He acquired a handsome fortune, and died in May, 1773, leaving three daughters: the portion which came on that event to Mrs. Jefferson, after the debts should be paid, which were very considerable, was about equal to my own patrimony, and consequently doubled the ease of our circumstances.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 4. FORD ED., i, 5. (1821.)

4104. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Mrs. Jefferson's death.—Your letter found me a little emerging from the stupor of mind which had rendered me as dead to the world as she whose loss occasioned it. * * * Before that event my scheme of life had been determined. I had folded myself in the arms of retirement, and rested all prospects of future happiness on domestic and literary objects. A single event wiped away all my plans and left me a blank which I had not the spirits to fill up. In this state of mind an appointment from Congress [mission to France] found me, requiring me to cross the Atlantic.—To CHEVALIER DE CHASTELLUX. i, 322. FORD ED., iii, 64. (A., Nov. 1782.)

4105. JEFFERSON (Thomas), A Nail-maker.—In our private pursuits it is a great advantage that every honest employment is deemed honorable. I am myself a nail-maker. On returning home after an absence of ten years, I found my farms so much deranged that I saw evidently they would be a burden to me instead of a support till I could regenerate them; and, consequently, that it was necessary for me to find some other resource in the meantime. I thought for a while of taking up the manufacture of potash, which requires but small advances of money. I concluded at length, however, to begin a manufacture of nails, which needs little or no capital, and (I now employ a dozen little boys from ten to sixteen years of age, overlooking all the details of their business myself, and drawing from it a profit on which I can get along till I can put my farms into a course of yielding profit. My new trade of nail-making is to me in this country what an additional title of nobility or the ensigns of a new order are in Europe.—To M. DE MEUNIER. FORD ED., vii, 14. (M., 1795.)

4106. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Offices held by.—In 1769, I became a member of the [Virginia] Legislature by the choice of the county [Albemarle] in which I live, and continued in that until it was closed by the Revolution.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 3. FORD ED., i, 5. (1821.)

4108. ——. Soon after my leaving Congress, in September, '76, to wit, on the last day of that month*, I had been appointed, with Dr. Franklin, to go to France, as a Commissioner, to negotiate treaties of alliance and commerce with that government. Silas Deane, then in France, acting as agent for procuring military stores, was joined with us in commission. But such was the state of my family that I could not leave it, nor could I expose it to the dangers of the sea, and of capture by the British ships, then covering the ocean. I saw, too, that the laboring oar was really at home, where much was to be done of the most permanent interest, in new modelling our governments, and much to defend our fanes and firesides from the desolations of an invading enemy, pressing on our country in every point. I declined, therefore, and Dr. Lee was appointed in my place.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 51. FORD ED., i, 70. (1812.)

4109. ——. On the 1st of June, 1779, I was appointed Governor of the Commonwealth, and retired from the Legislature.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 50. FORD ED., i, 69. (1821.)

4110. ——. On the 15th of June,* 1781, I had been appointed, with Mr. Adams, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Jay, and Mr. Laurens, a Minister Plenipotentiary for negotiating peace, then expected to be effected through the mediation of the Empress of Russia. The same reasons obliged me still to decline; and the negotiation was in fact never entered on.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 51. FORD ED., i, 71. (1821.)

4111. ——. In the autumn of * * * 1782, Congress receiving assurances that a general peace would be concluded in the winter and spring, they renewed my appointment on the 13th of November of that year. I had, two months before that, lost the cherished companion of my life, in whose affections, unabated on both sides, I had lived the last ten years in unchequered happiness. With the public interests, the state of my mind concurred in recommending the change of scene proposed; and I accepted the appointment, and left Monticello on the 19th of December, 1782, for Philadelphia, where I arrived on the 27th. The Minister of France, Luzerne, offered me a passage in the Romulus frigate, which I accepted; but she was then a few miles below Baltimore, blocked up in the ice. I remained, therefore, a month in Philadelphia, looking over the papers in the office of State, in order to possess myself of the general state of our foreign relations, and then went to Baltimore, to await the liberation of the frigate from the ice. After waiting there nearly a month, we received information that a Provisional Treaty of Peace had been signed by our Commissioners on the 3d of September, 1782, to become absolute on the conclusion of peace between France and Great Britain. Considering my proceeding to Europe as now of no utility to the public, I returned immediately to Philadelphia, to take the orders of Congress, and was excused by them from further proceeding. I, therefore, returned home, where I arrived on the 15th of May, 1783.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 51. FORD ED., i, 71. (1821.)

4112. ——. On the 6th of June, 1783, I was appointed by the [Virginia] Legislature a Delegate to Congress, the appointment to take place on the 1st of November ensuing, when that of the existing delegation would expire. I, accordingly, left home on the 16th of October, arrived at Trenton, where Congress was sitting, on the 3d of November, and took my seat on the 4th, on which day

Congress adjourned, to meet at Annapolis on the 26th.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 52. FORD ED., i, 72. (1821.)

4113. ——. In July, 1785, Dr. Franklin returned to America, and I was appointed his successor at Paris.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 63. FORD ED., i, 88. (1821.)

4114. ——. On the 14th of May, (1785) I communicated to the Count de Vergennes my appointment as Minister Plenipotentiary * * * on the 17th delivered my letter of credence to the King at a private audience, and went through the other ceremonies usual on such occasions.—To JOHN JAY. i, 344. (P., 1785.)

4115. ——. I had been more than a year soliciting leave to go home, with a view to place my daughters in the society and care of their friends, and to return for a short time to my station in Paris. But the metamorphosis through which our government was then passing from its chrysalid to its organic form suspended its action in a great degree; and it was not till the last of August, 1789, that I received the permission I had asked. * * * On the 26th of September, I left Paris for Havre, where I was detained by contrary winds until the 8th of October. On that day, and the 9th, I crossed over to Cowes, where I had engaged the Clermont, Capt. Colley, to touch for me. She did so, but here again we were detained by contrary winds, until the 22nd, when we embarked, and landed at Norfolk on the 23rd of November. On my way home, I passed some days at Eppington, in Chesterfield, the residence of my friend and connection, Mr. Eppes, and while there, I received a letter from the President, General Washington, by express, covering an appointment to be Secretary of State.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 107. FORD ED., i, 148. (1821.)

4116. ——. I received it [appointment as Secretary of State] with real regret. My wish had been to return to Paris, where I had left my household establishment, as if there myself, and to see the end of the Revolution, which I then thought would be certainly and happily closed in less than a year. I then meant to return home, to withdraw from political life, into which I had been impressed by the circumstances of the times, to sink into the bosom of my family and friends, and devote myself to studies more congenial to my mind. In my answer of December 15th, I expressed these dispositions candidly to the President, and my preference of a return to Paris; but assured him that if it was believed I could be more useful in the administration of the government, I would sacrifice my own inclinations, without hesitation and repair to that destination; this I left to his decision. I arrived at Monticello on the 23rd of December, where I received a second letter from the President, expressing his continued wish that I should take my station there, but leaving me still at liberty to continue in my former office, if I could not reconcile myself to that now proposed. lenced my reluctance, and I accepted the new appointment.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 108. FORD ED., i, 149. (1821.)

4117. ——. The President [Washington] observed, that though I had unfixed the day on which I had intended to resign, yet I appeared fixed in doing it at no great distance of time; that in this case,* he could not but wish that I would go to Paris; that the moment was important; I possessed the confidence of both sides, and might do great good; that he wished I could do it, were it only to stay there a year or two. I told him that my mind was so bent on retirement that I could not think of launching forth again in a new business; that I could never again cross the Atlantic; and that as to the opportunity of doing good, this was likely to be the scene of action, as Genet was bringing powers to do the business here; but that I could not think of going abroad. He replied that I had pressed him to remain in the public service, and refused to do the same myself. I said the case was very different; he united the confidence of all America, and was the only person who did so; his services, therefore, were of the last importance; but for myself, my going out would not be noted or known. A thousand others could supply my place to equal advantage, therefore I felt myself free.—THE ANAS. ix, 133. FORD ED., i, 217. (Feb. 20, 1793.)

4118. ——. [President Washington] returned to the difficulty of naming my successor. * * * He said if I would only stay in till the end of another quarter (the last of December) it would get us through the difficulties of this year, and he was satisfied that the affairs of Europe would be settled with this campaign; for that either France would be overwhelmed by it, or the confederacy would give up the contest. By that time, too, Congress would have manifested its character and view. I told him that I had set my private affairs in motion in a line which had powerfully called for my presence the last spring, and that they had suffered immensely from my not going home; that I had now calculated them to my return in the fall, and to fail in going then, would be the loss of another year, and prejudicial beyond measure. * * * He asked me whether I could not arrange my affairs by going home. I told him I did not think the public business would admit of it; that there never was a day now in which the absence of the Secretary of State would not be inconvenient to the public. And he concluded by desiring that I would take two or three days to consider whether I could not stay in till the end of another quarter, for that like a man going to the gallows, he was willing to put it off as long as he could; but if I persisted, he must then look about him and make up his mind to do the best he could.—

* The French government was then complaining of the unfriendliness of Gouverneur Morris, and Washington deemed a change of ministers advisable.—EDITOR.

4119. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Offices refused.—No circumstances will ever more tempt me to engage in anything public. I thought myself perfectly fixed in this determination when I left Philadelphia, but every day and hour since has added to its inflexibility. It is a great pleasure to me to retain the esteem and approbation of the President, and this forms the only ground of any reluctance at being unable to comply with every wish of his.*—TO EDMUND RANDOLPH. iv, 108. FORD ED., vi, 512. (M., Sep. 1794.)

4120. ——. President [John] Adams said he was glad to find me alone, for that he wished a free conversation with me. He entered immediately on an explanation of the situation of our affairs in France, and the danger of rupture with that nation, a rupture which would convulse the attachments of this country; that he was impressed with the necessity of an immediate mission to the Directory; that it would have been the first wish of his heart to have got me to go there, but that he supposed it was out of the question, as it did not seem justifiable for him to send away the person destined to take his place in case of accident to himself, nor decent to remove from competition one who was a rival in the public favor. * * * I told him I concurred in the opinion of the impropriety of my leaving the post assigned me, and that my inclinations, moreover, would never permit me to cross the Atlantic again.—THE ANAS. ix, 185. FORD ED., i, 272. (March 2, 1797.)

4121. ——. You wish to see me again in the Legislature, but this is impossible; my mind is now so dissolved in tranquillity, that it can never again encounter a contentious assembly. The habits of thinking and speaking off-hand, after a disuse of five and twenty years, have given place to the slower process of the pen.—TO JOHN TYLER. v, 525. FORD ED., ix, 277. 4122. ——. The assurance * * * that my aid in the councils of our government would increase the public confidence in them; because it admits an inference that they have approved of the course pursued, when I heretofore bore a part in those councils. * * * But I am past service. The hand of age is upon me. The debility of bodily faculties apprizes me that those of the mind cannot be unimpaired, had I not still better proofs.—TO WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 79. FORD ED., ix, 367. (M., Oct. 1812.)

4123. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Paine and.—A writer, under the name of "Publicola" [John Quincy Adams], in attacking all [Thomas] Paine's [political] principles, is very desirous of involving me in the same censure with the author. 4126. ——. I am duly sensible of the honor done me by the first class of the Royal Institute of Sciences, of Literature, and of Fine Arts [Holland], in associating me to their class, and by the approbation which his Majesty, the King of Holland, has condescended to give to their choice.—To G. 4128. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Services of.—I have sometimes asked myself, whether my country is the better for my having lived at all? I do not know that it is. I have been the instrument of doing the following things; but they would have been done by others; some of them, perhaps, a little better:

The Rivanna had never been used for navigation; scarcely an empty canoe had ever passed down it. Soon after I came of age, I examined its obstructions, set on foot a subscription for removing them, got an act of Assembly passed, and the thing effected, so

The Declaration of Independence.

I proposed the demolition of the Church Establishment, and the Freedom of Religion. It could only be done by degrees; to wit, the Act of 1776, c. 2, exempted dissenters from contributions to the Church, and left the Church clergy to be supported by voluntary contributions of their own sect; was continued from year to year, and made perpetual 1779, c. 36. I prepared the Act for Religious Freedom in 1777, as part of the Revisal, which was not reported to the Assembly till 1779, and that particular law not passed till 1785, and then by the efforts of Mr. Madison.

The Act putting an end to Entails.

The Act prohibiting the Importation of Slaves.

The Act concerning Citizens and establishing the natural right of man to expatriate himself, at will.

The Act changing the course of Descents, and giving the inheritance to all the children, &c., equally, I drew as part of the Revisal.

The Act for Apportioning Crimes and Punishments, part of the same work, I drew. When proposed to the Legislature, by Mr. Madison, in 1785, it failed by a single vote. G. K. Taylor afterwards, in 1796, proposed the same subject; avoiding the adoption of any part of the diction of mine, the text of which had been studiously drawn in the technical terms of the law, so as to give no occasion for new questions by new expressions. When I drew mine, public labor was thought the best punishment to be substituted for death. But, while I was in France, I heard of a society in England, who had successfully introduced solitary confinement, and saw the drawing of a prison at Lyons, in France, formed on the idea of solitary confinement. And, being applied to by the Governor of Virginia for the plan of a Capitol and Prison, I sent him the Lyons plan, accompanying it with a drawing on a smaller scale, betted adapted to our use. This was in June, 1786. Mr. Taylor very judiciously adopted this idea (which had now been acted on in Philadelphia, probably from the English model), and substituted labor in confinement, for the public labor proposed by the Committee of Revisal; which themselves would have done, had they been to act on the subject again. The public mind was ripe for this in 1796, when Mr. Taylor proposed it, and ripened chiefly by the experiment in Philadelphia; whereas, in 1785, when it had been proposed to our Assembly, they were not quite ripe for it.

In 1789 and 1790, I had a great number of olive plants, of the best kind, sent from Marseilles to Charleston, for South Carolina and Georgia. They were planted, and are flourishing; and, though not yet multiplied, they will be the germ of that cultivation in those States.

In 1790, I got a cask of heavy upland rice, from the river Denbigh, in Africa, about Latitude 9° 30' North, which I sent to Charleston, in hopes it might supersede the culture of the wet rice, which renders South Carolina and Georgia so pestilential through the summer. It was divided and a part sent to Georgia. I know not whether it has been attended to in South Carolina; but it has spread in the upper parts of Georgia, so as to have become almost general, and is highly prized. Perhaps it may answer in Tennessee and Kentucky. The greatest service which can be rendered any country is, to add an useful plant to its culture; especially a bread grain; next in value to bread is oil.

Whether the Act for the more General Diffusion of Knowledge will ever be carried into complete effect, I know not. It was received by the Legislature with great enthusiasm at first; and a small effort was made in 1796, by the act to establish public schools, to carry a part of it into effect, viz., that for the establishment of free English schools: but the option given to the courts has defeated the intention of the act.*—JEFFERSON PAPERS. i, 174. FORD ED., vii, 475. (1800.)

4129. ——. I came of age in 1764, and was soon put into the nomination of justice of the county in which I lived, and, at the first election following, I became one of its representatives in the Legislature. I was thence sent to the old Congress. Then employed two years with Mr. Pendleton and Mr. Wythe, on the revision and reduction to a single code of the whole body of the British Statutes, the acts of our Assembly, and certain parts of the common law. Then elected Governor. Next, to the Legislature, and to Congress again. Sent to Europe as Minister Plenipotentiary. Appointed Secretary of State to the new Government. Elected Vice-President, and President. And lastly, a Visitor and Rector of the University [of Virginia]. In these different offices, with scarcely any interval between them, I have been in the public service now sixty-one years; and during the far greater part of the time, in foreign countries or in other States. * * * If it were thought worth while to specify any particular services rendered, I would refer to the specification of them made by the [Virginia] Legislature itself in their Farewell Address,† on my retiring from the Presidency, February, 1809. There is one, however, not therein specified the most important in its consequences, of any transaction in any portion of my life; to wit, the head I personally made against the federal principles and proceedings during the Administration of Mr. Adams. Their usurpations and violations of the Constitution at that period, and their majority in both Houses of Congress, were so great, so decided, and so daring, that after combating their aggressions, inch by inch, without being able in the least to check their career, the republican leaders thought it would be best for them to give up their useless efforts there, go home, get into their respective Legislatures, embody whatever of resistance they could be formed into, and if ineffectual, to perish there as in the last ditch. All, therefore, retired leaving Mr. Gallatin alone in the House of Representatives, and myself in the Senate, where I then presided as Vice-President. Remaining at our posts, and bidding defiance to the browbeatings and insults by which they endeavored to drive us off also, we kept the mass of republicans in phalanx together, until the Legislature could be brought up to the charge; and nothing on earth is more certain, than that if myself particularly, placed by my office of Vice-President at the head of the republicans, had given way and withdrawn from my post, the republicans throughout the Union would have given up in despair, and the cause would have been lost forever. By holding on, we obtained time for the Legislature to come up with their weight; and those of Virginia and Kentucky particularly, but more especially, the former, by their celebrated resolutions, saved the Constitution at its last gasp. No person who was not a witness of the scenes of that gloomy period, can form any idea of the afflicting persecutions and personal indignities we had to brook. They saved our country, however. The spirits of the people were so much subdued and reduced to despair by the X. Y. Z. imposture, and other stratagems and machinations, that they would have sunk into apathy and monarchy, as the only form of government which could maintain itself.

If Legislative services are worth mentioning, and the stamp of liberality and equality, which was necessary to be imposed on our laws in the first crisis of our birth as a nation, was of any value, they will find that the leading and most important laws of that day were prepared by myself, and carried chiefly by my efforts; supported, indeed, by able and faithful coadjutors from the ranks of the house, very effective as seconds, but who would not have taken the field as leaders. The prohibition of the further importation of slaves was the first of these measures in time. This was followed by the abolition of entails, which broke up the hereditary and high-handed aristocracy, which, by accumulating immense masses of property in single lines of families, had divided our country into two distinct orders, of nobles and plebeians. But further to complete the equality among our citizens so essential to the maintenance of republican government, it was necessary to abolish the principle of primogeniture. I drew the law of descents, giving equal inheritance to sons and daughters, which made a part of the Revised Code. The attack on the establishment of a dominant religion was first made by myself. It could be carried at first only by a suspension of salaries for one year, by battling it again at the next session for another year, and so from year to year, until the public mind was ripened for the bill for establishing religious freedom, which I had prepared for the Revised Code also. This was at length established permanently, and by the efforts chiefly of Mr. Madison, being myself in Europe at the time that work was brought forward.

To these particular services, I think I might add the establishment of our University, as principally my work, acknowledging at the same time, as I do, the great assistance received from my able colleagues of the Visitation. But my residence in the vicinity threw, of course, on me the chief burthen of the enterprise, as well of the buildings as of the general organization and care of the whole. The effect of this institution on the future fame, fortune and prosperity of our country, can as yet be seen but at a distance. But an hundred well-educated youth, which it will turn out annually, and ere long, will fill all its offices with men of superior qualifications, and raise it from its humble state to an eminence among its associates which it has never yet known; no, not in its brightest days. That institution is now qualified to raise its youth to an order of science unequalled in any other State; and this superiority will be the greater from the free range of mind encouraged there, and the restraint imposed at other seminaries by the shackles of a domineering hierarchy, and a bigoted adhesion to ancient habits. Those now on the theatre of affairs will enjoy the ineffable happiness of seeing themselves succeeded by sons of a grade of science beyond their own ken. Our sister States will also be repairing to the same fountains of instruction, will bring hither their genius to be kindled at our fire, and will carry back the fraternal affections which, nourished by the same Alma Mater, will knit us to them by the indissoluble bonds of early personal friendships. The good Old Dominion, the blessed mother of us all, will then raise her head with pride among the nations, will present to them that splendor of genius which she has ever possessed, but has too long suffered to rest uncultivated and unknown, and will become a centre of ralliance to the States whose youth she has instructed, and, as it were, adopted. I claim some share in the merits of this great work of regeneration. My whole labors, now for many years, have been devoted to it, and I stand pledged to follow it up through the remnant of life remaining to me. And what remuneration do I ask? Money from the treasury? Not a cent. I ask nothing from the earnings or labors of my fellow citizens. I wish no man's comforts to be abridged for the enlargement of mine. For the services rendered on all occasions, I have been always paid to my full satisfaction. I never wished a dollar more than what the law had fixed on. My request is, only to be permitted to sell my own property freely to pay my own debts. To sell it, I say, and not to sacrifice it, not to have it gobbled up by speculators to make fortunes for themselves, leaving unpaid those who have trusted to my good faith, and myself without resource, in the last and most eventful stage of life. If permitted to sell it in a way which will bring me a fair price, all will be honestly and honorably paid, and a competence left for myself, and for those who look to me for subsistence. To sell it in a way which will offend no moral principle, and expose none to risk but the willing, and those wishing to be permitted to take the chance of gain. To give me, in short, that permission which you often allow to others for purposes not more moral.*—THOUGHTS ON LOTTERIES. ix, 506. FORD ED., x, 368. (M., 1826.)

4130. JEFFERSON (Thomas), University of Virginia and.—Against this tedium vite, I am fortunately mounted on a hobby, which, indeed, I should have better managed some thirty or forty years ago; but whose easy amble is still sufficient to give exercise and amusement to an octogenary rider. This is the establishment of a University.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 313. FORD ED., x, 272. (M., 1823.) See UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

—JEFFERSON (Thomas), Views on religion.—See RELIGION.

4131. JEFFERSON (Thomas), Weary of office.—The motion of my blood no longer keeps time with the tumult of the world. It leads me to seek for happiness in the lap and love of my family, in the society of my neighbors and my books, in the wholesome occupations of my farm and my affairs. In an interest or affection in every bud that opens, in every breath that blows around me, in an entire freedom of rest, of motion, of thought. owing account to myself alone of my hours and actions. What must be the principle of that calculation which should balance against these the circumstances of my present existence [Secretaryship of State], worn down with labors from morning to night, and day to day; knowing them as fruitless to others as they are vexatious to myself; committed singly in desperate and eternal contest against a host who are systematically undermining the public liberty and prosperity; even the rare hours of relaxation sacrificed to the society of persons in the same intentions, of whose hatred I am conscious even in those moments of conviviality when the heart wishes most to open itself to the effusions of friendship and confidence; cut off from my family and friends, my affairs abandoned to chaos and derangement; in short, giving everything I love in exchange for everything I hate, and all this without a single gratification in possession or prospect, in present enjoyment or future wish.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 578. FORD ED., vi, 291. (June 1793.)

4132. JOHNSON (Joshua), Consul at London.—The President of the United States, desirous of availing his country of the talents of its best citizens, in their respective lines, has thought proper to nominate you consul for the

* Jefferson wrote the paper of which the foregoing is an extract in February, 1826, less than five months before his death. Oppressed by age and harassed by debt, he asked the Legislature of Virginia to pass a law enabling him to dispose of his property by a lottery. The act was passed.—EDITOR.

United States at the port of London. The extent of our commercial and political connections with that country marks the importance of the trust he confides to you, and the more, as we have no diplomatic character at that court.—To JOSHUA JOHNSON. iii, 176. (N.Y., 1790.)

4133. JONES (John Paul), Disinterestedness.—Captain John Paul Jones refuses to accept any indemnification for his expenses [connected with Peyrouse's expedition], which is an additional proof of his disinterested spirit, and of his devotion to the service of America.—To JOHN JAY. i, 454. (P., 1785.)

4134. JONES (John Paul), Justice for.—Nobody can wish more that justice be done you, nor is more ready to be instrumental in doing whatever may insure it.—To COMMODORE JONES. i, 594. (P., 1786.)

4135. JONES (John Paul), Mission to Algiers.—The President having thought proper to appoint you commissioner for treating with the Dey and government of Algiers, on the subjects of peace and ransom of our captives, I have the honor to enclose you the commission, of which Mr. Thomas Pinckney, now on his way to London as our Minister Plenipotentiary there, will be the bearer. Supposing that there exists a disposition to thwart our negotiations with the Algerines, and that this would be very practicable, we have thought it advisable that the knowledge of this appointment should rest with the President, Mr. Pinckney and myself; for which reason you will perceive that the commissions are all in my own handwriting. For the same reason, entire secrecy is recommended to you, and that you so cover from the public your departure and destination, as that they may not be conjectured or noticed.—To JOHN PAUL JONES. iii, 431. (Pa., June 1792.)

4136. JONES (John Paul), Newspaper attacks.—What the English newspapers said of remonstrances against Paul Jones being received into the service, as far as I can learn from those who would have known it, and would have told it to me, was false, as is everything those papers say, ever did say, and ever will say.—To MR. CUTTING. ii, 437. (P., 1788.)

4137. JONES (John Paul), Prize money.—I consider Captain Jones as agent from the citizens of the United States, interested in the prizes taken in Europe under his command, and that he is properly authorized to receive the money due to them, having given good security to transmit it to the treasury office of the United States, whence it will be distributed, under the care of Congress, to the officers and crews originally entitled, or to their representatives.—To M. DE CASTRIES. i, 361. (P., 1785.)

4138. — — — I have had the honor of enclosing to Mr. Jay. Commodore Jones's receipts for one hundred and eighty-one thousand and thirty-nine livres, one sol and ten deniers, prize money, which (after deducting his own proportion) he is to remit to you, for the officers and soldiers who were under his command. I take the liberty of suggesting whether the expense and risk of double remittances might not be saved, by ordering it into the hands of Mr. Grand, immediately, for the purposes of the Treasury in Europe, while you could make provision at home for the officers and soldiers, whose demands will come in so slowly, as to leave the use of a great proportion of this money for a considerable time, and some of it forever. We could, then, immediately quiet the French officers.—To THE TREASURY COMMISSIONERS. i, 522. (P., 1786.)

4139. JONES (John Paul), Russian services.—The war between the Russians and the Turks has made an opening for our Commodore Paul Jones. The Empress has invited him into her service. She insures to him the rank of rear admiral; will give him a separate command, and, it is understood, that he is never to be commanded. I think she means to oppose him to the Captain Pacha, on the Black Sea. * * * He has made it a condition, that he shall be free at all times to return to the orders of Congress, * * * and also, that he shall not in any case be expected to bear arms against France. I believe Congress had it in contemplation to give him the grade of admiral, from the date of his taking the Serapis. Such a measure would now greatly gratify him, second the efforts of fortune in his favor, and better the opportunity of improving him for our service, whenever the moment may come in which we shall want him.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 372. (1788.)

4140. — — — Paul Jones is invited into the service of the Empress [of Russia], with the rank of rear admiral, and to have a separate command. I wish it corresponded with the views of Congress to give him that rank from the taking of the Serapis. I look to this officer as our great future dependence on the sea, where alone we should think of ever having a force. He is young enough to see the day when we shall be more populous than the whole British dominions, and able to fight them ship to ship. We should procure him, then, every possible opportunity of acquiring experience.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 405. FORD ED., v, 22. (P., 1788.)

4141. — — — You have heard of the great victory [in the Black Sea] obtained by the Russians under command of Admiral Paul Jones, over the Turks commanded by the Captain Pacha.—To M. LIMOZIN. ii, 443. (P., 1788.)

4142. — — — I am pleased with the promotion of our countryman, Paul Jones. He commanded the right wing, in the first engagement between the Russian and Turkish galleys; his absence from the second proves his superiority over the Captain Pacha, as he did not choose to bring his ships into the shoals in which the Pacha ventured, and lost those entrusted to him. I consider this officer as the principal hope of our future efforts on the ocean.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 466. (P., 1788.)

4143. — — — I understand, in a general way, that some persecution on the part of his officers occasioned his being recalled to St. Petersburg, and that though protected against them by the Empress, he is not yet restored to his station.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 101. FORD ED., v, 113. (P., 1789.)

4144. JONES (John Paul), St. Anne Decoration.—In answer to your request to obtain and transmit the proper authority of the United States for your retaining the Order of St. Anne, conferred on you by the Empress [of Russia]. The Executive are not authorized either to grant or refuse the permission you ask, and consequently cannot take on themselves to do it. Whether the Legislature would undertake to do it or not, I cannot say. In general, there is an aversion to meddle with anything of that kind here. And the event would be so doubtful that the Executive would not commit themselves by making the proposition to the Legislature.—To ADMIRAL PAUL JONES. iii, 294. (Pa., 1791.)

4146. ———. He is a restless ambitious character, aiming at everything, persevering in nothing, taking up designs without calculating the force which will be opposed to him, and dropping them on the appearance of a firm opposition. He has some just views and much activity.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 400. (P., 1785.)

4147. JOSEPH II., Capricious.—The enterprising, unpersevering, capricious, thrasonic character of their sovereign renders it probable he will avail himself of this little condescendence in the Brabantines to recede from all his innovations.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. ii, 212. (P., 1787.)

4148. JOSEPH II., Eccentric.—The public acts of the Emperor speak him much above the common level. Those who expect peace say that they have in view the Emperor's character which they represent as whimsical and eccentric, and that he is especially affected in the dog days.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 21. (P., Dec. 1784.)

4149. JOSEPH II., Foreign complications.—The league formed by the King of Prussia against the Emperor [of Austria] is a most formidable obstacle to his ambitious designs. It certainly has defeated his views on Bavaria, and will render doubtful the election of his nephew to be King of the Romans. Matters are not yet settled between him and the Turk. In truth, he undertakes too much. At home he has made some good regulations.—To R. IZARD. i, 442. (P., 1785.)

4150. JOSEPH II., Innovations.—Weighing the fondness of the Emperor for innovation, against his want of perseverance, it is difficult to calculate what he will do with his discontented subjects in Brabant and Flanders. If those provinces alone were concerned he would probably give them back; but this would induce an opposition to his plan in all his other dominions.—JOHN JAY. ii, 158. (P., 1787.)

4151. ———. The Emperor's reformations have occasioned the appearance of insurrection in Flanders, and he, according to character, will probably tread back his steps.—To J. BANNISTER, JR. ii, 150. (P., 1787.)

4152. JOSEPH II., And Holland.—The Emperor [of Austria] seems to prefer the glory of terror to that of justice; and, to satisfy this tinsel passion, plants a dagger in the heart of every Dutchman which no time will extract.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 358. FORD ED., iv, 64. (1785.)

4153. JOSEPH II., Unprincipled.—The Emperor has a head too combustible to be quiet. He is an eccentric character, all enterprise, all action, without principle, without feelings. Ambitious in the extreme but too unsteady to surmount difficulties. He had in view at one time to open the Scheldt, to get Maastricht from the Dutch, to take a large district from the Turks, to exchange some of his Austrian dominions for Bavaria, to create a ninth electorate, to make his nephew King of the Romans, and to change totally the constitution of Hungary. Any one of these was as much as a wise prince would have undertaken at any one time. To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 44. (P., 1785.)

4155. JUDGES, Biased.—It is better to toss up cross and pile in a cause, than to refer it to a judge whose mind is warped by any motive whatever, in that particular case.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 372. FORD ED., iii, 236. (1782.)

4156. ———. We all know that permanent judges acquire an esprit de corps; that being known, they are liable to be tempted by bribery; that they are misled by favor, by relationship, by a spirit of party, by a devotion to the Executive or Legislative power; that it is better to leave a cause to the decision of cross and pile, than to that of a judge biased to one side.—To M. L'ABBÉ ARNOND. iii, 81. FORD ED., v, 103. (P., 1789.)

4157. ———. As, for the safety of society, we commit honest maniacs to Bedlam, so judges should be withdrawn from their bench, whose erroneous biases are leading us to dissolution. It may, indeed, injure them in fame or in fortune; but it saves the Republic, which is the first and supreme law.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 114. (1821.)

4158. JUDGES, Compensation.—Their salaries [should be] ascertained and established by law.—To GEORGE WYTHE. FORD ED., ii, 60. (1776.)

4159. JUDGES, Election.—I hope to see the time when the election of judges of the Supreme Courts [of Virginia] shall be restrained to the bars of the General Court and High Court of Chancery.—To GEORGE WYTHE. i, 212. FORD ED., ii, 167. (F., 1779.)

4160. JUDGES, Executive and.—I was against writing letters to judiciary officers. I thought them independent of the Executive, not subject to its coercion, and therefore not obliged to attend to its admonitions.—ANAS. ix, 175. FORD ED., i, 265. (1793.)

4161. JUDGES, Fallibility of.—When a cause has been adjudged according to the rules and forms of the country, its justice ought to be presumed. Even error in the highest court which has been provided as the last means of correcting the errors of others, and whose decrees are, therefore, subject to no further revisal, is one of those inconveniences flowing from the imperfection of our faculties, to which every society must submit; because there must be somewhere a last resort, wherein contestations may end. Multiply bodies of revisal as you please, their number must still be finite, and they must finish in the hands of fallible men as judges.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 415. FORD ED., vi, 56. (Pa., 1792.)

4162. JUDGES, George III. and.—He has made our* judges dependent on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4163. JUDGES, Impeachment of.—Our different States have differently modified their several judiciaries as to the tenure of office. Some appoint their judges for a given term of time; some continue them during good behavior, and that to be determined on by the concurring vote of two-thirds of each legislative house. In England they are removable by a majority only of each house. The last is a practicable remedy; the second is not. The combination of the friends and associates of the accused, the action of personal and party passions, and the sympathies of the human heart, will forever find means of influencing one-third of either the one or the other house, will thus secure their impunity, and establish them in fact for life. The first remedy is the better, that of appointing for a term of years only, with a capacity of reappointment if their conduct has been approved.—To A. CORAY. vii, 321. (M., 1823.)

4164. JUDGES, Independent.—The judges should not be dependent upon any man, or body of men.—To GEORGE WYTHE. FORD ED., ii, 60. (1776.)

4165. JUDGES, Interested.—It is not enough that honest men are appointed judges. All know the influence of interest on the mind of man, and how unconsciously his judgment is warped by that influence. To this bias add that of the esprit de corps, of their peculiar maxim and creed, that "it is the office of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction", and the absence of responsibility, and how can we expect impartial decision between the General Government, of which they are themselves so eminent a part, and an individual State, from which they have nothing to hope or fear?—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 81. FORD ED., i, 112. (1821.)

4166. JUDGES, Life tenure.—The judges should hold estates for life in their offices, or, in other words, their commissions should be made during good behavior.—To GEORGE WYTHE. FORD ED., ii, 60. (1776.)

4167. JUDGES, Power of.—Whatever of the enumerated objects [in the Constitution] is to be done by a judicial sentence, the judges may pass the sentence.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 506. FORD ED., viii, 248. (M., 1803.)

* Congress struck out "our".—EDITOR.

4168. — — — We have seen, too, that, contrary to all correct example, the judges are in the habit of going out of the question before them, to throw an anchor ahead, and grapple further hold for future advances of power.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 113. (1821.)

4169. JUDGES, Prejudices of old.—Knowing that religion does not furnish grosser bigots than law, I expect little from old judges. Those now at the bar may be bold enough to follow reason further than precedent, and may bring that principle on the bench when promoted to it; but I fear this effort is not for my day.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 532. (M., 1810.)

4170. JUDGES, Qualifications.—The judges should always be men of learning and experience in the laws, of exemplary morals, great patience, calmness and attention; their minds should not be distracted with jarring interests.—To GEORGE WYTHE. FORD ED., ii, 59. (1776.)

4171. JUDGES, Seats in State Senate.—The judges of the General Court and of the High Court of Chancery [of Virginia] shall have session and deliberative voice, but not suffrage, in the House of Senators.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 16. (June 1776.)

4172. JUDGES, Superfluous.—By a fraudulent use of the Constitution, which has made judges irremovable, the [federalists] have multiplied useless judges merely to strengthen their phalanx.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 425. (W., 1801.)

4173. — — — I should greatly prefer * * * four judges to any greater number. Great lawyers are not over abundant, and the multiplication of judges only enables the weak to out-vote the wise, and three concurrent opinions out of four give a strong presumption of right.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 278. FORD ED., x, 249. (M., 1823.)

4174. JUDGES, Usurpation by.—One single object, if your provision [in the Louisiana Code] attains it, will entitle you to the endless gratitude of society; that of restraining judges from usurping legislation. And with no body of men is this restraint more wanting than with the judges of what is commonly called our General Government, but what I call our Foreign Department.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 403. (M., 1825.)

4175. JUDGES, Venality of French.—Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review * * * the venality of the judges and their partialities to the rich.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

4176. JUDGMENT, Errors of.—I fear not that any motives of interest may lead me astray; I am sensible of no passion which could seduce me knowingly from the path of justice; but the weaknesses of human nature, and the limits of my own understanding, will produce errors of judgment sometimes injurious to your interests. I shall need, therefore, all the indulgence which I have heretofore experienced.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 45. FORD ED., viii, 347. (1805.)

4177. JUDGMENT, Warped.—All know the influence of interest on the mind of man, and how unconsciously his judgment is warped by that influence.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 81. FORD ED., i, 112. (1821.)

4178. JUDICIARY (Federal), Centralization and.—We already see the power, installed for life, responsible to no authority (for impeachment is not even a scare-crow), advancing with a noiseless and steady pace to the great object of consolidation. The foundations are already deeply laid by their decisions, for the annihilation of constitutional State rights, and the removal of every check, every counterpoise to the ingulphing power of which themselves are to make a sovereign part. * * * Let the future appointments of judges be for four or six years, and removable by the President and Senate. This will bring their conduct, at regular periods, under revision and probation, and may keep them in equipoise between the general and special governments. We have erred in this point, by copying England, where certainly it is a good thing to have the judges independent of the King. But we have omitted to copy their caution also, which makes a judge removable on the address of both legislative houses. That there should be public functionaries independent of the nation, whatever may be their merit, is a solecism in a republic, of the first order of absurdity and inconsistency.—To WM. T. BARRY. vii, 256. (M., 1822.) See CENTRALIZATION.

4179. JUDICIARY (Federal), Coercion of.—In the General Government, * * * the Judiciary is independent of the nation, their coercion by impeachment being found nugatory.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 607. FORD ED., x, 30. (M., 1816.)

4180. JUDICIARY (Federal), Confidence in.—The Judiciary, if rendered independent, and kept strictly to their own department, merits great confidence for their learning and integrity.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 3. FORD ED., v, 81. (P., 1789.)

4181. JUDICIARY (Federal), Control over.—The Judiciary [branch of the Government] possessing the rights of self-government from nature, cannot be controlled in the exercise of them but by a law, passed in the forms of the Constitution.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 499. FORD ED., v, 209. (1790.)

JUDICIARY (Federal), Curbing.
: a * * * difficult task in curbing the Judiciary in their enterprises on the Constitution. I doubt whether the erection of the Senate into an appellate court on constitutional questions would be deemed an unexceptionable reliance; because it would enable the Judiciary, with the representatives in Senate of one-third only of our citizens, and that in a single house, to make by construction what they should please of the Constitution, and thus bind in a double knot the other two-thirds; for I believe that one-third of our citizens choose a majority of the Senate, and these, too, of the smaller States whose interests lead to lessen State influence, and strengthen that of the General Government. A better remedy I think, and indeed the best I can devise would be to give future commissions to judges for six years (the senatorial term) with a reappointability by the President with the approbation of both houses. That of the House of Representatives imports a majority of citizens, that of the Senate a majority of States, and that of both a majority of the three sovereign departments of the existing government, to wit, of its Executive and Legislative branches. If this would not be independence enough, I know not what would be such, short of the total irresponsibility under which we are acting and sinning now. The independence of the judges in England on the King alone is good; but even there they are not independent on the Parliament, being removable on the joint address of both houses, by a vote of a majority of each, but we require a majority of one house and two-thirds of the other, a concurrence which, in practice, has been and ever will be found impossible; for the judiciary perversions of the Constitution will forever be protected under the pretext of errors of judgment, which by principle are exempt from punishment. Impeachment, therefore, is a bugbear which they fear not at all. But they would be under some awe of the canvass of their conduct which would be open to both houses regularly every sixth year. It is a misnomer to call a government republican, in which a branch of the supreme power is independent of the nation. By this change of tenure a remedy would be held up to the States, which, although very distant, would probably keep them quiet. In aid of this a more immediate effect would be produced by a joint protestation of both houses of Congress, that the doctrines of the judges in the case of Cohens, adjudging a State amenable to their tribunal, and that Congress can authorize a corporation of the District of Columbia to pass any act which shall have the force of law within a State, are contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. This would be effectual; as with such an avowal of Congress, no State would permit such a sentence to be carried into execution within its limits. If, by the distribution of the sovereign powers among three branches, they were intended to be checks on one another, the present case calls loudly for the exercise of that duty, and such a counter declaration, while proper in form.

would be most salutary as a precedent.—To JAMES PLEASANTS. FORD ED., x, 198. (M., Dec. 1821.)

4183. ——. There was another amendment [to the Federal Constitution] of which none of us thought at the time [when the Constitution was framed], and in the omission of which lurks the germ that is to destroy this happy combination of national powers in the General Government for matters of national concern, and independent powers in the States, for what concerns the States severally. In England, it was a great point gained at the Revolution, that the commissions of the judges, which had hitherto been during pleasure, should thenceforth be made during good behavior. A Judiciary, dependent on the will of the king, had proved itself the most oppressive of all tools in the hands of that magistrate. Nothing then could be more salutary than a change there to the tenure of good behavior; and the question of good behavior, left to the vote of a simple majority in the two Houses of Parliament. Before the Revolution we were all good English Whigs, cordial in their free principles, and in their jealousies of their Executive Magistrate. These jealousies are very apparent in all our State constitutions; and, in the General Government in this instance, we have gone even beyond the English caution, by requiring a vote of two-thirds in one of the houses, for removing a Judge; a vote so impossible, where* any defence is made, before men of ordinary prejudices and passions, that our judges are effectually independent of the nation. But this ought not to be. I would not, indeed, make them dependent on the Executive authority, as they formerly were in England; but I deem it indispensable to the continuance of this Government that they should be submitted to some practical and impartial control; and that this, to be impartial, must be compounded of a mixture of State and Federal authorities.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 80. FORD ED., i, 111. (1821.)

4184. JUDICIARY (Federal), Dangerous Decisions.—At the establishment of our Constitutions, the judiciary bodies were supposed to be the most helpless and harmless members of the government. Experience, however, soon showed in what way they were to become the most dangerous; that the insufficiency of the means provided for their removal gave them a freehold and irresponsibility in office; that their decisions, seeming to concern individual suitors only, pass silent and unheeded by the public at large; that these decisions, nevertheless, become law by precedent, sapping, by little and little, the foundations of the Constitution, and working its change by construction, before any one has perceived that that invisible and helpless worm has been busily employed in consuming its substance. In truth, man is not made to be trusted for life, if secured against all liability to account.—To A. CORAY. vii, 322. (M., 1823.)

4185. JUDICIARY (Federal), Legislative, Executive and.—The dignity and stability of government in all its branches, the morals of the people, and every blessing of society, depend so much upon an upright and skillful administration of justice, that the judicial power ought to be distinct from both the legislative and executive, and independent upon both, that so it may be a check upon both, as both should be checks upon that.—To GEORGE WYTHE. FORD ED., ii, 59. (July 1776.)

4186. JUDICIARY (Federal), Sappers and miners.—The Judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a coordination of a general and special government to a general and supreme one alone. This will lay all things at their feet, and they are too well versed in English law to forget the maxim, "boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem". * * * Having found from experience, that impeachment is an impracticable thing, a mere scare-crow, they consider themselves secure for life; they skulk from responsibility to public opinion, the only remaining hold on them, under a practice first introduced into England by Lord Mansfield. An opinion is huddled up in conclave, perhaps by a majority of one, delivered as if unanimous, and with the silent acquiescence of lazy or timid associates, by a crafty chief judge, who sophisticates the law to his mind, by the turn of his own reasoning. A judiciary law was once reported by the Attorney General to Congress, requiring each judge to deliver his opinion seriatim and openly, and then to give it in writing to the clerk to be entered in the record. A judiciary independent of a king or executive alone, is a good thing; but independence of the will of the nation is a solecism, at least in a republican government.—To THOMAS RITCHIE. vii, 192. FORD ED., x, 170. (M., 1820.)

4187. ——. The judges are, in fact, the corps of sappers and miners, steadily working to undermine the independent rights of the States, and to consolidate all power in the hands of that government in which they have so important a freehold estate.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 113. (1821.)

4188. ——. This member of the Government was at first considered as the most harmless and helpless of all its organs. But it has proved that the power of declaring what the law is, ad libitum, by sapping and mining, slyly, and without alarm, the foundations of the Constitution, can do what open force would not dare to attempt.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 404. (M., 1825.)

4189. JUDICIARY (Federal), The Senate and.—The Constitution has vested the Judiciary power in the courts of justice, with

* In the impeachment of Judge Pickens of New Hampshire, a habitual and maniac drunkard, no defence was made. Had there been, the party vote of more than one-third of the Senate would have acquitted him.—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

certain exceptions in favor of the Senate.—OPINION ON THE POWERS OF THE SENATE. vii, 465. FORD ED., v, 161. (1790.)

4190. JUDICIARY (Federal), Supremacy.—The courts of justice exercise the sovereignty of this country, in judiciary matters, are supreme in these, and liable neither to control nor opposition from any other branch of the government.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 68. FORD ED., vi, 421. (Pa., Sep. 1793.) See CONSTITUTION, MARSHALL and SUPREME COURT.

4191. JUDICIARY (State), Elevate.—Render the judiciary [of the State] respectable by every means possible, to wit, firm tenure in office, competent salaries, and reduction of their numbers.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.)

4192. JURISDICTION, Foreign.—He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation * * * for protecting them [bodies of armed troops], by a mock trial, from punishment, for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these States.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4193. JURISDICTION, Unwarrantable.—We have warned them [our British brethren] from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over these our States. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here, no one of which could warrant so strange a pretension.* —DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4194. JURY (Grand), Federal Judges and.—The proceedings in the Federal court of Virginia, to overawe the communications between the people and their representatives, excite great indignation. Probably a great fermentation will be produced by it in that State. Indeed it is the common cause of the confederacy, as it is one of their courts which has taken the step. The charges of the Federal judges have for a considerable time been inviting the grand juries to become inquisitors on the freedom of speech, of writing, and of principle of their fellow citizens. Perhaps the grand juries in the other States, as well as in that of Virginia, may think it incumbent in their next presentment to enter protestations against this perversion of their institution from a legal to a political machine, and even to present those concerned in it.—To PEREGRINE FITZHUGH. FORD ED., vii, 137. (Pa., June 1797.)

4195. JURY (Trial by), Anchor of Government.—I consider trial by jury as the only

*Congress changed so as to read: "We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction * * * We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here."— anchor ever yet imagined by man, by which a government can be held to the principles of its constitution.—To THOMAS PAINE. iii, 71. (P., 1789.)

—JURY (Trial by), In Chancery Courts.—See COURTS OF CHANCERY.

4197. JURY (Trial by), Denied by parliament.—They [Parliament] have deprived us of the inestimable privilege of trial by a jury of the vicinage in cases affecting both life and property.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 468. (July 1775.)

4199. JURY (Trial by), Lack of Uniform Laws.—I do not like [in the new Federal Constitution] the omission of a bill of rights, providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for * * * trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land, and not by the law of nations. * * * It was a hard conclusion to say, because there has been no uniformity among the States as to the cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial, therefore, the more prudent States shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way that, as most of the States had judiciously preserved this palladium, those who had wandered should be brought back to it, and to have established general right instead of general wrong.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 329. FORD ED., iv, 476. (P., Dec. 1787.)

4200. JURY (Trial by), Essential principle.—Trial by juries impartially selected, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

4201. JURY (Trial by), In France.—I doubt whether France will obtain [in its proposed Constitution] the trial by jury, because they are not sensible of its value.—To DR. PRICE. ii, 557. (P., Jan. 1789.)

4202. JURY (Trial by), Fundamental right.—There are instruments for administering the government, so peculiarly trustworthy, that we should never leave the legislature at liberty to change them. The new Constitution has secured these in the executive and legislative departments; but not in the judiciary. It should have established trials by the people themselves, that is to say, by jury.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 90. (P., 1789.)

4203. JURY (Trial by), George III. and.—He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by combining with others to subject us to a foreign jurisdiction, giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation * * * for depriving us of the benefits of trial by jury.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 11. (June 1776.)

4204. — — — He has combined, with others, * * * for depriving us* of the benefits of trial by jury.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4205. JURY (Trial by), Law and fact.—The people are not qualified to judge questions of law; but they are very capable of judging questions of fact. In the form of juries, therefore, they determine all matters of fact, leaving to the permanent judges to decide the law resulting from those facts. * * * It is left to the juries, if they think permanent judges are under any bias whatever in any cause, to take on themselves to judge the law as well as the fact. They never exercise this power but when they suspect partiality in the judges; and by the exercise of this power they have been the firmest bulwarks of English liberty.—To L'ABBÉ ARNOND. iii, 81. FORD ED., v, 103. (P., 1789.)

4206. — — — If the question [before justices of the peace] relate to any point of public liberty, or if it be one of those in which the judges may be suspected of bias, the jury undertake to decide both law and fact.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 372. FORD ED., iii, 236. (1782.)

4207. — — — The people * * * being competent to judge of the facts occurring in ordinary life, have retained the functions of judges of facts, under the name of jurors.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 590. FORD ED., x, 22. (P.F., 1816.)

4208. JURY (Trial by), Medietas Linguae.—I sincerely rejoice at the acceptance of our new Constitution by nine States. It is a good canvas, on which some strokes only want retouching. What these are, I think are sufficiently manifested by the general voice from north to south which calls for a bill of rights. It seems pretty generally understood that this should go to juries * * *. In disputes between a foreigner and a native, a trial by jury may be improper. But if this exception cannot be agreed to, the remedy will be to model the jury by giving the medietas linguae, in civil as well as criminal cases.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v, 45. (P., July 1788.)

* Congress inserted after "us" the words "in many cases".—EDITOR.

4209. JURY (Trial by), Safeguard.—Trial by jury is the best of all safeguards for the person, the property, and the fame of every individual.—To M. CORAY. vii, 323. (M., 1823.)

4210. JURY (Trial by), Scope.—I like the declaration of rights as far as it goes, but I should have been for going further. For instance, the following alterations and additions would have pleased me. * * * Article 7. All facts put in issue before any judicature, shall be tried by jury, except: 1, in cases of admiralty jurisdiction, wherein a foreigner shall be interested; 2, in cases cognizable before a court-martial, concerning only the regular officers and soldiers of the United States, or members of the militia in actual service in time of war or insurrection; 3, in impeachments allowed by the Constitution.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 100. FORD ED., v, 112. (P., Aug. 1789.)

4211. JURY (Trial by), Selection of Jurors.—An officer * * * who selects judges for principles which necessarily lead to condemnation, might as well lead his culprits to the scaffold at once without the mockery of trial.—To MRS. SARAH MEASE. FORD ED., viii, 35. (W., March 1801.)

4212. — — — An officer who is entrusted by the law with the sacred duty of naming judges of life and death for his fellow citizens, and who selects them exclusively from among his political and party enemies, ought never to have in his power a second abuse of that tremendous magnitude.—To MRS. SARAH MEASE. FORD ED., viii, 35. (W., March 1801.)

4213. — — — It will be worthy your consideration whether the protection of the inestimable institution of juries has been extended to all the cases involving the security of our persons and property. Their impartial selection also being essential to their value, we ought further to consider whether that is sufficiently secured in those States where they are named by a marshal depending on Executive will, or designated by the court or by officers dependent on them.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 14. FORD ED., viii, 123. (Dec. 1801.)

4214. — — — I enclose you a petition for a reformation in the manner of appointing our juries, and a remedy against the jury of all nations. * * * I know it will require but little ingenuity to make objections to the details of its execution; but do not be discouraged by small difficulties; make it as perfect as you can at a first essay, and depend on amending its defects as they develop themselves in practice. * * * It is the only thing which can yield us a little present protection against the dominion of a faction, while circumstances are maturing for bringing and keeping the government in real union with the spirit of their constituents.—To JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 260. FORD ED., vii, 311. (M., 1798.)

4216. JURY (Trial by), Universal.—By a declaration of rights, I mean one which shall stipulate * * * trial by juries in all cases * * *.—TO A. DONALD. ii, 355. (P., 1788.)

4219. JUSTICE, Courts of.—Courts of justice, all over the world, are held by the laws to proceed according to certain forms, which the good of the suitors themselves requires they should not be permitted to depart from.—TO CHARLES HELLSTEDT. iii, 210. (Pa., 1791.)

4220. — — — No nation can answer for perfect exactitude of proceedings in all their inferior courts. It suffices to provide a supreme judicature, where all error and partiality will be ultimately corrected.—TO GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 414. FORD ED., vi, 55. (Pa., 1792.)

4221. JUSTICE, Deaf to.—They, too [the British people], have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4222. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

4223. JUSTICE, Foundation of.—I believe that justice is instinct and innate, that the moral sense is as much a part of our constitution as that of feeling, seeing, or hearing; as a wise Creator must have seen to be necessary in an animal destined to live in society; that every human mind feels pleasure in doing good to another; that the non-existence of justice is not to be inferred from the fact that the same act is deemed virtuous and right in one society which is held vicious and wrong in another; because, as the circumstances and opinions of different societies vary, so the acts which may do them right or wrong must vary also; for virtue does not consist in the act we do, but in the end it is to effect. If it is to effect the happiness of him to whom it is directed, it is virtuous, while in a society under different circumstances and opinions, the same act might produce pain, and would be vicious. The essence of virtue is in doing good to others, while what is good may be one thing in one society, and its contrary in another.—TO JOHN ADAMS. vii, 39. (M., 1816.)

4228. — — — When one undertakes to administer justice, it must be with an even hand, and by rule; what is done for one, must be done for every one in equal degree.—TO DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 507. FORD ED., viii, 264. (W., 1803.)

4229. JUSTICE, International.—We must make the interest of every nation stand surety for their justice, and their own loss to follow injury to us, as effect follows its cause.—TO EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 191. FORD ED., vii, 154. (Pa., 1797.)

4230. — — — We think that peaceable means may be devised of keeping nations in the path of justice towards us, by making justice their interest; and injuries to react on themselves.—TO MR. CABANIS. iv, 497. (W., 1803.)

4231. — — — We are firmly convinced, and we act on that conviction, that with nations, as with individuals, our interests soundly calculated, will ever be found inseparable from our moral duties; and history bears witness to the fact, that a just nation is trusted on its word, when recourse is had to armaments and wars to bridle others.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 40. 4234. JUSTICE, National and individual.—A character of justice is valuable to a nation as to an individual.—To REV. MR. WORCESTER. vi, 540. (1816.)

4235. JUSTICE, Partial.—The public security against a partial dispensation of justice depends on its being dispensed by certain rules. The slightest deviation in one circumstance becomes a precedent for another, that for a third, and so on without bounds. A relaxation in a case where it is certain no fraud is intended, is laid hold of by others, afterwards, to cover fraud.—To GEORGE JOY. iii, 130. (N.Y., 1790.)

4237. JUSTICE, Pre-Revolutionary.—Before the Revolution, a judgment could not be obtained under eight years in the Supreme Court [in Virginia] where the suit was in the department of the common law, which department embraces about nine-tenths of the subject of legal contestation. In that of the Chancery, from twelve to twenty years were requisite. This did not proceed from any vice in the laws, but from the indolence of the judges appointed by the King; and these judges holding their office during his will only, he could have reformed the evil at any time. This reformation was among the first works of the Legislature after our Independence. A judgment can now be obtained in the Supreme Court in one year at the common law, and in about three years in the Chancery.*—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix, 240. FORD ED., iv, 126. (P., 1785.)

4239. JUSTICE, Safeguard.—The provisions we have made [for our government] are such as please ourselves; they answer the substantial purposes of government and of justice, and other purposes than these should not be answered.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 479. (July 1775.)

4240. JUSTICE, Sense of.—Destutt Tracy promises a work on morals, in which I lament to see that he will adopt the principles of Hobbes, or humiliation to human nature; that the sense of justice and injustice is not derived from our natural organization, but founded on convention only. * * * Assuming the fact, that the earth has been created in time, and consequently the dogma of final causes, we yield, of course, to this short syllogism: Man was created for social intercourse; but social intercourse cannot be maintained without a sense of justice; then man must have been created with a sense of justice.—To F. 4243. JUSTICE, Views of.—All our proceedings have flowed from views of justice.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 70. FORD ED., viii, 496. (Dec. 1806.)

4244. KAMES, Writings of Lord.—Your objection to Lord Kames, that he is too metaphysical, is just, and it is the chief objection to which his writings are liable. It is to be observed, also, that though he has given us what should be the system of equity, yet it is not the one actually established, at least not in all its parts.—To PETER CARR. iii, 452. FORD ED., vi, 92. (Pa., 1792.)

4245. KENTUCKY, Asks separation.—We have transmitted a copy of a petition from the people of Kentucky to Congress praying to be separated from Virginia. Congress took no notice of it. We [delegates] sent the copy to the Governor desiring it to be laid before the Assembly. Our view was to bring on the question. It is for the interest of Virginia to cede so far immediately, because the people beyond that will separate themselves, because they will be joined by all our settlements beyond the Alleghany if they are the first movers. Whereas if we draw the line, those at Kentucky having their end, will not interest themselves for the people of Indiana, Greenbriar, &c., who will of course be left to our management, and I can with certainty almost say that Congress would approve of the meridian of the mouth of the Kanawha, and will consider it as the ultimate point to be desired from Virginia. I form this opinion from conversation with many members. Should we not be the first movers, and the Indianians and Kentuckians take themselves off and claim to the Alleghany, I am afraid Congress would secretly wish them well.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 401. (A., Feb. 1784.)

4246. KENTUCKY, Danger of secession.—I fear, from an expression in your letter, that the people of Kentucky think of separating, not only from Virginia (in which they are right), but also from the confederacy. I own I should think this a most calamitous event, and such a one as every good citizen should set himself against.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 188. (P., Jan. 1786.)

4247. KENTUCKY, Independence declared.—The General Assembly of Virginia, at their session in 1785, passed an act declaring that the district, called Kentucky, shall be a separate and independent State, on these conditions. 1. That the people of that district shall consent to it. 2. That Congress shall consent to it, and shall receive them into the Federal Union. 3. That they shall

This reformation was among the first works of the Legislature after our Independence. A judgment can now be obtained in the Supreme Court in one year at the common law, and in about three years in the Chancery.*—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix, 240. FORD ED., iv, 126. (P., 1785.)

4239. JUSTICE, Safeguard.—The provisions we have made [for our government] are such as please ourselves; they answer the substantial purposes of government and of justice, and other purposes than these should not be answered.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 479. (July 1775.)

4240. JUSTICE, Sense of.—Destutt Tracy promises a work on morals, in which I lament to see that he will adopt the principles of Hobbes, or humiliation to human nature; that the sense of justice and injustice is not derived from our natural organization, but founded on convention only. * * * Assuming the fact, that the earth has been created in time, and consequently the dogma of final causes, we yield, of course, to this short syllogism: Man was created for social intercourse; but social intercourse cannot be maintained without a sense of justice; then man must have been created with a sense of justice.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 4. FORD ED., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

4241. JUSTICE, Universal.—Justice is to be denied to no man.—To E. C. GENET. iii, 585. FORD ED., vi, 311. (Pa., 1793.)

4242. JUSTICE, Unswerving.—I am sensible of no passion which could seduce me knowingly from the path of justice.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 45. FORD ED., viii, 347. (1805.)

4243. JUSTICE, Views of.—All our proceedings have flowed from views of justice.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 70. FORD ED., viii, 496. (Dec. 1806.)

4244. KAMES, Writings of Lord.—Your objection to Lord Kames, that he is too metaphysical, is just, and it is the chief objection to which his writings are liable. It is to be observed, also, that though he has given us what should be the system of equity, yet it is not the one actually established, at least not in all its parts.—To PETER CARR. iii, 452. FORD ED., vi, 92. (Pa., 1792.)

4245. KENTUCKY, Asks separation.—We have transmitted a copy of a petition from the people of Kentucky to Congress praying to be separated from Virginia. Congress took no notice of it. We [delegates] sent the copy to the Governor desiring it to be laid before the Assembly. Our view was to bring on the question. It is for the interest of Virginia to cede so far immediately, because the people beyond that will separate themselves, because they will be joined by all our settlements beyond the Alleghany if they are the first movers. Whereas if we draw the line, those at Kentucky having their end, will not interest themselves for the people of Indiana, Greenbriar, &c., who will of course be left to our management, and I can with certainty almost say that Congress would approve of the meridian of the mouth of the Kanawha, and will consider it as the ultimate point to be desired from Virginia. I form this opinion from conversation with many members. Should we not be the first movers, and the Indianians and Kentuckians take themselves off and claim to the Alleghany, I am afraid Congress would secretly wish them well.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 401. (A., Feb. 1784.)

4246. KENTUCKY, Danger of secession.—I fear, from an expression in your letter, that the people of Kentucky think of separating, not only from Virginia (in which they are right), but also from the confederacy. I own I should think this a most calamitous event, and such a one as every good citizen should set himself against.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 188. (P., Jan. 1786.)

4247. KENTUCKY, Independence declared.—The General Assembly of Virginia, at their session in 1785, passed an act declaring that the district, called Kentucky, shall be a separate and independent State, on these conditions. 1. That the people of that district shall consent to it. 2. That Congress shall consent to it, and shall receive them into the Federal Union. 3. That they shall take on themselves a proportionable part of the public debt of Virginia. 4. That they shall confirm all titles to lands within their district, made by the State of Virginia, before their separation.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 258. FORD ED., iv, 162. (P., 1786.)

4248. ——. Virginia has declared Kentucky an independent State, provided its inhabitants consent to it, and Congress will receive them into a union.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. FORD ED., iv, 244. (P., 1786.)

4249. KENTUCKY, Statehood.—I wish to see that country in the hands of people well disposed, who know the value of the connection between that and the maritime States, and who wish to cultivate it. I consider their happiness as bound up together, and that every measure should be taken which may draw the bands of union tighter. It will be an efficacious one to receive them into Congress, as I perceive they are about to desire. If to this be added an honest and disinterested conduct in Congress, as to everything relating to them, we may hope for a perfect harmony.—To JOHN BROWN. ii, 395. FORD ED., v, 16. (P., May 1788.)

4250. ——. There are now 100,000 inhabitants at Kentucky. They have accepted the offer of independence on the terms proposed by Virginia, and they have decided that their independent government shall begin on the 1st day of the next year. In the meantime, they claim admittance into Congress.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. FORD ED., v, 23. (P., June 1788.)

4251. KENTUCKY, Union and.—Faithful to the Federal compact, according to the plain intent and meaning in which it was understood and acceded to by the several parties, * * * Kentucky is sincerely anxious for its preservation.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 468. FORD ED., vii, 300. (1798.)

4252. ——. This Commonwealth continues in the same esteem of their [the States] friendship and union which it has manifested from that moment at which a common danger first suggested a common union.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 468. FORD ED., vii, 300. (1798.)

4253. KENTUCKY, Vermont and.—Congress referred the decision as to the independence of Kentucky to the new government. Brown ascribes this to the jealousy of the northern States, who want Vermont to be received at the same time, in order to preserve a balance of interests in Congress. He was just setting out for Kentucky, disgusted, yet disposed to persuade to an acquiescence, though doubting they would immediately separate from the Union. The principal obstacle to this, he thought, would be the Indian war.—To WILLIAM SHORT. ii, 480. FORD ED., v, 50. (P., Sep. 1788.)

4254. KENTUCKY, Virginia and.—I am deeply impressed with the importance of Virginia and Kentucky pursuing the same track at the ensuing sessions of their Legislatures.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 304. FORD ED., vii, 389. (M., Aug. 26, 1799.)

4255. KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS (1798), Draft of.—I enclose you a copy of the draft* of the Kentucky resolves. I think we should distinctly affirm all the important principles they contain, so as to hold to that ground in future, and leave the matter in such a train as that we may not be committed absolutely to push the matter to extremities, and yet may be free to push as far as events will render prudent.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 258. FORD ED., vii, 288. (M., Nov. 17, 1798.)

4256. KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS (1798), History of.—At the time when the Republicans of our country were so much alarmed at the proceedings of the Federal ascendancy in Congress, in the Executive and the Judiciary departments, it became a matter of serious consideration how head could be made against their enterprises on the Constitution. The leading Republicans in Congress found themselves of no use there, browbeaten, as they were, by a bold and overwhelming majority. They concluded to retire from that field, take a stand in the State Legislatures, and endeavor there to arrest their progress. The Alien and Sedition laws furnished the particular occasion. The sympathy between Virginia and Kentucky was more cordial, and more intimately confidential, than between any other two States of Republican policy. Mr. Madison came into the Virginia Legislature. I was then in the Vice-Presidency, and could not leave my station. But your father, Colonel W. C. Nicholas, and myself happening to be together, the engaging the cooperation of Kentucky in an energetic protestation against the constitutionality of those laws, became a subject of consultation. Those gentlemen pressed me strongly to sketch resolutions for that purpose, your father undertaking to introduce them to that Legislature, with a solemn assurance, which I strictly required, that it should not be known from what quarter they came. I drew and delivered them to him, and in keeping their origin secret, he fulfilled his pledge of honor. Some years after this, Colonel Nicholas asked me if I would have any objection to its being known that I had drawn them. I pointedly enjoined that it should not. Whether he had unguardedly intimated it before to any one, I know not; but I afterwards observed in the papers repeated imputations of them to me; on which, as has been my practice on all occasions of imputation, I have observed entire silence. The question, indeed, has never before been put to me, nor should I answer it to any other than yourself; seeing no good end to be proposed by it, and the desire of tranquillity inducing with me a wish to be withdrawn from public notice. †—To ——. NICHOLAS. vii, 229. (M., Dec. 1821.)

4257. KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS (1798), Phrasing of.—The more I have reflected on the phrase in the paper you showed me, the more strongly I think it should be altered. Suppose you were instead of the invitation to cooperate in the annulment of the acts, to make it an invitation "to concur with this commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the said acts are, and were ab initio, null, void, and of no force, or effect", I should like it better.—To W. C. NICHOLAS. FORD ED., vii, 312. (Nov. 1798.)

4258. KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS (1798), Presentation of.—I entirely approve of the confidence you have reposed in Mr. Breckenridge, as he possesses mine entirely. I had imagined it better these resolutions should have originated with North Carolina. But perhaps the late changes in their representation may indicate some doubt whether they could have passed. In that case, it is better they should come from Kentucky. I understand you intend soon to go as far as Mr. Madison's. You know of course I have no secrets from him. I wish him, therefore, to be consulted as to these resolutions.—To W. C. NICHOLAS. FORD ED., vii, 281. (M., Oct. 5, 1798.)

4259. KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS (1799), Outlines of.—I thought something essentially necessary to be said, in order to avoid the inference of acquiescence; that a resolution or declaration should be passed: 1. Answering the reasonings of such of the States as have ventured into the field of reason, and that of the Committee of Congress, taking some notice, too, of those States who have either not answered at all, or answered without reasoning. 2. Making firm protestation against the precedent and principle, and reserving the right to make this palpable violation of the Federal Compact the ground of doing in future whatever we might now rightfully do, should repetitions of these and other violations of the compact render it expedient. 3. Expressing in affectionate and conciliatory language our warm attachment to union with our sister States, and to the instrument and principles by which we are united; that we are willing to sacrifice to this everything but the rights of self-government in those important points which we have never yielded, and in which alone we see liberty, safety and happiness; that not at all disposed to make every measure of error or of wrong a cause of scission, we are willing to look on with indulgence, and to wait with patience till those passions and delusions shall have passed over, which the Federal Government have artfully excited to cover its own abuses and conceal its designs, fully confident that the good sense of the American people, and their attachment to those very rights which we are now vindicating, will, before it shall be too late, rally with us round the true principles of our Federal compact. This was only meant to give a general idea of the complexion and topics of such an instrument. Mr. Madison * * * does not concur in the reservation proposed above; and from this I recede readily, not only in deference to his judgment, but because, as we should never think of separation but for repeated and enormous violations, so these, when they occur, will be cause enough of themselves. To these topics, however, should be added animadversions on the new pretensions to a common law of the United States. * * * As to the preparing anything, I must decline it, to avoid suspicions (which were pretty strong in some quarters on the late occasion), and because there remains still (after their late loss) a mass of talents in Kentucky sufficient for every purpose. The only object of the present communication is to procure a concert in the general plan of action [as it is extremely desirable that Virginia and Kentucky should pursue the same track on this occasion*]. 4260. KINGS, Abhorrence of.—Let us turn with abhorrence from these sceptered scelerats, and disregarding our own petty differences of opinion about men and measures, let us cling in mass to our country and to one another, and bid defiance, as we can if united, to the plundering combinations of the old world.—To DR. GEORGE LOGAN. vii, 20. (M., 1816.)

4261. KINGS, Absolutism and.—There is no king, who, with sufficient force, is not always ready to make himself absolute.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 8. FORD ED., iv, 270. (P., 1786.)

4262. KINGS, American.—It is lawful to wish to see no emperor or king in our hemisphere.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., x, 244. (M., 1822.)

4263. KINGS, Bourbon.—France has now a family of fools at its head, from whom, whenever it can shake off its foreign riders, it will extort a free constitution, or dismount them, and establish some other on the solid basis of national right.—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 554. FORD ED., x, 11. (M., Feb. 1816.)

4264. KINGS, Breeding.—When I observed that the King of England was a cipher, I did not mean to confine the observation to the mere individual [George III.] now on that throne. The practice of kings marrying only in the families of kings, has been that of Europe for some centuries. Now, take any race of animals, confine them in idleness and inaction, whether in a sty, a stable or a state-room, pamper them with high diet, gratify all their sexual appetites, immerse them in sensualities, nourish their passions, let everything bend before them, and banish whatever might lead them to think, and in a few generations they become all body, and no mind; and this, too, by a law of nature, by that very law by which we are in the constant practice of changing the characters and propensities of the animals we raise for our own purposes. Such is the regimen in raising kings, and in this way they have gone on for centuries.—To JOHN LANGDON. v, 514. (M., 1810.)

— KINGS, Cannibal.—See 1123.

4265. KINGS, Character of European.—While in Europe, I often amused myself with contemplating the characters of the then reigning monarchs of Europe. Louis XVI. was a fool, of my own knowledge, and in despite of the answers made for him at his trial. The King of Spain was a fool, and of Naples the same. They passed their lives in hunting, and despatched two couriers a week, one thousand miles, to let each other swore that our Government must either be entirely new modeled, or it would be knocked to pieces in less than ten years; and that as it is at present, he would not give a copper for it; that it is the President's character, and not the written Constitution, which keeps it together.—THE ANAS. ix, 139. FORD ED., i, 222. (Feb. 1793.)

4294. KOSCIUSKO (General), Affection for.—For yourself, personally, I may express with safety as well as truth, my great esteem, and the interest I feel for your welfare. From the same principles of caution, I do not write to my friend Kosciusko. I know he is always doing what he thinks is right, and he knows my prayers for his success in whatever he does. Assure him of my constant affection * * . —To JULIAN V. NIEMCEWICZ. v, 72. (April 1807.)

4295. KOSCIUSKO (General), Disinterested patriot.—May heaven have in store for your country a restoration of the blessings of freedom and order, and you be destined as the instrument it will use for that purpose. But if this be forbidden by fate, I hope we shall be able to preserve here an asylum where your love of liberty and disinterested patriotism will be forever protected and honored, and where you will find, in the hearts of the American people, a good portion of that esteem and affection which glow in the bosom of the friend who writes this * * *. —To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 295. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

4296. KOSCIUSKO (General), Emancipation for slaves.—The brave auxiliary of my country in its struggle for liberty, and from the year 1797, when our particular acquaintance began, my most intimate and much beloved friend. On his last departure from the United States in 1798, he left in my hands an instrument appropriating after his death all the property he had in our public funds, the price of his military services here, to the education and emancipation of as many of the children of bondage in this country as it should be adequate to.—To M. JULIEN. vii, 107. (M., 1818.)

4297. — — — You have seen the death of General Kosciusko announced in the papers. He had in the funds of the United States a very considerable sum of money on the interest of which he depended for subsistence. On his leaving the United States, in 1798, he placed it under my direction by a power of attorney, which I executed entirely through Mr. Barnes, who regularly remitted his interest. But he left also in my hands an autograph will, disposing of his funds in a particular course of charity, and making me his executor.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vii, 98. FORD ED., x, 96. (M., 1818.)

4298. KOSCIUSKO (General), Hopes for Poland.—General Kosciusko has been disappointed by the sudden peace between France and Austria. A ray of hope seemed to gleam on his mind for a moment, that the extension of the revolutionary spirit through Italy and Germany might so have occupied the remnants of monarchy there, as that his country might have risen again.—To HORATIO GATES. iv, 213. FORD ED., vii, 205. (Pa., 1798.)

4299. KOSCIUSKO (General), Son of liberty.—He is as pure a son of liberty as I have ever known, and of that liberty which is to go to all, and not to the few or the rich alone.—To HORATIO GATES. iv, 212. FORD ED., vii, 304. (Pa., 1798.)

4300. KOSCIUSKO (General), Tribute to.—Your principles and dispositions were made to be honored, revered and loved. True to a single object, the freedom and happiness of man, they have not veered about with the changelings and apostates of our acquaintance.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 249. (1798.)

4301. LABOR, Destroying.—All the energies [of European nations] are expended in the destruction of the labor, property and lives of their people.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 288. FORD ED., x, 257. (M., 1823.)

4302. LABOR, Distribution.—In Europe, the best distribution of labor is supposed to be that which places the manufacturing hands alongside the agricultural; so that the one part shall feed both, and the other part furnish both with clothes and other comforts. Would that be best here? Egoism and first appearances say yes. Or would it be better that all our laborers should be employed in agriculture? In this case a double or treble portion of fertile lands would be brought into culture; a double or treble creation of food be produced, and its surplus go to nourish the now perishing births of Europe, who in return would manufacture and send us in exchange our clothes and other comforts.—To M. SAX. iv, 527. (W., Feb. 1804.)

4303. — — — I was once a doubter whether the labor of the cultivator, aided by the creative powers of the earth itself, would not produce more value than that of the manufacturer, alone and unassisted by the dead subject on which he acted. In other words, whether the more we could bring into action of the energies of our boundless territory, in addition to the labor of our citizens, the more would not be our gain? But the inventions of later times, by labor-saving machines, do as much now for the manufacturer, as the earth for the cultivator. Experience, too, has proved that mine was but half the question. The other half is whether dollars and cents are to be weighed in the scale against real independence? The whole question then is solved; at least as far as respects our wants.—To WILLIAM SAMPSON. FORD ED., x, 73. (M., 1817.) See MANUFACTURES.

4304. LABOR, Earnings of.—Take not from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

4305. LABOR, Economy and.—Economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.) See ECONOMY.

4306. LABOR, European governments and.—To constrain the brute force of the people, the European governments deem it necessary to keep them down by hard labor, poverty and ignorance, and to take from them, as from bees, so much of their earnings, as that unremitting labor shall be necessary to obtain a sufficient surplus to sustain a scanty and miserable life.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 291. FORD ED., x, 226. (M., 1823.)

4307. LABOR, Fruits of.—The rights of the people to the exercise and fruits of their own industry can never be protected against the selfishness of rulers not subject to their control at short periods.—To ISAAC H. TIFANY. vii, 32. (M., 1816.)

4308. LABOR, Government and.—It behooves us to avail ourselves of every occasion * * * for taking off the surcharge [of offices and expense] that it may never be seen here that, after leaving to labor the smallest portion of its earnings on which it can subsist, government shall itself consume the residue of what it was instituted to guard.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 10. FORD ED., viii, 120. (Dec. 1801.)

4309. LABOR, Land and.—Where land is cheap, and rich, and labor dear, the same labor, spread in a slighter culture over 100 acres, will produce more profit than if concentrated by the highest degree of cultivation on a small portion of the lands. When the virgin fertility of the soil becomes exhausted, it becomes better to cultivate less, and well. The only difficulty is to know at what point of deterioration in the land, the culture should be increased, and in what degree.*—NOTES ON ARTHUR YOUNG'S LETTER. FORD ED., vi, 85. (1792.)

4310. LABOR, Manufactures, Commerce and.—Too little reliance is to be had on a steady and certain course of commerce with the countries of Europe to permit us to depend more on that than we cannot avoid. Our best interest would be to employ our principal labor in agriculture, because to the profits of labor, which is dear, this adds the profits of our lands, which are cheap. But the risk of hanging our prosperity on the fluctuating counsels and caprices of others renders it wise in us to turn seriously to manufactures, and if Europe will not let us carry our provisions to their manufactures, we must endeavor to bring their manufactures to our provisions.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 344. (Pa., June 1791.) See COMMERCE and MANUFACTURES.

4311. LABOR, Nobility of.—My new trade of nail-making is to me in this country what an additional title of nobility is, or the ensigns of a new order are in Europe.—To M. DE MEUNIER. FORD ED., vii, 14. (M., 1795.) See JEFFERSON.

4312. LABOR, Parasites on.—I think we have more machinery of government than is necessary, too many parasites living on the labor of the industrious.—To WILLIAM LUDLOW. vii, 378. (M., 1824.) See ECONOMY.

4313. LABOR, Plundering.—No other depositories of power [but the people themselves] have ever yet been found, which did not end in converting to their own profit the earnings of those committed to their charge.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 36. FORD ED., x, 45. (M., 1816.)

4314. LABOR, Prosperity, Agriculture and.—A prosperity built on the basis of agriculture is that which is most desirable to us, because to the efforts of labor it adds the efforts of a greater proportion of soil.—CIRCULAR TO CONSULS. iii, 431. (Pa., 1792.) See AGRICULTURE.

4315. LABOR, Protecting.—If we can prevent the government from wasting the labors of the people, under the pretence of taking care of them, they must become happy.—To THOMAS COOPER. iv, 453. FORD ED., viii, 178. (W., 1802.) See PROTECTION.

4316. LABOR, Rioting on.—I may err in my measures, but never shall deflect from the intention to fortify the public liberty by every possible means, and to put it out of the power of the few to riot on the labors of the many.—To JUDGE TYLER. iv, 548. (W., 1804.)

4317. LABOR, War and.—It is [the people's] sweat which is to earn all the expenses of the war, and their blood which is to flow in expiation of the causes of it.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 272. FORD ED., vii, 334. (Pa., 1799.)

4318. LABORERS, America settled by.—Our ancestors who migrated hither were laborers, not lawyers.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 139. FORD ED., i, 444. (1774.)

4319. LABORERS, American.—The great mass of our population is of laborers; our rich, who can live without labor, either manual or professional, being few, and of moderate wealth. Most of the laboring class possess property, cultivate their own lands, have families, and from the demand for their labor are enabled to exact from the rich and the competent such prices as enable them to be fed abundantly, clothed above mere decency, to labor moderately and raise their families. They are not driven to the ultimate resources of dexterity and skill, because their wares will sell although not quite so nice as those of England. The wealthy, on the other hand, and those at their ease, know nothing of what the Europeans call luxury. They have only somewhat more of the comforts and decencies of life than those who furnish them. Can any condition of life be more desirable than this?—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 377. (M., 1814.)

4320. LABORERS, Encouraging foreign.—If foreigners come of themselves they are entitled to all the rights of citizenship; but I doubt the expediency of inviting them by extraordinary encouragements. I mean not that these doubts should be extended to the importation of useful artificers. The policy of that measure depends on very different considerations. Spare no expense in obtaining them. They will after a while go to the plow and the hoe; but, in the meantime, they will teach us something we do not know.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 332. FORD ED., iii, 190. (1782.)

4321. LABORERS, English aristocracy and.—In the hands of the [English] aristocracy, the paupers are used as tools to maintain their own wretchedness, and to keep down the laboring portion by shooting them whenever the desperation produced by the cravings of their stomachs drives them into riots. Such is the happiness of scientific England.—TO THOMAS COOPER. vi, 377. (M., 1814.)

4322. — — — The aristocracy of England, which comprehends the nobility, the wealthy commoners, the high grades of priesthood, and the officers of government, have the laws and government in their hands [and] have so managed them as to reduce the eleemosynary class, or paupers, who are about one-fifth of the whole, below the means of supporting life, even by labor. [They] have forced the laboring class, whether employed in agriculture or the arts, to the maximum of labor which the construction of the human body can endure, and to the minimum of food, and of the meanest kind, which will preserve it in life, and in strength sufficient to perform its functions. To obtain food enough, and clothing, not only their whole strength must be unremittingly exerted, but the utmost dexterity also, which they can acquire; and those of great dexterity only can keep their ground, while those of less must sink into the class of paupers. Nor is it manual dexterity alone, but the acutest resources of the mind also, which are impressed into this struggle for life; and such as have means a little above the rest, as the master-workman, for instance, must strengthen themselves by acquiring as much of the philosophy of their trade as will enable them to compete with their rivals, and keep themselves above ground. Hence, the industry and manual dexterity of their journeymen and day-laborers, and the science of their master-workmen, keep them in the foremost ranks of competition with those of other nations; and the less dexterous individuals, falling into the eleemosynary ranks, furnish materials for armies and navies to defend their country, exercise piracy on the ocean, and carry conflagration, plunder and devastation to the shores of all those who endeavor to withstand their aggressions.—TO THOMAS COOPER. vi, 376. (M., 1814.)

4323. — — — No earthly consideration could induce my consent to contract such a debt as England has by her wars for commerce; to reduce our citizens by taxes to such wretchedness, as that laboring sixteen of the twenty-four hours, they are still unable to afford themselves bread, or barely to earn as much oatmeal or potatoes as will keep soul and body together. And all this to feed the avidity of a few millionaire merchants, and to keep up one thousand ships of war for the protection of their commercial speculations.—TO WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 7. FORD ED., x, 35. (M., 1816.)

4324. LABORERS, Federal taxes and.—The poor man in this country who uses nothing but what is made within his own farm or family, or within the United States, pays not a farthing of tax to the General Government but on his salt; and should we go into that manufacture, as we ought to do, we will pay not one cent.—TO DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 584. FORD ED., ix, 321. (M., 1811.)

4325. LABORERS, French.—The encroachments [in France] by the men on the offices proper for the women, is a great derangement in the order of things. Men are shoemakers, tailors, upholsterers, staymakers, mantuamakers, cooks, housekeepers, house-cleaners [and] bedmakers. The women, therefore, to live, are obliged to undertake the offices which they abandon. They become porters, carters, reapers, sailors, lock-keepers, smelters on the anvil, cultivators of the earth, &c.—TRAVELS IN FRANCE. ix, 351. (1787.)

4326. — — — I set out * * * to take a view of Fontainebleau. For this purpose I shaped my course towards the highest of the mountains in sight, to the top of which was about a league. As soon as I had got clear of the town I fell in with a poor woman walking at the same rate with myself, and going in the same course. Wishing to know the condition of the laboring poor, I entered into conversation with her, which I began by enquiries for the path which would lead me into the mountain; and thence proceeded to enquiries into her vocation, condition and circumstances. She told me she was a day laborer, at eight sous, or four pence sterling the day; that she had two children to maintain, and to pay a rent of thirty livres for her house (which would consume the hire of seventy-five days), that often she could get no employment, and of course was without bread. As we had walked together near a mile, and she had so far served me as a guide, I gave her, on parting, twenty-four sous. She burst into tears of a gratitude which I could perceive was unfeigned because she was unable to utter a word. She had probably never before received so great an aid.—TO REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 34. (Pa., 1785.)

4327. — — — The laboring people in France are poorer than in England. They pay about one-half their produce in rent; the English, in general, about a third.—TO JOHN PAGE. i, 549. FORD ED., iv, 213. (P., 1786.)

4328. LABORERS, Importing.—Do you not think it would be expedient to take measures for importing a number of Germans and Highlanders? This need not be to such an extent as to prevent the employment of eastern laborers, which is eligible for particular reasons. If you approve of the importation of Germans, and have a good channel for it, you will use it, of course. If you have no channel, I can help you to one.* —To MESSRS. JOHNSON, CARROLL, AND STEWART. iii, 337. (Pa., 1792.)

4329. LABORERS, Imprisoned.—Offenders, even under a course of correction, might be rendered useful in various labors for the public, and would be living and long-continued spectacles to deter others from committing the like offences.—CRIMES BILL. i, 148. FORD ED., ii, 204. (1779.)

4330. ——. Exhibited as a public spectacle, with shaved heads and mean clothing, working on the high roads, produced in the criminals such a prostration of character, such an abandonment of self-respect, as, instead of reforming, plunged them into the most desperate and hardened depravity of morals and character.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 45. FORD ED., i, 53. (1820.)

4331. LABORERS, Jefferson and.—I made a point of paying my workmen in preference to all other claimants. I never parted with one without settling with him, and giving him either his money or my note. Every person that ever worked for me can attest this, and that I always paid their notes pretty soon.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., v, 34. (P., 1788.)

4332. LABORERS, Skilled.—While we have land to labor, let us never wish to see our citizens occupied at a work-bench or twirling a distaff. Carpenters, masons, smiths, are wanting in husbandry; but, for the general operations of manufacture, let our workshops remain in Europe. It is better to carry provisions and materials to workmen there, than bring them to the provisions and materials, and with them their manners and principles.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 405. FORD ED., iii, 269. (1782.) See ARTISANS and MANUFACTURERS.

4333. LABORERS, Slave vs. English.—Nor in the class of laborers do I mean to withhold from the comparison that portion whose color has condemned them, in certain parts of our Union, to a subjection to the will of others. Even these are better fed in these States, warmer clothed, and labor less than the journeymen or day-laborers of England. They have the comfort, too, of numerous families, in the midst of whom they live without want, or fear of it; a solace which few of the laborers of England possess. They are subject, it is true, to bodily coercion; but are not the hundreds of thousands of British soldiers and seamen subject to the same, without seeing, at the end of their career, when age and accident shall have rendered them unequal to labor, the certainty, which the other has, that he will never want? And has not the British seaman, as much as the African, been reduced to this bondage by force, in flagrant violation of his own consent, and of his natural right in his own person? And with the laborers of England generally, does not the moral coercion of want subject their will as despotically to that of their employer, as the physical constraint does the soldier, the seaman or the slave? But do not mistake me. I am not advocating slavery. I am not justifying the wrongs we have committed on a foreign people, by the example of another nation committing equal wrongs on their own subjects. On the contrary, there is nothing I would not sacrifice to a practicable plan of abolishing every vestige of this moral and political depravity. But I am, at present, comparing the condition and degree of suffering to which oppression has reduced the man of one color, with the condition and degree of suffering to which oppression has reduced the man of another color; equally condemning both.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 378. (M., 1814.)

4334. LABORERS, Treatment of slave.—My first wish is that the [colored] laborers may be well treated; the second that they may enable me to have that treatment continued by making as much as will admit it.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 508. (Pa., 1792.)

4335. LABORERS, White vs. Black.—The negro does not perform quite as much work [as the white man performs] nor with as much intelligence.—NOTES ON ARTHUR YOUNG'S LETTER. FORD ED., vi, 84. (1792.)

4336. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Atlas of Patriot Party.—He was the head and Atlas of the Patriot party [of the French Revolution].—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 106. FORD ED., i, 147. (1821.)

4337. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Busts of.—The Commonwealth of Virginia, in gratitude for the services of Major General, the Marquis de Lafayette, have determined to erect his bust in their Capitol. Desirous to place a like monument of his worth, and of their sense of it, in the country to which they are indebted for his birth, they have hoped that the city of Paris will consent to become the depository of this second testimony of their gratitude. Being charged by them with the execution of their wishes, I have the honor to solicit of Messieurs Le Prevot des Marchands et Echevins, on behalf of the city, their acceptance of a bust of this gallant officer, and that they will be pleased to place it where, doing most honor to him, it will most gratify the feelings of an allied nation. It is with true pleasure that I obey the call of that Commonwealth to render just homage to a character so great in its first developments, that they would honor the close of any other. Their country, covered by a small army against a great one, their exhausted means supplied by his talents, their enemies finally forced to that spot whither their allies and confederates were collecting to receive them, and a war which had spread its miseries into the four quarters of the earth, thus reduced to a single point where one blow should terminate it, and through the whole, an implicit respect paid to the laws of the land; these are facts which would illustrate any character, and which fully justify the warmth of those feelings, of which I have the honor on this occasion to be the organ.—To THE PREVOT DES MARCHANDS ET ECHEVINS DE PARIS. ii, 29. (P., 1786.)

* Johnson, Carroll, and Stewart were the Commissioners of Washington City.—EDITOR.

4338. ——. The first of the busts of the Marquis de Lafayette will be finished next month. I shall present that one to the city of Paris, because the delay has been noticed by some.—To GOVERNOR HENRY. i, 514. FORD ED., iv, 135. (Pa., 1786.)

4339. ——. The inauguration of the bust of the Marquis de Lafayette has been attended with a considerable but a necessary delay. The principle that the King is the sole fountain of honor in this country opposed a barrier to our desires, which threatened to be insurmountable. No instance of a similar proposition from a foreign power had occurred in their history. The admitting it in this case, is a singular proof of the King's friendly disposition towards the States of America, and of his personal esteem for the Marquis de Lafayette.—To GOVERNOR RANDOLPH. ii, 118. (P., 1787.)

4340. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Dishonored.—The Marquis de Lafayette, for signing the prayer which the deputies from Bretagne were to present, * * * has been disgraced in the old-fashioned language of the country; that is to say, the command in the South of France this summer, which [the government] had given him, is taken away. This dishonors him at Court, * * * but it will probably honor him in the eyes of the nation.—To MRS. CUTTING. ii, 439. (P., 1788.)

4341. ——. The disgrace of the Marquis de Lafayette, which at any other period of their history would have had the worst consequences for him, will on the contrary, mark him favorably to the nation, at present. During the present administration he can expect nothing; but perhaps it may serve him with their successors.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 443. FORD ED., v, 43. (P., 1788.)

4342. ——. He is disgraced, in the ancient language of the court, but in truth honorably marked in the eyes of the nation. The ministers are so sensible of this, that they have had, separately, private conferences with him, to endeavor through him to keep things quiet.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 452. (P., 1788.)

4343. ——. The Marquis de Lafayette is out of favor with the Court, but in high favor with the nation. I once feared for his personal liberty, but I hope he is on safe ground at present.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 538. FORD ED., v, 60. (P., 1788.)

4344. ——. There has been a little foundation for the reports and fears relative to the Marquis de Lafayette. He has from the beginning taken openly part with those who demand a constitution; and there was a moment that we apprehended the Bastille; but they ventured on nothing more than to take from him a temporary service on which he had been ordered; and this, more to save appearances for their own authority than anything else; for at the very moment they pretended that they had put him into disgrace, they were constantly conferring and communicating

* Jefferson, in behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia, presented a bust of Lafayette to the City of Paris in September, 1786. Carlyle, in his history of the French Revolution (Book v, chapter 8) refers to this bust as follows: "But surely, for one thing, the National Guard should have a General! Moreau de Saint-Méry, he of the 'three thousand orders', casts one of his significant glances on the Bust of Lafayette, which has stood there ever since the American War of Liberty. Whereupon, by acclamation, Lafayette is nominated."—EDITOR.

with him. Since this, he has stood on safe ground, and is viewed as among the foremost of the Patriots.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 563. FORD ED., v, 64. (P., 1789.)

4345. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Doyen of heroes.—Among the few survivors of our Revolutionary struggles, you are as distinguished in my affections, as in the eyes of the world, and especially in those of this country. You are now, I believe, the doyen of our military heroes, and may I not say of the soldiers of liberty in the world?—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., x, 228. (M., 1822.)

4346. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Fame.—Of him we may truly say, as was said of Germanicus, "fruitur famâ sui."—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 381. (M., 1824.)

4347. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Foibles.—He has a great deal of sound genius, is well remarked by the King, and rising in popularity. He has nothing against him but the suspicion of republican principles. I think he will one day be of the ministry. His foible is a canine appetite for popularity and fame; but he will get above this.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 108. FORD ED., iv, 366. (P., 1787.)

4348. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), France and America.—Teach your children to be, as you are, a cement between our two nations.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 132. FORD ED., v, 153. (N.Y., 1790.)

4349. ——. The Marquis de Lafayette stands in such a relation between America and France, that I should think him perfectly capable of seizing what is just [commercially] as to both. Perhaps on some occasion of free conversation, you might find an opportunity of impressing these truths [respecting commerce with the West Indies] on his mind, and that from him, they might be let out at a proper moment, as matters meriting consideration and weight, when [the National Assembly] shall be engaged in the work of forming a constitution for our neighbors.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 276. FORD ED., v, 364. (Pa., 1791.)

4350. ——. I think the return of Lafayette to Paris insures a reconciliation between them and us. He will so entwine himself with the envoys that they will not be able to draw off.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iv, 320. FORD ED., vii, 423. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

4351. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), And French liberty.—Behold you, then, my dear friend, at the head of a great army, establishing the liberties of your country against a foreign enemy. May heaven favor your cause, and make you the channel through which it may pour its favors.—To GENERAL LAFAYETTE. iii, 450. FORD ED., vi, 78. (Pa., June 1792.)

4352. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Friendship for.—I have never ceased to cherish a sincere friendship for you, and to take a lively interest in your sufferings and losses. It would make me happy to learn that they are to have an end.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. iv, 363. (W., March 1801.)

4353. ——. Old men do not easily contract new friendships, but neither do they forget old ones. Yours and mine, commenced in times too awful, has continued through times too trying and changeable to be forgotten at the moment when our chief solace is in our recollections.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ix, 302. (M., 1811.)

4354. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Gifts of Land.—I am persuaded, that a gift of lands by the State of Virginia to the Marquis de Lafayette would give a good opinion here [France] of our character, and would reflect honor on the Marquis. Nor, am I sure that the day will not come when it might be an useful asylum to him. The time of life at which he visited America was too well adapted to receive good and lasting impressions to permit him ever to accommodate himself to the principles of monarchical government; and it will need all his own prudence, and that of his friends, to make this country a safe residence for him. How glorious, how comfortable in reflection, will it be, to have prepared a refuge for him in case of a reverse. In the meantime, he could settle it with tenants from the freest part of this country, Bretagne. I have never suggested the smallest idea of this kind to him; because the execution of it should convey the first notice. If the State has not a right to give him lands with their own officers, they could buy up at cheap prices the shares of others.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 533. FORD ED., iv, 195. (P., 1786.)

4355. ——. The acquisition of Louisiana * * * has enabled us to do a handsome thing for Lafayette. He had received a grant of between eleven and twelve thousand acres north of Ohio, worth, perhaps, a dollar an acre. We have obtained permission of Congress to locate it in Louisiana. Locations can be found adjacent to the city of New Orleans, in the island of New Orleans and in its vicinity, the value of which cannot be calculated.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. iv, 554. (W., 1804.)

4356. ——. I wrote in April to Governor Claiborne in these words: "Congress has permitted lots to be taken for M. de Lafayette as low as five hundred acres. This secures to us the parcel on the canal of Carondelet; but at the same time cuts off those similar locations proposed by M. Duplantier. Indeed, it would not be for the interest of the General to let his claim get into collision with any public interest. Were it to lose its popularity, it might excite an apparition neither agreeable to his feelings nor interest." This may already have produced some effect towards abating the expectations of M. Duplantier and the fears of the city. Still, I think it better that Mr. Madison should write explicitly to him. Indeed, I think we had better have a consultation, and determine on the proper limits of the public reservation. For, however justifiably desirous we may be to relieve a man who stands so high in the public affection as Lafayette, still, it should be only by granting to him such lands as would be granted to others if not located by him.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 454. (M., June 1806.)

4357. ——. M. Duplantier's zeal had, in one instance, led us to fear you would be injured by it. He had comprehended in his location not only the grounds vacant of all title in the vicinity of New Orleans, which had been a principal object in my eye to enable you speedily to raise a sum of money, but also grounds which had been reserved and were necessary for the range of the forts, which had been left open as a common for the citizens. Knowing this would excite reclamations dangerous to your interests, and threatening their popularity both there and here, I wrote immediately to Governor Claiborne to get him to withdraw to a certain extent (about point blank shot) from the fort, the grounds within that being necessary for the public. But, in the meantime, an alarm was excited in the town, and they instructed their representative in Congress to claim, for the use of the town and public, the whole of the vacant lands in its vicinity. Mr. Gallatin, however, effected a compromise with him by ceding the grounds next to the fort, so as to leave your claim clear to all the lands we originally contemplated for you.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ix, 65. (W., May 1807.)

4358. ——. I hope Congress is prepared to go through with their compliment [to Lafayette] worthily; that they do not mean to invite him merely to dine; that provision should be made for his expenses here, which you know he cannot afford, and that they will not send him back empty-handed. This would place us under indelible disgrace in Europe. Some three or four good townships in Missouri, or Louisiana or Alabama, &c., should be in readiness for him, and may restore his family to the opulence which his virtues have lost to them.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. FORD ED., x, 294. (M., 1824.)

4359. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Harassed by instructions.—As it becomes more and more possible that the Noblesse will go wrong, I become uneasy for you. Your principles are decidedly with the Tiers Etat, and your instructions against them. A complaisance to the latter on some occasions, and an adherence to the former on others, may give an appearance of trimming between the two parties, which may lose you both. You will in the end go over wholly to the Tiers Etat, because it will be impossible for you to live in a constant sacrifice of your own sentiments to the prejudices of the Noblesse. But you would be received by the Tiers Etat at any future day, coldly, and without confidence. This appears to me the moment to take at once that honest and manly stand with them which your principles dictate. This will win their hearts forever, be approved by the world, which marks and honors you as the man of the people, and will be an eternal consolation to yourself. The Noblesse, and especially the Noblesse of Auvergne, will always prefer men who will do their dirty work for them. You are not made for that. They will, therefore, soon drop you, and the people in that case will perhaps not take you up. Suppose a scission should take place. The priests and Nobles will secede, the nation will remain in place, and, with the King, will do its own business. If violence should be attempted, where will you be? You cannot then take side with the people in opposition to your own vote, that very vote which will have helped to produce the scission. Still less can you array yourself against the people. That is impossible. Your instructions are indeed a difficulty. But to state this at its worst, it is only a single difficulty, which a single effort surmounts. Your instructions can never embarrass you a second time, whereas an acquiescence under them will reproduce greater difficulties every day, and without end. Besides, a thousand circumstances offer as many justifications of your departure from your instructions. Will it be impossible to persuade all parties that (as for good legislation two houses are necessary) the placing the privileged classes together in one house, and the unprivileged in another, would be better than a scission? I own, I think it would. People can never agree without some sacrifices; and it appears but a moderate sacrifice in each party, to meet on this middle ground. The attempt to bring this about might satisfy your instructions, and a failure in it would justify your siding with the people, even to those who think instructions are laws of conduct. Forgive me, my dear friend, if my anxiety for you makes me talk of things I know nothing about. You must not consider this as advice. I know you and myself too well to presume to offer advice.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 20. FORD ED., v, 91. (P., May 1789.)

4360. ——. I am in great pain for the Marquis de Lafayette. His principles, you know, are clearly with the people; but having been elected for the Noblesse of Auvergne, they have laid him under express instructions to vote for the decision by orders and not persons. This would ruin him with the Tiers Etat, and it is not possible he could continue long to give satisfaction to the Noblesse. I have not hesitated to press on him to burn his instructions, and follow his conscience as the only sure clue, which will eternally guide a man clear of all doubts and inconsistencies. If he cannot effect a conciliatory plan, he will surely take his stand manfully at once with the Tiers Etat. He will in that case be what he pleases with them, and I am in hopes that base is now too solid to render it dangerous to be mounted on it.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. iii, 31. FORD ED., v, 96. (P., 1789.)

4361. ——. Forty-eight of the Nobles have joined the Tiers Etat. * * * The Marquis de Lafayette could not be of the number, being restrained by his instructions. He is writing to his constituents to change his instructions, or to accept his resignation.—To JOHN JAY. iii, 62. (P., June 1789.)

4362. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Happy in France.—Measuring happiness by the American scale, and sincerely wishing that of yourself and family, we had been anxious to see them established on this side of the great water. But I am not certain that any equivalent can be found for the loss of that species of society, to which our habits have been formed from infancy.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. v, 129. FORD ED., ix, 113. (W., 1807.)

4363. LAFAYETTE, Imprisoned.—No one has wished with more anxiety to see him once more in the bosom of a nation, who, knowing his works and his worth, desire to make him and his family forever their own.*—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. iv, 145. (1796.)

4364. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Imprudent but innocent.—From what I learn from Viscount Noailles, Lafayette has been more imprudent than I expected, but certainly innocent.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 550. FORD ED., vi, 240. (Pa., May 1793.)

4365. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Louisiana and.—I very much wished your presence in New Orleans during the late conspiracy of Burr. * * * It would have been of value, as a point of union and confidence, for the ancient inhabitants, American as well as Creole.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ix, 665. (W., May 1807.)

4366. ——. Had you been, as I wished, at the head of the government of Orleans, Burr would never have given me one moment's uneasiness.*—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. v, 129. FORD ED., ix, 113. (W., 1807.)

4367. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), A Notable.—Lafayette's name was placed on the list of Notables originally. Afterwards his name disappeared, but finally was reinstated. This shows that his character here is not considered as an indifferent one, and that it excites agitation. His education in our school has drawn on him a very jealous eye from a court whose principles are the most absolute despotism. * * * The King, who is a good man, is favorably disposed towards him, and he is supported by powerful family connections, and by the public good will. He is the youngest man of the Notables except one whose office placed him on the list.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 99. FORD ED., iv, 358. (P., 1787.)

4368. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), In peace and war.—I joy, my friends, in your joy, inspired by the visit of this our ancient and distinguished leader and benefactor. His deeds in the War of Independence you have heard and read. They are known to you and embalmed in your memories and in the pages of faithful history. His deeds in the peace which followed that war, are perhaps not known to you; but I can attest them. When I was stationed in his country, for the purpose of cementing its friendship with ours and of advancing our mutual interests, this friend of both was my most powerful auxiliary and advocate. He made our cause his own, as in truth it was that of his native country also. His influence and connections there were great. All doors of all departments were open to him at all times; to me only formally and at appointed times. In truth I only held the nail, he drove it. Honor him, then, as your benefactor in peace as well as in war.—SPEECH AT CHARLOTTESVILLE DINNER. D. L. J., 391. (1824.)

4369. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Promoter of commerce.—The assistance of M. de Lafayette in the whole of this business [promoting commerce] has been so earnest and so efficacious, that I am in duty bound to place it under the eye of Congress, as worthy their notice on this occasion. Their thanks, or such other notice as they think proper, would be grateful to him without doubt. He has richly deserved and will continue to deserve it, whenever occasions shall arise of rendering services to the United States.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 47. (P., 1786.)

4370. ——. The Marquis de Lafayette is a most valuable auxiliary to me. His zeal is unbounded, and his weight with those in power great. His education having been merely military, commerce was an unknown field to him. But his good sense enabling him to apprehend perfectly whatever is explained to him, his agency has been very efficacious.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 108. FORD ED., iv, 366. (P., 1787.)

4371. ——. The Marquis de Lafayette goes hand in hand with me in all these [commercial treaty] transactions, and is an invaluable auxiliary to me. I hope it will not be imputed either to partiality or affection, my naming this gentleman so often in my dispatches. Were I not to do it, it would be a suppression of truth, and the taking to myself the whole merit where he has the greatest share.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 228. (P., 1787.)

* Lafayette was Jefferson's first choice for Governor of Orleans after its acquisition. See CLAIRBORNE.—EDITOR.

4373. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Reminiscences.—What a history have we to run over from the evening that yourself, Monsieur Berman, and other patriots settled, in my house in Paris, the outlines of the constitution you wished! And to trace it through all the disastrous chapters of Robespierre, Barras, Bonaparte, and the Bourbons! These things, however, are for our meeting.—TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 378. FORD ED., x, 320. (M., 1824.)

4374. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Re-visiting America.—I have received * * * your letter * * * giving the welcome assurance that you will visit the neighborhood which, during the march of our enemy near it, was covered by his shield from his robberies and ravages. In passing the line of your former march you will experience pleasing recollections of the good you have done. My neighbors of our academical village have expressed to you * * * their hope that you will accept manifestations of their feelings, simple indeed, but as cordial as any you will have received. It will be an additional honor to the University of the State that you will have been its first guest.—TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 378. FORD ED., x, 320. (M., 1824.)

4375. ——. You will have seen by our papers the delirium into which our citizens are thrown by a visit from General Lafayette. He is making a triumphant progress through the States, from town to town, with acclamations of welcome, such as no crowned head ever received. It will have a good effect in favor of the General with the people in Europe, but probably a different one with their sovereigns. Its effect here, too, will be salutary as to ourselves, by rallying us together and strengthening the habit of considering our country as one and indivisible, and I hope we shall close it with something more solid for him than dinners and balls. The eclat of this visit has almost merged the presidential question, on which nothing scarcely is said in our papers.—TO RICHARD RUSH. vii, 380. FORD ED., x, 322. (M., October 1824.)

4376. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Value to France.—Take care of yourself, * * * for though I think your nation would in any event work out her salvation, I am persuaded were she to lose you, it would cost her oceans of blood, and years of confusion and anarchy.—TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 132. FORD ED., v, 153. (N.Y., April 1790.)

4377. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Washington and.—The President has seen with satisfaction that the Ministers of the United States in Europe, while they have avoided an useless commitment of their nation on the subject of the Marquis de Lafayette, have nevertheless shown themselves attentive to his situation. The interest which the President himself, and our citizens in general take in the welfare of this gentleman, is great and sincere, and will entirely justify all prudent efforts to save him. I am, therefore, to desire that you will avail yourself of every opportunity of sounding the way towards his liberation, of finding out whether those in whose power he is are very tenacious of him, of insinuating through such channels as you shall think suitable, the attentions of the government and people of the United States to this object, and the interest they take in it, and of procuring his liberation by informal solicitations, if possible. But if formal ones be necessary, and the moment should arrive when you shall find that they will be effectual, you are authorized to signify, through such channels as you shall find suitable, that our government and nation, faithful in their attachments to this gentleman for the services he has rendered them, feel a lively interest in his welfare, and will view his liberation as a mark of consideration and friendship for the United States, and as a new motive for esteem, and a reciprocation of kind offices towards the power to whom they shall be indebted for this act. A like letter being written to Mr. Pinckney, you will of course take care, that however you may act through different channels, there be still a sufficient degree of concert in your proceedings.—TO GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 524. FORD ED., vi, 202. (Pa., March 1793.)

4378. ——. For Lafayette my heart has been constantly bleeding. The influence of the United States has been put into action, as far as it could be either with decency or effect. But I fear that distance and difference of principle give little hold to General Washington on the jailers of Lafayette. However, his friends may be assured that our zeal has not been inactive.—TO MRS. CHURCH. FORD ED., vi, 454. (G., Nov. 1793.)

4379. LAFAYETTE (Marquis de), Zeal of.—He offered his services with that zeal which commands them on every occasion respecting America.—TO JAMES MONROE. i, 567. FORD ED., iv, 224. (P., 1786.) See FRANCE, JEFFERSON and REVOLUTION (FRENCH).

4380. LAKE GEORGE, Beauties of.—Lake George is, without comparison, the most beautiful water I ever saw; formed by a contour of mountains into a basin thirty-five miles long, and two or four miles broad, finely interspersed with islands, its waters limpid as crystal, and the mountain sides covered with rich groves of thuja, silver fir, white pine, aspen, and paper birch down to the water-edge; here and there precipices of rock to checker the scene and save it from monotony. * * * Lake Champlain, though much larger, is a far less pleasant water. It is muddy, turbulent, and yields little game.—TO MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 337. (1791.)

4381. LAMPS, Improvement in.—There has been a lamp called the cylinder lamp * lately invented here. It gives a light equal, as is thought, to that of six or eight candles. It requires olive oil, but its consumption is not great. The improvement is produced by forcing the wick into a hollow cylinder, so that there is a passage for the air through the hollow. The idea had occurred to Dr. Franklin a year or two before, but he tried his experiment with a rush, which not succeeding he did not prosecute it. The fact was the rush formed too small a cylinder; the one used is of an inch diameter.—TO CHARLES THOMSON. FORD ED., iv, 13. (P., 1784.)

4382. LAND, Allodial and Feudal tenures.—An error in the nature of our land

holdings * * * crept in at a very early period of our settlement. The introduction of the Feudal tenures into the Kingdom of England, though ancient, is well enough understood to set this matter in a proper light. In the earlier ages of the Saxon settlement, Feudal holdings were certainly altogether unknown, and very few, if any, had been introduced at the time of the Norman Conquest. Our Saxon ancestors held their lands, as they did their personal property, in absolute dominion, disencumbered with any superior, answering nearly to the nature of those possessions which the Feudalists term Allodial. William, the Norman, first introduced that system generally. The land which had belonged to those who fell in the Battle of Hastings, and in the subsequent insurrections of his reign, formed a considerable proportion of the lands of the whole Kingdom. These he granted out, subject to Feudal duties, as did he also those of a great number of his new subjects, who, by persuasions or threats, were induced to surrender them for that purpose. But still, much was left in the hands of his Saxon subjects, held of no superior, and not subject to Feudal conditions. These, therefore, by express laws, enacted to render uniform the system of military defence, were made liable to the same military duties as if they had been Feuds; and the Norman lawyers soon found means to saddle them, also, with all the other Feudal burthens. But still they had not been surrendered to the King, they were not derived from his grant, and therefore they were not holden of him. A general principle indeed, was introduced, that "all lands in England were held either mediately or immediately of the Crown"; but this was borrowed from those holdings which were truly Feudal, and only applied to others for the purposes of illustration. Feudal holdings were therefore but exceptions out of the Saxon laws of possession, under which all lands were held in absolute right. These, therefore, still form the basis, or groundwork, of the Common law, to prevail wheresoever the exceptions have not taken place. America was not conquered by William, the Norman, nor were its lands surrendered to him or any of his successors. Possessions there are, undoubtedly, of the Allodial nature. Our ancestors, however, who emigrated hither, were laborers, not lawyers. The fictitious principle, that all lands belong originally to the King, they were early persuaded to believe real; and accordingly took grants of their own lands from the Crown. And while the Crown continued to grant for small sums, and on reasonable rents, there was no inducement to arrest the error, and lay it open to the public view. But his Majesty has lately taken on him to advance the terms of purchase, and of holding to the double of what they were, by which means the acquisition of lands being rendered difficult, the population of our country is likely to be checked. It is time, therefore to lay this matter before his Majesty, and to declare, that he has no right to grant lands of himself.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 138. FORD ED., i, 443. (1774.)

4383. ——. The opinion that our lands were Allodial possessions is one which I have very long held, and had in my eye during a pretty considerable part of my law reading which, I found, always strengthened it. * * * This opinion I have thought and still think to prove if ever I should have time to look into books again. But this is only meant with respect to the English law as transplanted here. How far our acts of Assembly, or acceptance of grants, may have converted lands which were Allodial into Feuds, I have never considered. This matter is now become a mere speculative point; and we have it in our power to make it what it ought to be for the public good.—To ——. FORD ED., ii, 78. (Pa., 1776.)

4384. ——. [The question of the public lands] may be considered in the two points of view, 1st, as bringing a revenue into the public treasury. 2d, as a tenure. * * * First, is it consistent with good policy or free government to establish a perpetual revenue? Is it not against the practice of our wise British ancestors? Have not the instances in which we have departed from this, in Virginia, been constantly condemned by the universal voice of our country? Is it safe to make the governing power, when once seated in office, independent of its revenue? Should we not have in contemplation and prepare for an event (however deprecated) which may happen in the possibility of things; I mean a reacknowledgment of the British tyrant as our King, and previously strip him of every prejudicial possession? Remember how universally the people ran into the idea of recalling Charles II., after living many years under a republican government. As to the second, was not the separation of the property from the perpetual use of lands a mere fiction? Is not its history well known, and the purposes for which it was introduced, to wit, the establishment of a military system of defence? Was it not afterwards made an engine of immense oppression? Is it wanting with us for the purpose of military defence? May not its other legal effects (such of them at least as are valuable) be performed in other more simple ways? Has it not been the practice of all other nations to hold their lands as their personal estate in absolute dominion? Are we not the better for what we have hitherto abolished of the Feudal system? Has not every restitution of the ancient Saxon laws had happy effects? Is it not better now that we return at once into that happy system of our ancestors, the wisest and most perfect ever yet devised by the wit of man, as it stood before the 8th century?—To ——. FORD ED., ii, 79. (Pa., 1776.) See COLONIES.

4385. LAND, Allotment.—From the nature and purpose of civil institutions, all the lands within the limits which any particular society has circumscribed around itself are assumed by that society, and subject to their allotment. This may be done by themselves assembled collectively, or by their legislature, to whom they may have delegated sovereign authority; and if they allotted in neither of these ways, each individual of the society, may appropriate to himself such lands as he finds vacant, and occupancy will give him title.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 139. FORD ED., i, 444. (1774.)

4386. LAND, Appropriation.—Unappropriated, or forfeited lands, shall be appropriated by the Administrator with the consent of the Privy Council.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 25. (June 1776.)

4387. ——. Lands heretofore holden of the crown in fee simple, and those hereafter to be appropriated, shall be holden in full and absolute dominion, of no superior whatever.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 25. (June 1776.)

4388. ——. Every person, of full age, neither owning nor having owned fifty acres of land, shall be entitled to an appropriation of fifty acres, or to so much as shall make up what he owns, or has owned in full and absolute dominion. And no other person shall be capable of taking an appropriation.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., II, 25. (June 1776.)

4389. LAND, Colonial conquest.—America was conquered, and her settlements made and firmly established at the expense of individuals, and not of the British public. Their own blood was spilt in acquiring lands for their settlement, their own fortunes expended in making that settlement effectual.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. I, 126. FORD ED., I, 430. (1774.)

4390. LAND, George III. and.—He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose * * * raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4391. LAND, People and.—It is too soon yet in our country to say that every man, who cannot find employment, but who can find uncultivated land, shall be at liberty to cultivate it, paying a moderate rent. But it is not too soon to provide, by every possible means, that as few as possible shall be without a little portion of land.—TO REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., VII, 36. (Pa., 1785.)

4392. — — — The small landholders are the most precious part of a State.—TO REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., VII, 36. (P., 1785.)

4393. LAND, Sovereignty.—That the lands within the limits assumed by a nation belong to the nation as a body, has probably been the law of every people on earth at some period of their history. A right of property in movable things is admitted before the establishment of government. A separate property in lands not till after that establishment. The right to movables is acknowledged by all the hordes of Indians surrounding us. Yet by no one of them has a separate property in lands been yielded to individuals. He who plants a field keeps possession till he has gathered the produce, after which one has as good a right as another to occupy it. Government must be established and laws provided, before lands can be separately appropriated, and their owner protected in his possession. Till then the property is in the body of the nation, and they, or their chief as trustee, must grant them to individuals, and determine the conditions of the grant.—BATTURE CASE. VIII, 539. (1812.)

4394. LAND, Valuation.—The Confederation, in its eighth article, decides that the quota of money to be contributed by the several States shall be proportioned to the value of landed property in the State. Experience has shown it impracticable to come at that value.—ANSWERS TO M. DE MEUNIER. IX, 286. FORD ED., IV, 141. (P., 1786.)

4395. — — — It seems * * * to be a principle of universal law that the lands of a country belong to its sovereign as trustee for the nation.—BATTURE CASE. VIII, 541. (1812.)

4396. LAND COMPANIES, Early western.—During the regal government, two companies, called the Loyal and the Ohio Companies, had obtained grants from the crown for 800,000 or 1,000,000 of acres of land, each, on the Ohio, on condition of settling them in a given number of years. They surveyed some, and settled them; but the war of 1755 came on, and broke up the settlements. After it was over, they petitioned for a renewal. Four other large companies then formed themselves, called the Mississippi, the Illinois, the Wabash, and the Indiana companies, each praying for immense quantities of land, some amounting to 200 miles square; so that they proposed to cover the whole country north between the Ohio and Mississippi, and a great portion of what is south. All these petitions were depending without any answer whatever from the crown, when the Revolution war broke out. The petitioners had associated to themselves some of the nobility of England, and most of the characters in America of great influence. When Congress assumed the government, they took some of their body in as partners, to obtain their influence; and I remember to have heard, at the time, that one of them took Mr. Gerard as a partner, expecting by that to obtain the influence of the French Court, to obtain grants of those lands which they had not been able to obtain from the British government. All these lands were within the limits of Virginia and that State determined, peremptorily that they never should be granted to large companies, but left open equally to all; and when they passed their land law (which I think was in 1778), they confirmed only so much of the lands of the Loyal company, as they had actually surveyed, which was a very small proportion, and annulled every other pretension. And when that State conveyed the lands to Congress (which was not till 1784), so determined were they to prevent their being granted to these or any other large companies, that they made it an express condition of the cession, that they should be applied first towards the soldiers' bounties, and the residue sold for the payment of the national debt, and for no other purpose. This disposition has been, accordingly, rigorously made, and is still going on; and Congress considers itself as having no authority to dispose of them otherwise.—TO J. M. DE RAYNEVAL. IV, 371. FORD ED., VIII, 19. (W., March 1801.)

4397. LAND TAX, Postponed.—The affluence of the Treasury has made it possible to go on a year longer without a land tax.—TO JOHN TAYLOR. FORD ED., VII, 181. (Pa., 1797.)

4398. — — — The land tax will not be brought on. The Secretary of the Treasury says he has money enough. No doubt * * * [this] may be taken up more boldly at the next session, when most of the elections will be over.—TO JAMES MADISON. IV, 205. FORD ED., VII, 189. (Pa., 1798.)

4399. LAND TAX, Proposed.—They [the federalists] already talk * * * of a land Tax. [This] will probably not be opposed. The only question will be how to modify it. On this there may be great diversity of sentiment. One party will want to make it a new course of patronage and expense.—TO JAMES MADISON. IV, 234. FORD ED., VII, 237. (Pa., 1798.)

4400. — — — If the expenses should exceed three millions they [the federalists] will undertake a land tax. Indeed a land tax is the decided resource of many, perhaps of a majority. There is an idea of some of the Connecticut members to raise the whole money wanted by a tax on salt; so much do they dread a land tax.—TO JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., VII, 243. (1798.)

4401. — — — The land tax is now on the carpet to raise two millions of dollars; yet I think they must at least double it. * * * I presume, therefore, the tax on lands, houses and negroes, will be a dollar a head on the population of each State.—To JAMES MONROE. IV, 242. FORD ED., vii, 256. (Pa., May 1798.)

4402. ——. The land tax was yesterday [May 30] debated, and a majority of six struck out the 13th section of the classification of houses, and taxing them by a different scale from the lands. Instead of this, is to be proposed a valuation of the houses and lands together.—To JAMES MADISON. IV, 244. FORD ED., vii, 261. (Pa., May 1798.)

4403. LANDS (Indian), Acquisition of title to.—The State of Georgia, having granted to certain individuals a tract of country, within their chartered limits, whereof the Indian right has never yet been acquired; with a proviso in the grants, which implies that those individuals may take measures for extinguishing the Indian rights under the authority of that Government, it becomes a question how far this grant is good? A society, taking possession of a vacant country, and declaring they mean to occupy it, does thereby appropriate to themselves as prime occupants what was before common. A practice introduced since the discovery of America, authorizes them to go further, and to fix the limits which they assume to themselves; and it seems, for the common good, to admit this right to a moderate and reasonable extent. If the country, instead of being altogether vacant, is thinly occupied by another nation, the right of the native forms an exception to that of the newcomers; that is to say, these will only have a right against all other nations except the natives. Consequently, they have the exclusive privilege of acquiring the native right by purchase or other just means. This is called the right of preemption, and is become a principle of the law of nations, fundamental with respect to America. There are but two means of acquiring the native title. First, war; for even war may, sometimes, give a just title. Second, contracts or treaty. The States of America before their present Union possessed completely, each within its own limits, the exclusive right to use these two means of acquiring the native title, and, by their act of Union, they have as completely ceded both to the General Government. Art. 2d, Section 1st, "The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur". Art. 1st, Section 8th, "The Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise and support armies". Section 10th, "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation. No State shall, without the consent of Congress, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay". These paragraphs of the Constitution, declaring that the General Government shall have, and that the particular ones shall not have, the right of war and treaty, are so explicit that no commentary can explain them further, nor can any explain them away. Consequently, Georgia, possessing the exclusive right to acquire the native title, but having relinquished the means of doing it to the General Government, can only have put her grantee into her own condition. She could convey to them the exclusive right to acquire; but she could not convey what she had not herself, that is, the means of acquiring. For these they must come to the General Government, in whose hands they have been wisely deposited for the purposes both of peace and justice. What is to be done? The right of the General Government is, in my opinion, to be maintained. The case is sound, and the means of doing it as practicable as can ever occur. But respect and friendship should, I think, mark the conduct of the General towards the particular government, and explanations should be asked and time and color given them to tread back their steps before coercion is held up to their view. I am told there is already a strong party in Georgia opposed to the act of their government. I should think it better, then, that the first measures, while firm, be yet so temperate as to secure their alliance and aid to the General Government. Might not the eclat of a proclamation revolt their pride and passion, and throw them hastily into the opposite scale? It will be proper, indeed, to require from the government of Georgia, in the first moment, that while the General Government shall be expecting and considering her explanations, things shall remain in statu quo, and not a move be made towards carrying what they have begun into execution.—OPINION ON GEORGIA LAND GRANTS. vii, 467. FORD ED., v, 165. (May 1790.)

4404. ——. No lands shall be appropriated until purchased of the Indian native proprietors; nor shall any purchases be made of them but on behalf of the public, by authority of acts of the General Assembly, to be passed for every purchase specially.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 25. (June 1776.)

4405. LANDS (Indian), Buying.—We, indeed, are always ready to buy land; but we will never ask but when you wish to sell; and our laws, in order to protect you against imposition, have forbidden individuals to purchase lands from you; and have rendered it necessary, when you desire to sell, even to a State, that an agent from the United States should attend the sale, see that your consent is freely given, a satisfactory price paid, and report to us what has been done, for your approbation.*—To BROTHER HANDSOME LAKE. viii, 188. (1802.)

4406. LANDS (Indian), Intrusions on.—Knowing your disposition to have these people [the Cherokee Indians] protected in the possession of their unpurchased lands, I take the liberty of mentioning to you that the old Tassel, in a late message to me, complains of intrusions on their lands, and particularly of some attempts to take from them the great island. This, by the late extension of our [Virginia] boundary, falling, as I understand, within your State [North Carolina], removes the application for protection to your Excellency, whose power alone can extend to the removal of intrusions from thence. As to so much of their lands as lie within our latitudes, as well as the lands of other Indians generally, our Assembly, now sitting, has in contemplation authorized the Executive to send patrols of the military through them from time to time to destroy the habitations which shall be erected in them by intruders.—To THE GOVERNOR OF NORTH CAROLINA. FORD ED., ii, 275. (Wg., 1779.)

4407. LANDS (Indian), Surrendering.—You have it peculiarly in your power to promote among the Indians a sense of the superior value of a little land, well cultivated, over a great deal unimproved, and to encourage them to make this estimate truly. The wisdom of the animal which amputates and abandons to the hunter the parts for which he is pursued should be theirs, with this difference, that the former sacrifices what is useful, the latter what is not.—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. iv, 467. FORD ED., viii, 214. (W., 1803.)

4408. LANDS (Indian), Virginia and.—That the lands of this colony [Virginia] were taken from the Indians by conquest, is not so general a truth as is supposed. I find in our histories and records, repeated proofs of purchase, which cover a considerable part of the lower country; and many more would doubtless be found on further search. The upper country, we know, has been acquired altogether by purchases made in the most unexceptionable form.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 339. FORD ED., iii, 196. (1782.)

4409. LANDS (Public), Disposition of.—The new plan of opening our land office, by dividing the lands among the States, and selling them at vendue, * * * separates still more the interests of the States, which ought to be made joint in every possible instance, in order to cultivate the idea of our being one nation, and to multiply the instances in which the people shall look to Congress as their head. And when the States get their portions, they will either fool them away, or make a job of it to serve individuals. Proofs of both these practices have been furnished, and by either of them that invaluable fund is lost, which ought to pay our public debt. To sell them at vendue, is to give them to the bidders of the day, be they many or few. It is ripping up the hen which lays golden eggs. If sold in lots at a fixed price, as first proposed, the best lots will be sold first; as these become occupied, it gives a value to the interjacent ones, and raises them, though of inferior quality, to the price of the first.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 347. FORD ED., iv, 52. (P., 1785.)

4410. LANDS (Public), Monopolies in.—Vast grants of land are entirely against the policy of our government. They have ever set their faces most decidedly against such monopolies.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., x, 202. (M., 1821.)

— LANDS (Public), Plan of land office.
—See WESTERN TERRITORY.

4411. LANDS (Public), Sale.—I am against selling the lands at all. The people who will migrate to the westward, whether they form part of the old or of a new colony, will be subject to their proportion of the Continental debt then unpaid. They ought not to be subject to more. They will be a people little able to pay taxes. There is no equity in fixing upon them the whole burthen of this war, or any other proportion than we bear ourselves. By selling the lands to them, you will disgust them, and cause an avulsion of them from the common union. They will settle the lands in spite of everybody.—To —. FORD ED., ii, 80. (Pa., 1776.)

4412. —. The idea of Congress selling out unlocated lands has been sometimes dropped, but we have always met the hint with such determined opposition that I believe it will never be proposed.—To —. FORD ED., ii, 80. (Pa., 1776.)

pose to sell them at auction for not less than a dollar an acre, receiving their own certificates of debt as money.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. i, 393. (P., 1785.)

4414. —. I am much pleased with your land ordinance, and think it improved from the first, in the most important circumstances. I had mistaken the object of the division of the lands among the States. I am sanguine in my expectations of lessening our debts by this fund, and have expressed my expectations to the minister and others here.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 407. FORD ED., iv, 86. (P., 1785.)

4415. —. Congress have purchased a very considerable extent of country from the Indians, and have passed an ordinance laying down rules for disposing of it. These admit only two considerations for granting lands: first, military service rendered during the late war; and secondly, money to be paid at the time of granting, for the purpose of discharging their national debt.—To MARQUIS DE PONCENS. i, 430. (P., 1785.)

4416. —. A provision for the sale of the vacant lands of the United States is particularly urged by the important considerations that they are pledged as a fund for reimbursing the public debt; that, if timely and judiciously applied, they may save the necessity of burthening our citizens with new taxes for the extinguishment of the principal; and that being free to pay annually but a limited proportion of that principal, time lost in beginning the payments cannot be recovered, however productive the resource may prove in event.—PARAGRAPH FOR PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE. FORD ED., v, 384. (1791.)

4417. LANDS (Public), Settlers.—It is said that wealthy foreigners will come in great numbers, and they ought to pay for the liberty we shall have provided for them. True, but make them pay in settlers. A foreigner who brings a settler for every one hundred or two hundred acres of land, to be granted him, pays a better price than if he had put into the public treasury five shillings, or five pounds. That settler will be worth to the public twenty times as much every year, as on our old plan he would have paid in one payment.—To —. FORD ED., ii, 80. (Pa., 1776.)

4418. —. I am clear that the lands should be appropriated in small quantities.—To —. FORD ED., ii, 80. (Pa., 1776.)

4419. —. I sincerely wish that your proposition to "purchase a tract of land in the Illinois on favorable terms, for introducing a colony of English farmers", may encounter no difficulties from the established rules of our land department. The general law prescribes an open sale, where all citizens may compete on an equal footing for any lot of land which attracts their choice. To dispense with this in any particular case, requires a special law of Congress, and to special legislation we are generally averse, lest a principle of favoritism should creep in and pervert that of equal rights. It has, however, been done on some occasions where a special national advantage has been expected to outweigh that of adherence to the general rule. The promised introduction of the culture of the vine procured a special law in favor of the Swiss settlement on the Ohio. That of the culture of oil, wine and other southern productions, did the same lately for the French settlement on the Tombigbee. It remains to be tried whether that of an improved system of farming, interesting to so great a proportion of our citizens, may not also be thought worth a dispensation with the general rule.—To GEORGE FLOWER. vii, 83. (P.F., 1817.)

4421. — — — There is indeed a clause in the act of Assembly which might, on first view, be thought to leave an opening for the introduction of force. It is that which says that judgment be rendered, if possession be forcibly detained by the party against whom it is, restitution may be made by the commissioners, or by any justice, in like manner as might be done in the case of lands holden by grant actually issued; a clause very necessary in our other western country, but not at all applicable to that part of it claimed by the State of Pennsylvania. By the laws of this Commonwealth

(the same in this instance with the English Law), even in the case of lands holden under actual grant, no restitution can be made after three years peaceable possession, a term much shorter than that of any bona fide possessions in the disputed territory. The latest of these must be of six or seven years' continuance, the present dispute having so long subsisted. The expediency and necessity, therefore, of the general measure of establishing this temporary Court, I doubt not but Congress will perceive and though it is to be wished that the disputed territory had been excepted from this jurisdiction, in order to avoid everything which might give jealousy or uneasiness to a sister State, or which might lead them into an apprehension that we meant to do any act which should wound the amity between us; yet I hope when Congress contemplates its effects, they will be sensible that it only amounts to a settlement on paper of the rights of individuals derived from this State, and that no man's possession or quiet can be disturbed in consequence of any proceedings under it, until our Legislature * * * shall have had time to settle finally with them this unfortunate dispute, or otherwise to provide against the evils they have apprehended.—To THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 294. (Wg., 1780.) See EARTH, GENERATIONS, WESTERN TERRITORY.

4423. LANGUAGE, Distorting.—When we see inspired writings made to speak whatever opposite controversialists wish them to say, we cannot ourselves expect to find language incapable of similar distortion. My expressions were general; their perversion is in their misapplication to a particular case.—To C. HAMMOND. vii, 216. (M., 1821.)

— LANGUAGE (English), Improvement of.—See NEOLOGY.

4424. LANGUAGE, Purists and.—I concur entirely with you in opposition to purists, who would destroy all strength and beauty of style, by subjecting it to a rigorous compliance with their rules. Fill up all the ellipses and syllepses of Tacitus, Sallust, Livy, &c., and the elegance and force of their sententious brevity are extinguished. "Auferre, trucidare, rapere, falsis nominibus, imperium appellat". "Deorum injurias, diis cura". "Alieni appetens, sui profusus; ardens in cupiditatibus: satis loquentia, sapientia parum". "Annibal, peto pacem". "Per diem Sol non uret te, neque Luna per noctem". Wire-draw these expressions by filling up the whole syntax and sense, and they become dull paraphrases on rich sentiments. We may say then truly with Quintilian, "Aliud est Grammaticæ, aliud Latine loqui". I am no friend, therefore, to what is called purism.—To JOHN WALDO. vi, 184. (M., 1813.)

4425. — — — I am not a friend to a scrupulous purism of style. I readily sacrifice the niceties of syntax to euphony and strength. It is by boldly neglecting the rigorisms of grammar that Tacitus has made himself the strongest writer in the world. The hyperaesthetics call him barbarous; but I should be sorry to exchange his barbarisms for their wire-drawn purisms. Some of his sentences are as strong as language can make them. Had he scrupulously filled up the whole of their syntax, they would have been merely common. To explain my meaning by an English example, I will quote the motto of one, I believe, of the regicides of Charles I., "Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God". Correct its syntax, "Rebellion against tyrants is obedience to God", it has lost all the strength and beauty of the antithesis.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 273. (M., 1823.)

4426. LANGUAGE, Science and.—I do not pretend that language is science. It is only an instrument for the attainment of science.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 389. FORD ED., iii, 253. (1782.)

4427. LANGUAGE, Style.—Style, in writing or speaking, is formed very early in life, while the imagination is warm, and impressions are permanent.—To J. BANNISTER. i, 468. (P., 1785.)

4428. LANGUAGE (Anglo-Saxon), Study of.—I learn from you with great pleasure that a taste is reviving in England for the recovery of the Anglo-Saxon dialect of our language; for a mere dialect it is, as much as those of Piers Plowman, Gower, Douglas, Chaucer, Spenser, Shakspeare, Milton, for even much of Milton is already antiquated. The Anglo-Saxon is only the earliest we possess of the many shades of mutation by which the language has tapered down to its modern form. Vocabularies we need for each of these stages from Somner to Bailey, but not grammars for each or any of them. The grammar has changed so little, in the descent from the earliest to the present form, that a little observation suffices to understand its variations. We are greatly indebted to the worthies who have preserved the Anglo-Saxon form, from Dr. Hickes down to Mr. Bosworth. Had they not given to the public what we possess through the press, that dialect would by this time have been irrecoverably lost. I think it, however, a misfortune that they have endeavored to give it too much of a learned form, to mount it on all the scaffolding of the Greek and Latin, to load it with their genders, numbers, cases, declensions, conjugations, &c. Strip it of these embarrassments, vest it in the Roman type which we have adopted instead of our English black letter, reform its uncouth orthography, and assimilate its pronunciation, as much as may be, to the present English, just as we do in reading Piers Plowman or Chaucer, and with the contemporary vocabulary for the few lost words, we understand it as we do them. For example, the Anglo-Saxon text of the Lord's Prayer, as given to us 6th Matthew, ix., is spelt and written thus, in the equivalent Roman type: Faeder ure thec the cart in heafenum, si thin nama ychalgod. To become thin rice. Gerrurthe thin willa on eartham, swa swa on heafenum. Ume doeghw amti can hlaf syle us to dæg. And forgyfus ure gyltas, swa swa we forgyfath urum gyltendum. And ne ge-lædde thu us on costnunge, æc alys us of yfele. I should spell and pronounce thus: "Father our, thou tha art in heavenum, si thine name y-hallowed. Come thin ric-y-wurth thine will on eartham, so so on heavenum: ourn daynhamlican loaf sell us to-day, and forgive us our guilts so we for-giveth ourum guiltendum. And no y-lead thou us on costnunge, ac a-lease us of evil". And here, it is to be observed by-the-bye, that there is but the single word "temptation" in our present version of this prayer that is not Anglo-

Saxon; for the word "trespasses" taken from the French (οπεληματα in the original), might as well have been translated by the Anglo-Saxon "guilts".

The learned apparatus in which Dr. Hickes and his successors have muffled our Anglo-Saxon, is what has frightened us from encountering it. The simplification I propose may, on the contrary, make it a regular part of our common English education. So little reading and writing was there among our Anglo-Saxon ancestors of that day, that they had no fixed orthography. To produce a given sound, every one jumbled the letters together, according to his unlettered notion of their power, and all jumbled them differently, just as would be done at this day, were a dozen peasants, who have learnt the alphabet, but have never read, desired to write the Lord's Prayer. Hence the varied modes of spelling by which the Anglo-Saxons meant to express the same sound. The word many, for example, was spelt in twenty different ways; yet we cannot suppose they were twenty different words, or that they had twenty different ways of pronouncing the same word. The Anglo-Saxon orthography, then, is not an exact representation of the sounds meant to be conveyed. We must drop in pronunciation the superfluous consonants, and give to the remaining letters their present English sound; because, not knowing the true one, the present enunciation is as likely to be right as any other, and indeed more so, and facilitates the acquisition of the language.*—To J. EVELYN DENISON. vii, 415. (M., 1825.)

4429. — [The cultivation of the Anglo-Saxon] is a hobby which too often runs away with me where I meant not to give up the rein. Our youth seem disposed to mount it with me, and to begin their course where mine is ending.—To J. EVELYN DENISON. vii, 418. (M., 1825.)

4430. — In a letter * * * to Mr. Crofts who sent * * * me a copy of his treatise on the English and German languages, as preliminary to an etymological dictionary he meditated, I went into explanations with him of an easy process for simplifying the study of the Anglo-Saxon, and lessening the terrors and difficulties presented by its rude alphabet, and unformed orthography.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 173. (M., 1820.)

4431. LANGUAGE (English), Dialects.—It is much to be wished that the publication of the present county dialects of England should go on. It will restore to us our language in all its shades of variation. It will incorporate into the present one all the riches of our ancient dialects; and what a store this will be, may be seen by running the eye over the county glossaries, and observing the words we have lost by abandonment and disuse, which in sound and sense are inferior to nothing we have retained. When these local vocabularies are published and digested together into a single one, it is probable we shall find that there is not a word in Shakspeare which is not now in use in some of the counties in England, and from whence we may obtain its true sense. And what an exchange will their recovery be for the volumes of idle commentaries and conjectures with which that divine poet has been masked and metamorphosed. We shall find in him new sublimities which we had never tasted before, and find beauties in our

4435. LANGUAGE (Greek), Ablative case in.—I owe you particular thanks for the copy of your translation of Buttman's Greek Grammar. * * * A cursory view of it promises me a rich mine of valuable criticism. I observe he goes with the herd of grammarians in denying an Ablative case to the Greek language. I cannot concur with him in that, but think with the Messrs. of Port Royal who admit an Ablative. And why exclude it? Is it because the Dative and Ablative in Greek are always of the same form? Then there is no Ablative to the Latin plurals, because in them, as in Greek, these cases are always in the same form. The Greeks recognized the Ablative under the appellation of the πρῶσις ἀπαρετιχη, which I have met with and noted from some of the scholiasts, without recollecting where. Stephens, Scapula, Hederic acknowledge it as one of the significations of the word ἀπαρεμανκος. That the Greeks used it can not be denied. For one of multiplied examples which may be produced take the following from the Hippolytus of Euripides: "εἶπε τῷ τροπῶ, δικῆς ἔκασιν αὐτοῦ ροκτροῦ," "dice quo modo iustitia clava percussit eum" "Quo modo" are Ablatives, then why not τῷ τροπῶ? And translating it into English, should we use the Dative* or Ablative preposition? It is not perhaps easy to define very critically what constitutes a case in the declension of nouns. All agree as to the Nominative that it is simply the name of the thing. If we admit that a distinct case is constituted by any accident or modification which changes the relation which that bears to the actors or action of the sentence, we must agree to the six cases at least; because for example, to a thing, and from a thing are very different accidents to the thing. It may be said that if every distinct accident or change of relation constitutes a different case, then there are in every language as many cases as there are prepositions; for this is the peculiar office of the preposition. But because we do not designate by special names all the cases to which a noun is liable, is that a reason why we should throw away half of those we have, as is done by those grammarians who reject all cases, but the Nominative, Genitive, and Accusative, and in a less degree by those also who reject the Ablative alone? As pushing the discrimination of all the possible cases to extremities leads us to nothing useful or practicable, I am contented with the old six cases, familiar to every cultivated language, ancient and modern, and well understood by all. I acknowledge myself at the same time not an adept in the metaphysical speculations of Grammar. By analyzing too minutely we often reduce our subject to atoms, of which the mind loses its hold.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 272. (M., 1823.)

4436. LANGUAGE (Greek), Accent.—Against reading Greek by accent, instead of quantity, as Mr. Ciccitera, proposes, I raise both my hands. What becomes of the sublime measure of Homer, the full sounding rhythm of Demosthenes, if, abandoning quantity, you chop it up by accent? What ear can hesitate in its choice between the two following rhythms? "Τὸν, δ' ἀπαμειβόμενος προσεφῇ πόδας ὠκὺς Ἀχιλλεύς, Τὸν δ' ἀπαμειβόμενος προσεφῇ πόδας ὠχὺς Ἀχιλλεύς."

the latter noted according to prosody, the former by accent, and dislocating our teeth in its utterance; every syllable of it, except the first and last, being pronounced against quantity. And what becomes of the art of prosody? Is that perfect coincidence of its rules with the structure of their verse, merely accidental? or was it of design, and yet for no use?—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 114. (M., 1819.)

4437. ——. Of the origin of accentuation, I have never seen satisfactory proofs. But I have generally supposed the accents were intended to direct the inflections and modulations of the voice; but not to affect the quantity of the syllables.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 115. (M., 1819.)

4438. LANGUAGE (Greek), Pronunciation.—Mr. Pickering's pamphlet on the pronunciation of the Greek, for which I am indebted to you, I have read with great pleasure. Early in life, the idea occurred to me that the people now inhabiting the ancient seats of the Greeks and Romans, although their languages in the intermediate ages had suffered great changes, and especially in the declension of their nouns, and in the terminations of their words generally, yet having preserved the body of the word radically the same, so they would preserve more of its pronunciation. That, at least, it was probable that a pronunciation, handed down by tradition, would retain, as the words themselves do, more of the original than that of any other people whose language has no affinity to that original. For this reason I learned, and have used the Italian pronunciation of the Latin. But that of the modern Greeks I had no opportunity of learning until I went to Paris. There I became acquainted with two learned Greeks, Count Carberri, and Mr. Paradise, and with a lady, a native Greek, the daughter of Baron de Tott, who did not understand the ancient language. Carberri and Paradise both spoke it. From these instructors I learned the modern pronunciation, and in general trusted to its orthodoxy. I say, in general, because sound being more fugitive than the written letter, we must, after such a lapse of time, presume in it some degeneracies, as we see there are in the written words. We may not, indeed, be able to put our finger on them confidently, yet neither are they entirely beyond the reach of all indication. For example, in a language so remarkable for the euphony of its sounds, if that euphony is preserved in particular combinations of its letters, by an adherence to the powers ordinarily ascribed to them, and is destroyed by a change of these powers, and the sound of the word, thereby, rendered harsh, inharmonious, and indidiomatic, here we may presume some degeneracy has taken place.

While, therefore, I gave in to the modern pronunciation generally, I have presumed, as an instance of degeneracy, their ascribing the same sound to the six letters, or combinations of letters, e, z, v, et, ot, vt, to all of which they give the sound of our double e in the word meet. This useless equivalence of three vowels and three diphthongs did not probably exist among the ancient Greeks; and the less probably as, while this single sound, ee, is overcharged by so many different representative characters, the sounds we usually give to these characters and combinations would be left without any representative signs. This would imply either that they had not these sounds in their language, or no signs for their expression. Probability appears to me, therefore, against the practice of the modern Greeks of giving the same sound to all these different representatives, and to be in favor of that of foreign nations, who, adopting the Roman characters, have assimilated to them, in a considerable degree, the powers of the corresponding Greek letters. I have, accordingly, excepted this in my adoption of the modern pronunciation.

I have been more doubtful in the use of the av, ev, nv, ov, sounding the v, upsilon, as our f or v, because I find traces of that power of v, or of v, in some modern languages. To go no further than our own, we have it in laugh, cough, trough, enough. The county of Louisa, adjacent to that in which I live, was, when I was a boy, universally pronounced Lovisa. That it is not the gh which gives the sound of f or v, in these words, is proved by the orthography of plough, trough, thought, fraught, caught. The modern Greeks themselves, too, giving up v, upsilon, in ordinary, the sound of our ee, strengthens the presumption that its anomalous sound of f or v, is a corruption. The same may be inferred from the cacophony of ελαφνε (elavne) for ελαυνε (elawne.) Αχιλλεφς (Achillefs) for Αχιλλεως (Achilleise.) εφς (eves) for εϋς (ee-use,) οφκ (ovk) for σκ (ouk,) οφιος (ovetos) for οϋρος (o-u-tos,) Ζεφς (zevs) for Ζεως (zese,) of which all nations have made their Jupiter; and the uselessness of the v in ευφωνια, which would otherwise have been spelt εφωνια. I, therefore, except this also from what I consider as approvable pronunciation.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 112. (M., 1819.)

4439. ——. Should Mr. Pickering ultimately establish the modern pronunciation of the letters without any exception, I shall think it a great step gained, and giving up my exceptions, shall willingly rally to him.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 115. (M., 1819.)

4440. ——. If we adhere to the Erasmian pronunciation we must go to Italy for it, as we must do for the most probably correct pronunciation of the language of the Romans, because rejecting the modern, we must argue that the ancient pronunciation was probably brought from Greece, with the language itself; and, as Italy was the country to which it was brought, and from which it emanated to other nations, we must presume it better preserved there than with the nations copying from them, who would be apt to affect its pronunciation with some of their own national peculiarities. And in fact, we find that no two nations pronounce it alike, although all pretend to the Erasmian pronunciation. But the whole subject is conjectural, and allows, therefore, full and lawful scope to the vagaries of the human mind. I am glad, however, to see the question stirred here; because it may excite among our young countrymen a spirit of enquiry and criticism, and lead them to more attention to this most beautiful of all languages.—To MR. MOORE. vii, 137. (M., 1819.)

4441. ——. I have little hope of the recovery of the ancient pronunciation of that finest of human languages, but still I rejoice at the attention the subject seems to excite with you, because it is an evidence that our country begins to have a taste for something more than merely as much Greek as will pass a candidate for clerical ordination.—To JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 131. (P.F., 1819.)

4442. LANGUAGE (Greek), Revival of. —The modern Greek is not yet so far departed from its ancient model, but that we might still hope to see the language of Homer and Demosthenes flow with purity from the lips of a free and ingenious people.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 400. (P., 1785.)

4443. ——. I cannot help looking forward * * * to the language of Homer becoming again a living language, as among possible events.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 267. FORD ED., iv, 444. (P., 1787.)

4444. ——. I enjoy Homer in his own language infinitely beyond Pope's translation of him, and both beyond the dull narrative of the same events by Dares Phrygius; and it is an innocent enjoyment.*—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 317. FORD ED., vii, 414. (Pa., 1800.) See LANGUAGE (LATIN).

4445. LANGUAGE (Italian), French, Spanish and.—I fear the learning of Italian will confound your French and Spanish. Being all of them degenerated dialects of the Latin, they are apt to mix in conversation. I have never seen a person speaking the three languages, who did not mix them. It is a delightful language, but late events having rendered the Spanish more useful, lay it aside to prosecute that.—To PETER CARR. ii, 237. FORD ED., iv, 428. (P., 1787.)

4446. ——. To a person who would make a point of reading and speaking French and Spanish, I should doubt the utility of learning Italian. These three languages, being all degeneracies from the Latin, resemble one another so much, that I doubt the probability of keeping in the head a distinct knowledge of them all. I suppose that he who learns them all, will speak a compound of the three, and neither perfectly.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. ii, 177. FORD ED., iv, 405. (P., 1787.)

4447. LANGUAGE (Latin), A luxury. —To read the Latin and Greek authors in their original, is a sublime luxury; and I deem luxury in science to be at least as justifiable as in architecture, painting, gardening, or the other arts.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 316. FORD ED., vii, 414. (Pa., 1800.)

4448. ——. I thank on my knees, him who directed my early education, for having put into my possession this rich source of delight; and I would not exchange it for anything which I could then have acquired, and have not since acquired.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 317. FORD ED., vii, 414. (Pa., 1800.)

4449. LANGUAGE (Latin), Models of composition.—I think the Greeks and Romans have left us the present [purest?] models which exist of fine composition, whether we examine them as works of reason, or of style and fancy; and to them we probably owe these characteristics of modern composition. I know of no composition of any other ancient people, which merits the least regard as a model for its matter or style.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 316. FORD ED., vii, 414. (Pa., 1800.)

4450. ——. The utilities we derive from the remains of the Greek and Latin languages are, first as models of pure taste in writing. To these we are certainly indebted for the natural and chaste style of modern composition, which so much distinguishes the nations to whom these languages are familiar. Without these models we should probably have continued the inflated style of our northern ancestors, or the hyperbolic and vague one of the East.—To JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 131. (1819.)

4451. LANGUAGE (Latin), Reading.—We [University of Virginia] must get rid of this Connecticut Latin, of this barbarous confusion of long and short syllables, which renders doubtful whether we are listening to a reader of Cherokee, Shawnee, Iroquois, or what.—To WM. B. GILES. vii, 429. FORD ED., x, 357. (M., 1825.)

4452. LANGUAGE (Latin), Study of.—The learning of Greek and Latin, I am told, is going into disuse in Europe. I know not what their manners and occupations may call for; but it would be very ill-judged in us to follow their example in this instance.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 389. FORD ED., iii, 253. (1782.)

4453. LANGUAGE (Latin), Utility of.—To whom are they [the classical languages] useful? Certainly not to all men. There are conditions of life to which they must be forever estranged. * * * To the moralist they are valuable, because they furnish ethical writings highly and justly esteemed; although in my own opinion the moderns are far advanced beyond them in this line of science; the divine finds in the Greek language a translation of his primary code, of more importance to him than the original because better understood; and, in the same language, the newer code, with the doctrines of the earliest fathers. * * * The lawyer finds in the Latin language the system of civil law most conformable with the principles of justice of any which has ever yet been established among men, and from which much has been incorporated into our own. The physician as good a code of his art as has been given us to this day. * * * The statesman will find in these languages history, politics, mathematics, ethics, eloquence, love of country, to which he must add the sciences of his own day, for which of them should be unknown to him? And all the sciences must recur to the classical languages for the etymon, and sound understanding of their fundamental terms.

* * * To sum the whole, it may truly be said that the classical languages are a solid basis for most, and an ornament to all the sciences.—To JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 131. (P.F., 1819.)

4454. LANGUAGE (Spanish), Important to know.—Our future connection with Spain renders that the most necessary of the modern languages, after the French. When you become a public man, you may have occasion for it, and the circumstance of your possessing that language, may give you a preference over other candidates.*—To PETER CARR. i, 399. (P., 1785.)

4455. ——. Bestow great attention on the Spanish language, and endeavor to acquire an accurate knowledge of it. Our future connections with Spain and Spanish America, will render that language a valuable acquisition. The ancient history of a great part of America, too, is written in that language.—To PETER CARR. ii, 238. FORD ED., iv, 428. (P., 1787.)

4456. ——. Next to French, the Spanish [language] is most important to an American. Our connection with Spain is already important, and will become daily more so. Besides this, the ancient part of American history is written chiefly in Spanish.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. ii, 177. FORD ED., iv, 405. (P., 1787.)

4457. ——. Apply yourself to the study of the Spanish language with all the assiduity you can. It and the English covering nearly the whole face of America, they should be well known to every inhabitant, who means to look beyond the limits of his farm.—To PETER CARR. ii, 409. (P., 1788.)

4458. LANGUAGES, Filiation of.—I have long considered the filiation of languages as the best proof we can ever obtain of the filiation of nations.—To JOHN S. VATER. v, 599. (M., 1812.)

4459. LANGUAGES, Learning.—In general, I am of opinion, that till the age of about sixteen, we are best employed on languages; Latin, Greek, French, and Spanish. * * * I think Greek the least useful.—To J. W. EPPES. ii, 192. (P., 1787.)

4461. LANGUAGES, Perfect Knowledge of.—No instance exists of a person's writing two languages perfectly. That will always appear to be his native language, which was most familiar to him in his youth.—To J. BANNISTER. i, 468. (P., 1785.)

4462. ——. I am of opinion that there never was an instance of a man's writing or speaking his native tongue with elegance, who passed from fifteen to twenty years of age out of the country where it was spoken.—To J. BANNISTER. i, 468. (P., 1785.)

compositions have immortalized him with themselves.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 509. (M., 1815.)

4464. LANGUAGES, Utility.—I omitted to say anything of the languages as part of our proposed [Virginia] University. It was not that I think, as some do, that they are useless. I am of a very different opinion. I do not think them very essential to the obtaining eminent degrees of science; but I think them very useful towards it.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLY. iv, 316. FORD ED., vii, 413. (Pa., 1800.)

4465. LANGUAGES (Indian), Cherokee.—Your Cherokee grammar * * * I have gone over with attention and satisfaction. We generally learn languages for the benefit of reading the books written in them. But here our reward must be the addition made to the philosophy of language. In this point of view your analysis of the Cherokee adds valuable matter for reflection and strengthens our desire to see more of these languages as scientifically elucidated. Their grammatical devices for the modification of their words by a syllable prefixed to, or inserted in the middle, or added to its end, and by other combinations so different from ours, prove that if man came from one stock, his languages did not. A late grammarian has said that all words were originally monosyllables. The Indian languages disprove this. I should conjecture that the Cherokees, for example, have formed their language not by single words, but by phrases. I have known some children learn to speak, not by a word at a time, but by whole phrases. Thus the Cherokee has no name for "father" in the abstract, but only as combined with some one of his relations. A complex idea being a fasciculus of simple ideas bundled together, it is rare that different languages make up their bundles alike, and hence the difficulty of translating from one language to another. European nations have so long had intercourse with one another, as to have approximated their complex expressions much towards one another. But I believe we shall find it impossible to translate our language into any of the Indian, or any of theirs into ours. I hope you will pursue your undertaking, and that others will follow your example with other of their languages. It will open a wide field for reflection on the grammatical organization of languages, their structure and character. I am persuaded that among the tribes on our two continents a great number of languages, radically different, will be found. It will be curious to consider how so many, so radically different, have been preserved by such small tribes in coterminous settlements of moderate extent. I had once collected about thirty vocabularies formed of the same English words, expressive of such simple objects only as must be present and familiar to every one under these circumstances. They were unfortunately lost. But I remember that on a trial to arrange them into families or dialects, I found in one instance that about half a dozen might be so classed, in another perhaps three or four. But I am sure that a third, at least, if not more, were perfectly insulated from each other. Yet this is the only index by which we can trace their filiation.—To ——. vii, 399. (M., 1825.)

4466. LANGUAGES (Indian), Vocabularies of.—I had through the course of my life availed myself of every opportunity of procuring vocabularies of the languages of every [Indian] tribe which either myself or my friends could have access to. They amounted to about forty, more or less perfect. But in their passage from Washington to Monticello the trunk in which they were was stolen and plundered, and some fragments only of the vocabularies were recovered. Still, however, they were such as would be worth incorporation with a larger work, and shall be at the service of the historical committee, if they can make any use of them.—To MR. DUPONCEAU. vii, 92. (M., 1817.) See ABORIGINES and INDIANS.

4467. LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE, Astronomy and.—Measures and rhombs taken on the special surface of the earth, cannot be represented on a plain surface of paper without astronomical corrections; and paradoxical as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that we cannot know the relative position of two places on the earth, but by interrogating the sun, moon and stars.—To GOVERNOR NICHOLAS. vi, 587. (P.F., 1816.)

4468. LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE, Chronometers and.—Fine time-keepers have been invented, but not equal to what is requisite, all of them deriving their motion from a spring, and not from a pendulum. Indeed these pursuits have lost much of their consequence since the improvement of the lunar tables has given the motion of the moon so accurately, as to make that a foundation for estimating the longitude by her relative position at a given moment with the sun or fixed stars.—To CAPTAIN GROVE. v, 374. (W., 1808.)

4469. LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE, Jupiter's Eclipses.—To get the longitude at sea by observation of the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites, two desiderata are wanting: 1st, a practicable way of keeping the planet and satellite in the field of a glass magnifying sufficiently to show the satellites; 2nd, a time-piece which will give the instant of time with sufficient accuracy to be useful. The bringing the planet and satellite to the horizon does not sensibly facilitate the observation, because the planet in his ascending and descending course is at such heights as admit the direct observation with entire convenience. On the other hand, so much light is lost by the double reflection as to dim the objects and lessen the precision with which the moment of ingress and egress may be marked. This double reflection also introduces a new source of error from the inaccuracy of the instrument; 3d, the desideratum of a time-piece which, notwithstanding the motion of the ship, shall keep time during a whole voyage with sufficient accuracy for these observations, has not yet been supplied.—To CAPTAIN GROVE. v, 374. (W., 1808.)

4470. LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE, Lunar observations.—While Captain Lewis's mission was preparing, as it was understood that his reliance for his longitudes must be on the lunar observations taken, as at sea, with the aid of a time-keeper, and I knew that a thousand accidents might happen to that in such a journey as his, and thus deprive us of the principal object of the expedition, to wit, the ascertaining the geography of that river, I set myself to consider whether in making observations at land, that furnishes no resource which may dispense with the time-keeper, so necessary at sea. It occurred to me that we can always have a meridian at land that would furnish what the want of it at sea obliges us to supply by the time-keeper. Supposing Captain Lewis then furnished with a meridian, and having the requisite tables and nautical almanac with him,—first, he might find the right ascension of the moon, when on the meridian of Greenwich, on any given day; then find by observation when the moon should attain that right ascension (by the aid of a known star), and measure her distance in that moment from his meridian. This distance would be the difference of longitude between Greenwich and the place of observation. Or secondly, observe the moon's passage over his meridian, and her right ascension at that moment. See by the tables at Greenwich when she had that right ascension. That gives her distance from the meridian of Greenwich, when she was on his meridian. Or thirdly, observe the moon's distance from his meridian at any moment, and her right ascension at that moment; and find from the tables her distance from the meridian of Greenwich, when she had that right ascension, which will give the distance of the two meridians. This last process will be simplified by taking, for the moment of observation, that of an appulse of the moon and a known star, or when the moon and a known star are in the same vertical. I suggested this to Mr. Briggs, who considered it as correct and practicable, and proposed communicating it to the Philosophical Society; but I observed that it was too obvious not to have been thought of before, and supposed it had not been adopted in practice, because of no use at sea, where a meridian cannot be had, and where alone the nations of Europe had occasion for it. Before his confirmation of the idea, however, Captain Lewis was gone. In conversation afterwards with Baron von Humboldt, he observed that the idea was correct, but not new; that I would find it in the third volume of Delalandé. I received, two days ago, the third and fourth volumes of Montucla's History of Mathematics, finished and edited by Delalandé; and find, in fact, that Morin and Vanlangren, in the Seventeenth Century, proposed observations of the moon on the meridian, but it does not appear whether they meant to dispense with the time-keeper. But a meridian at sea being too impracticable, their idea was not pursued.—To MR. DUNBAR. iv, 578. (W., 1805.)

4471. LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE, Magnetic needle.—Among other projects with which we begin to abound in America, is one for finding the latitude by the variation of the magnetic needle. The author supposes two points, one near each pole, through the northern of which pass all the magnetic meridians of the northern hemisphere, and through the southern those of the southern hemisphere. He determines their present position and periodical revolution.—To B. VAUGHAN. ii, 166. (P., 1787.)

4473. LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE, Without chronometer*.—If two persons, at different points of the same hemisphere (as Greenwich and Washington, for example), observe the same celestial phenomenon, at the same instant of time, the difference of the times marked by their respective clocks is the difference of their longitudes, or the distance of their meridians. * To catch with precision the same instant of time for these simultaneous observations, the moon's motion in her orbit is the best element; her change of place (about a half second of space in a second of time) is rapid enough to be ascertained by a good instrument with sufficient precision for the object. But suppose the observer at Washington, or in a desert, to be without a timekeeper; the equatorial is the instrument to be used in that case. Again, we have supposed a contemporaneous observer at Greenwich. But his functions may be supplied by the nautical almanac, adapted to that place, and enabling us to calculate for any instant of time the meridian distances there of the heavenly bodies necessary to be observed for this purpose. The observer at Washington, choosing the time when their position is suitable, is to adjust his equatorial to his meridian, to his latitude, and to the plane of his horizon; or if he is in a desert where neither meridian nor latitude is yet ascertained, the advantages of this noble instrument are that it enables him to find both in the course of a few hours. Thus prepared, let him ascertain by observation the right ascension of the moon from that of a known star, or their horary distance; and, at the same instant, her horary distance from his meridian. Her right ascension at the instant thus ascertained, enter with that of the nautical almanac, and calculate, by its tables, what was her horary distance from the meridian of Greenwich at the instant she had attained that point of right ascension, or that horary distance from the same star. The addition of these meridian distances, if the moon was between the two meridians, or the subtraction of the lesser from the greater, if she was on the same side of both, is the difference of their longitudes. This general theory admits different cases, of which the observer may avail himself, according to the particular position of the heavenly bodies at the moment of observation. Case 1st. When the moon is on his meridian, or on that of Greenwich. Second. When the star is on either meridian. Third. When the moon and star are on the same side of his meridian. Fourth. When they are on different sides. For instantaneousness of observation, the equatorial has great advantage over the circle or sextant; for being truly placed in the meridian beforehand, the telescope may be directed sufficiently in advance of the moon's motion, for time to note its place on the equatorial circle, before she attains that point. Then observe, until her limb touches the cross-hairs; and in that instant direct the telescope to the star; that completes the observation, and the place of the star may be read at leisure. The apparatus for correcting the effects of refraction and parallax, which is fixed on the eye-tube of the telescope, saves time by rendering the notation of altitudes unnecessary, and dispenses with the use of either a timekeeper or portable pendulum. I have observed that, if placed in a desert where neither meridian nor latitude is yet ascertained, the equatorial enables the observer to find both in a few hours. For the latitude, adjust by the cross-levels the azimuth plane of the instrument to the horizon of the place. Bring down the equatorial plane to an exact parallelism with it, its pole then becoming vertical. By the nut and pinion commanding it, and by that of the semi-circle of declination, direct the telescope to the sun. Follow its path with the telescope by the combined use of these two pinions, and when it has attained its greatest altitude, calculate the latitude as when taken by a sextant. For finding the meridian, set the azimuth circle to the horizon, elevate the equatorial circle to the complement of the latitude, and fix it by the clamp and tightening screw of the two brass segments of arches below. By the declination semicircle set the telescope to the sun's declination of the moment. Turn the instrument towards the meridian by guess, and by the combined movement of the equatorial and azimuth circles direct the telescope to the sun, then by the pinion of the equatorial alone, follow the path of the sun with the telescope. If it swerves from that path, turn the azimuth circle until it shall follow the sun accurately. A distant stake or tree should mark the meridian, to guard against its loss by any accidental jostle of the instrument. The 12 o'clock line will then be in the true meridian, and the axis of the equatorial circle will be parallel with that of the earth. The instrument is then in its true position for the observations of the night.—To ———. vii, 226. (M., 1821.) See LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION.

4474. LATROBE (B. H.), Building of U. S. Capitol.—My memory retains no trace of the particular conversations alluded to [by you *], nor enables me to say that they are or are not correct. The only safe appeal for me is to the general impressions received at the time, and still retained with sufficient distinctness. These were that you discharged the duties of your appointment with ability, diligence and zeal, but that in the article of expense you were not sufficiently guarded. You must remember my frequent cautions to you on this head, the measures I took, by calling for frequent accounts of expenditures and contracts, to mark to you, as well as to myself, when they were getting beyond the limits of the appropriations, and the afflicting embarrassments on a particular occasion where these limits had been unguardedly and greatly transcended. These sentiments I communicated to you freely at the time, as it was my duty to do. Another principle of conduct with me was to admit no innovations on the established plans, but on the strongest grounds. When, therefore, I thought first of placing the floor of the Representative chamber on the level of the basement of the building, and of throwing into its height the cavity of the dome, in the manner of the Halle aux Bleds at Paris, I deemed it due to Dr. Thornton, author of the plan of the Capitol, to consult him on the change. He not only consented, but appeared heartily to approve of the alteration. For the same reason, as well as on motives of economy, I was anxious, in converting the Senate chamber into a Judiciary room, to preserve its original form, and to leave the same arches and columns standing. On your representation, however, that the columns were decayed and incompetent to support the incumbent weight, I acquiesced in the weight you proposed, only striking out the addition which would have made part of the middle building, and would involve a radical change in that which had not been sanctioned. I have no reason to doubt but that in the execution of the Senate and Court rooms, you have adhered to the plan communicated to me and approved. * * * On the whole, I do not believe any one has ever done more justice to your professional abilities than myself. Besides constant commendations of your taste in architecture, and science in execution, I declared on many and all occasions that I considered you as the only person in the United States who could have executed the Representative Chamber, or who could execute the middle buildings on any of the plans proposed.—To BENJAMIN H. LATROBE. v, 578. (M., 1811.) See ARCHITECTURE.

4475. LATROBE (B. H.), Burr's Treason and.—I believe we shall send on Latrobe as a witness. He will prove that Aaron Burr endeavored to get him to engage several thousand men, chiefly Irish emigrants, whom he had been in the habit of employing in the works he directs, under pretence of a canal opposite Louisville, or of the Washita, in which, had he succeeded, he could with that force alone have carried everything before him, and would not have been where he now is. He knows, too, of certain meetings of Burr, Bollman, Yrjnjo, and one other whom we have never named yet, but have him not the less in our view.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 99. FORD ED., ix, 58. (W., June 1807.)

4476. ———. I have had a conversation with Latrobe. He says it was five hundred men he was desired to engage. The pretexes were, to work on the Ohio canal, and be paid in Washita lands. Your witnesses will some of them prove that Burr had no interest in the Ohio canal, and that consequently this was a mere pretext to cover the real object from the men themselves, and all others.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 100. 4480. LAW, Construing.—Constructions which do not result from the words of the Legislator, but lie hidden in his breast, till called forth, ex post facto, by subsequent occasions, are dangerous and not to be justified by ordinary emergencies.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 138. (1778.)

4481. ———. Constructions must not be favored which go to defeat instead of furthering the principal object of the law and to sacrifice the end to the means.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 159. FORD ED., ix, 94. (M., 1807.)

4482. ——. Ingenuity ever should be exercised [in executive cases] in devising constructions which may save to the public the benefit of the law. Its intention is the important thing; the means of attaining quite subordinate.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 159 FORD ED., ix, 94. (M., 1807.)

4483. ——. In the construction of a law, even in judiciary cases of meum et tuum where the opposite parties have a right and counter-right in the very words of the law, the judge considers the intention of the law-giver as his true guide, and gives to all the parts and expressions of the law, that meaning which will effect, instead of defeating, its intention. But in laws merely executive, where no private right stands in the way, and the public object is the interest of all, a much freer scope of construction, in favor of the intention of the law, ought to be taken, and ingenuity ever should be exercised in devising constructions, which may save to the public the benefit of the law. Its intention is the important thing: the means of attaining it quite subordinate. It often happens that, the Legislature prescribing the details of execution, some circumstance arises unforeseen or unattended to by them, which would totally frustrate their intention, were their details scrupulously adhered to, and deemed exclusive of all others. But constructions must not be favored which go to defeat instead of furthering the principal object of the law, and to sacrifice the end to the means. It being as evidently their intention that the end shall be attained as that it should be effected by any given means, if both cannot be observed, we are equally free to deviate from the one as the other, and more rational in postponing the means to the end. * * * It is further to be considered that the Constitution gives the Executive a general power to carry the laws into execution. If the present law had enacted that the service of 30,000 volunteers should be accepted, without saying anything of the means, those means would, by the Constitution, have resulted to the discretion of the Executive. So if means specified by an act are impracticable, the constitutional power remains and supplies them. Often the means provided specially are affirmative merely, and, with the constitutional powers, stand well together; so that either may be used, or the one supplementary to the other. This aptitude of means to the end of a law is essentially necessary for those which are executive; otherwise the objection that our government is an impracticable one, would really be verified.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 158. FORD ED., ix, 94. (M., Aug. 1807.)

4484. ——. The true key for the construction of everything doubtful in a law, is the intention of the law givers. This is most safely gathered from the words, but may be sought also in extraneous circumstances, provided they do not contradict the express words of the law.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 91. (M., 1808.)

4485. ——. The omission of a caution which would have been right, does not justify the doing what is wrong. Nor ought it to be presumed that the Legislature meant to use a phrase in an unjustifiable sense, if by rules of construction it can be ever strained to what is just.—To ISAAC MCPHERSON. vi, 176. (M., 1813.)

4486. ——. The question whether the judges are invested with exclusive authority to decide on the constitutionality of a law, has been heretofore a subject of consideration with me in the exercise of official duties. Certainly there is not a word in the Constitution which has given that power to them more than to the Executive or Legislative branches. Questions of property, of character and of crime being ascribed to the judges, through a definite course of legal proceeding, laws involving such questions belong, of course, to them; and as they decide on them ultimately and without appeal, they of course decide for themselves. The constitutional validity of the law or laws again prescribing Executive action, and to be administered by that branch ultimately and without appeal, the Executive must decide for themselves also, whether, under the Constitution, they are valid or not. So also as to laws governing the proceedings of the Legislature, that body must judge for itself the constitutionality of the law, and equally without appeal or control from its coordinate branches. And, in general, that branch which is to act ultimately, and without appeal, on any law, is the rightful expositor of the validity of the law, uncontrolled by the opinions of the other coordinate authorities.—To W. H. TORRANCE. vi, 461. FORD ED., ix, 517. (M., 1815.)

4487. ——. It may be said that contradictory decisions may arise in such case, and produce inconvenience. This is possible, and is a necessary failing in all human proceedings. Yet the prudence of the public functionaries, and authority of public opinion, will generally produce accommodation. Such an instance of difference occurred between the judges of England (in the time of Lord Holt) and the House of Commons, but the prudence of those bodies prevented inconvenience from it. So in the cases of Duane and of William Smith, of South Carolina, whose characters of citizenship stood precisely on the same ground, the judges in a question of meum and tuum which came before them, decided that Duane was not a citizen; and in a question of membership, the House of Representatives, under the same words of the same provision, adjudged William Smith to be a citizen. This is what I believe myself to be sound.—To W. H. TORRANCE. vi, 462. FORD ED., ix, 518. (M., 1815.)

4488. ——. There is another opinion entertained by some men of such judgment and information as to lessen my confidence in my own. That is, that the Legislature alone is the exclusive expounder of the sense of the Constitution, in every part of it whatever. And they allege in its support, that this branch has authority to impeach and punish a member of either of the others acting contrary to its declaration of the sense of the Constitution. It may, indeed, be answered that an act may still be valid although the party is punished for it, right or wrong. However, this opinion which ascribes exclusive exposition to the Legislature, merits respect for its safety, there being in the body of the nation a control over them, which, if expressed by rejection on the subsequent exercise of their elective franchise, enlists public opinion against their exposition, and encourages a judge or executive on a future occasion to adhere to their former opinion. Between these two doctrines, every one has a right to choose, and I know of no third meriting any respect.—To W. H. TORRANCE. vi, 462. FORD ED., ix, 518. (M., 1815.)

4489. 4494. LAW, Execution of.—The execution of the laws is more important than the making them.—To M. L'ABBÉ ARNOND. iii, 82. FORD ED., v, 104. (P., 1789.)

4495. LAW, Executive discretion and.—There are cases in the books where the word "may" has been adjudged equivalent to "shall", but the term "is authorized" unless followed by "and required" was, I think, never so considered. On the contrary, I believe it is the very term which Congress always use towards the Executive when they mean to give a power to him, and leave the use of it to his discretion. It is the very phrase on which there is now a difference in the House of Representatives, on the bill for raising 6,000 regulars, which says, "there shall be raised", and some desire it to say, "the President is authorized to raise", leaving him the power with a discretion to use it or not.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 259. (W., March 1808.)

4496. LAW, Federal, State and Common.—Of all the doctrines which have ever been broached by the Federal Government, the novel one, of the common law being in force and cognizable as an existing law in their courts, is to me the most formidable. All their other assumptions of un-given powers have been in the detail. The bank law, the treaty doctrine, the Sedition act, Alien act, the undertaking to change the State laws of evidence in the State courts by certain parts of the Stamp act, &c., &c., have been solitary, unconsequential, timid things, in comparison with the audacious, bare-faced and sweeping pretension to a system of law for the United States, without the adoption of their Legislature, and so infinitely beyond their power to adopt. If this assumption be yielded to, the State courts may be shut up, as there will then be nothing to hinder citizens of the same State suing each other in the Federal courts in every case, as on a bond for instance, because the common law obliges payment of it, and the common law they say is their law. I am happy you have taken up the subject; and I have carefully perused and considered the notes you enclosed, and find but a single paragraph which I do not approve. It is that wherein you say, that laws being emanations from the legislative department, and, when once enacted, continuing in force from a presumption that their will so continues, that that presumption fails and the laws of course fall, on the destruction of that legislative department. I do not think this is the true bottom on which laws and the administering them rest. The whole body of the nation is the sovereign legislative, judiciary, and executive power for itself. The inconvenience of meeting to exercise these powers in person, and their inaptitude to exercise them, induce them to appoint special organs to declare their legislative will, to judge and to execute it. It is the will of the nation which makes the law obligatory; it is their will which vacates or annihilates the organ which is to declare and announce it. They may do it by a single person, as an Emperor of Russia (constituting his declarations evidence of their will), or by a few persons, as the aristocracy of Venice, or by an application of councils, as in our former regal government, or our present republican one. The law being law because it is the will of the nation, is not changed by their changing the organ through which they choose to announce their future will; no more than the acts I have done by one attorney lose their obligation by my changing or discontinuing that attorney. This doctrine has been, in a certain degree, sanctioned by the Federal Executive. For it is precisely that on which the continuance of obligation from our treaty with France was established, and the doctrine was particularly developed in a letter to Gouverneur Morris, with the approbation of President Washington and his Cabinet. Mercer once prevailed on the Virginia Assembly to declare a different doctrine in some resolutions. These met universal disapprobation in this, as well as the other States, and if I mistake not, a subsequent Assembly did something to do away the authority of their former unguarded resolutions. In this case, as in all others, the true principle will be quite as effectual to establish the just deductions. Before the Revolution, the nation of Virginia had, by the organs they then thought proper to constitute, established a system of laws, which they divided into three denominations of 1, common law; 2, statute law; 3, chancery; or, if you please, into two only of 1, common law; 2, chancery. When, by the Declaration of Independence, they chose to abolish their former organs of declaring their will, the acts of will already formally and constitutionally declared, remained untouched. For the nation was not dissolved, was not annihilated; its will, therefore, remained in full vigor, and on the establishing the new organs, first of a convention, and afterwards a more complicated legislature, the old acts of national will continued in force, until the nation should, by its new organs, declare its will changed. The common law, therefore, which was not in force when we landed here, nor till we had formed ourselves into a nation, and had manifested by the organs we constituted that the common law was to be our law, continued to be our law, because the nation continued in being, and because though it changed the organs for the future declarations of its will, yet it did not change its former declarations that the common law was its law. Apply these principles to the present case. Before the Revolution there existed no such nation as the United States; they then first associated as a nation, but for special purposes only. They had all their laws to make, as Virginia had on her first establishment as a nation. But they did not, as Virginia had done, proceed to adopt a whole system of laws ready made to their hand. As their association as a nation was only for special purposes, to wit, for the management of their concerns with one another and with foreign nations, and the States composing the association chose to give to it powers for those purposes and no others, they could not adopt any general system, because it would have embraced objects on which this association had no right to form or declare a will. It was not the organ for declaring a national will in these cases. In the cases confided to them, they were free to declare the will of the nation, the law; but until it was declared there could be no law. So that the common law did not become, ipso facto, law on the new association; it could only become so by a positive adoption, and so far only as they were authorized to adopt. I think it will be of great importance when you come to the proper part, to portray at full length the consequences of this new doctrine, that the common law is the law of the United States, and that their courts have, of course, jurisdiction coextensive with that law, that is to say, general over all cases and persons. But, great heavens! Who could have conceived in 1789, that within ten years we should have to combat

4497. — —. Though long estranged from legal reading and reasoning, and little familiar with the decisions of particular judges, I have considered that respecting the obligation of the common law in this country as a very plain one, and merely a question of document. If we are under that law, the document which made us so can surely be produced; and as far as this can be produced, so far we are subject to it, and farther we are not. Most of the States did, I believe, at an early period of their legislation, adopt the English law, common and statute, more or less in a body, as far as localities admitted of their application. In these States, then, the common law, so far as adopted, is the lex-loci. Then comes the law of Congress, declaring that what is law in any State, shall be the rule of decision in their courts, as to matters arising within that State, except when controlled by their own statutes. But this law of Congress has been considered as extending to civil cases only; and that no such provision has been made for criminal ones. A similar provision, then, for criminal offences, would, in like manner, be an adoption of more or less of the common law, as part of the lex-loci, where the offence is committed; and would cover the whole field of legislation for the General Government.—To DR. JOHN MANNERS. vii, 73. FORD ED., x, 87. (M., 1817.) See COMMON LAW.

4498. LAW, George III. vs.—His Majesty has permitted our laws to be neglected in England for years, neither confirming them by his assent, nor annulling them by his negative: so that such of them as have no suspending clause we hold on the most precarious of all tenures, his Majesty's will; and such of them as suspend themselves till his Majesty's assent be obtained, we have feared, might be called into existence at some future and distant period, when the time and change of circumstances shall have rendered them destructive to his people here. And to render this grievance still more oppressive, his Majesty by his instructions has laid his Governors under such restrictions, that they can pass no law of any moment unless it have such suspending clause: so that, however immediate may be the call for legislative interposition, the law cannot be executed till it has twice crossed the Atlantic, by which time the evil may have spent its whole force.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 136. 4505. LAW, Ignorance.—Ignorance of the law is no excuse in any country. If it were, the laws would lose their effect, because it can be always pretended.—TO M. LIMOZIN. ii, 338. (P., 1787.)

4506. LAW, Instability.—The instability of our laws is really an immense evil. I think it would be well to provide in our constitutions that there shall always be a twelve-month between the engrossing a bill and passing it; that it should then be offered to its passage without changing a word; and that if circumstances should be thought to require a speedier passage, it should take two-thirds of both Houses, instead of a bare majority.—TO JAMES MADISON. ii, 333. FORD ED., iv, 480. (P., 1787.)

4507. LAW, Intention of.—Whenever the words of a law will bear two meanings, one of which will give effect to the law, and the other will defeat it, the former must be supposed to have been intended by the Legislature, because they could not intend that meaning, which would defeat their intention, in passing that law; and in a statute, as in a will, the intention of the party is to be sought after.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 328. (M., July 1808.)

4508. — —. Anciently before the improvement, or, perhaps, the existence of the Court of Chancery, the judges did not restrain themselves to the letter of the law. in the law has become so highly valued by the nation, that the judges have ceased to extend the operation of laws beyond those cases which are clearly within the intention of the legislators. 4515. LAW, Protests against.—While the principles of our Constitution give just latitude to inquiry, every citizen faithful to it will deem embodied expressions of discontent, and open outrages of law and patriotism, as dishonorable as they are injurious.—R. to A. LEESBURG CITIZENS. viii, 161. (1809.)

4516. LAW, Reason and.—Sound reason should constitute the law of every country.—BATTURE CASE. viii, 531. (1812.)

4517. LAW, Retrospective.—I agree in an almost unlimited condemnation of retrospective laws. The few instances of wrong which they redress are so outweighed by the insecurity they draw over all property and even over life itself, and by the atrocious violations of both to which they lead, that it is better to live under the evil than the remedy.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 470. FORD ED., v, 176. (1790.)

4518. ——. The sentiment that ex post facto laws are against natural right, is so strong in the United States, that few, if any, of the State Constitutions have failed to prescribe them. The Federal Constitution, indeed, interdicts them in criminal cases only; but they are equally unjust in civil as in criminal cases, and the omission of a caution which would have been right, does not justify the doing what is wrong.—To ISAAC MCPHERSON. vi, 176. (M., 1813.)

4519. ——. Every man should be protected in his lawful acts, and be certain that no ex post facto law shall punish or endanger him for them.—To ISAAC MCPHERSON. vi, 175. (M., Aug. 1813.)

4520. ——. Nature and reason, as well as all our constitutions, condemn retrospective conditions as mere acts of power against right.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 515. FORD ED., x, 2. (M., 1816.)

4521. LAW, Roman vs. Feudal.—The French code, like all those of middle and southern Europe, was originally Feudal, with some variations in the different provinces, formerly independent, of which the kingdom of France had been made up. But as circumstances changed, and civilization and commerce advanced, abundance of new cases and questions arose, for which the simple and unwritten laws of Feudalism had made no provision. At the same time, they had at hand the legal system of a nation highly civilized, a system carried to a degree of conformity with natural reason attained by no other. The study of this system, too, was become the favorite of the age, and offering ready and reasonable solutions of all the new cases presenting themselves, was resorted to by a common consent and practice; not, indeed, as laws, formally established by the legislator of the country, but as a Ratio Scripta, the dictate, in all cases, of that sound reason which should constitute the law of every country. Over both of these systems, however, the occasional edicts of the monarch are paramount, and amend and control their provisions whenever he deems amendment necessary; on the general principle that "leges posteriores priores abrogant". Subsequent laws abrogate those which are prior.—BATTURE CASE. viii, 530. (1812.)

4522. ——. The following instances will give some idea of the steps by which the Roman gained on the Feudal laws. A law of Burgundy provided "Si quis post hoc barbarus vel testari voluerit, vel donare, aut Romanam consuetudinem, aut barbaricam, esse servandam, sciat". "If any barbarian subject hereafter shall desire to dispose by legacy or donation, let him know that either the Roman or barbarian law is to be observed." And one of Lotharius II. of Germany, going still further, gives to every one an election of the system under which he chose to live. "Volumus ut cunctus populus Romanus interrogatur quali lege vult vivere; ut tali lege, quali professi sunt vivere vivant; illisque denuntiatur, ut hoc unus-quis-que, tam iudices, quam iudices, vel reliquus populus sciat, quod si offensionem contra eandem legem fecerint, eidem legi, quâ profitentur vivere, subiaceant". "We will that all the Roman people shall be asked by what law they wish to live; that they may live under such law as they profess to live by; and that it be published, that every one, judges, as well as generals, or the rest of the people, may know that if they commit offence against the said law, they shall be subject to the same law by which they profess to live." Ency. Method. Jurisprudence. Coutume. 399. Presenting the uncommon spectacle of a jurisdiction attached to persons, instead of places. Thus favored, the Roman became an acknowledged supplement to the Feudal or customary law; but still, not under any act of the legislature, but as "raison écrite", "written reason"; and the cases to which it is applicable, becoming much the most numerous, it constitutes in fact the mass of their law.—NOTE IN BATTURE CASE. viii, 531. (1812.)

4523. LAW, Sanguinary.—The experience of all ages and countries has shown that cruel and sanguinary laws defeat their own purpose, by engaging the benevolence of mankind to withhold prosecutions, to smother testimony, or to listen to it with bias, and by producing in many instances a total dispensation and impunity under the names of pardon and privilege of clergy; when, if the punishment were only proportioned to the injury, men would feel it their inclination, as well as their duty, to see the laws observed.—CRIMES BILL. i, 148. FORD ED., ii, 204. (1779.)

4524. LAW, Simplicity.—Laws are made for men of ordinary understanding. and should therefore, be construed by the ordinary rules of common sense. Their meaning is not to be sought for in metaphysical subtleties, which may make anything mean everything or nothing, at pleasure. It should be left to the sophisms of advocates, whose trade it is, to prove that a defendant is a plaintiff.

though dragged into court, torto collo, like Bonaparte's volunteers, into the field in chains, or that a power has been given because it ought to have been given, et alia talia.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 297. FORD ED., x, 231. (M., 1823.)

— LAW, Study of.—See LAWYERS.

4525. LAW, Style of.—In its [the bill "proportioning crimes and punishments", in the Virginia Revised Code] style I have aimed at accuracy, brevity, and simplicity, preserving, however, the very words of the established law, wherever their meaning had been sanctioned by judicial decisions, or rendered technical by usage. The same matter, if couched in the modern statutory language, with all its tautologies, redundancies, and circumlocutions, would have spread itself over many pages, and been unintelligible to those whom it most concerns. Indeed, I wished to exhibit a sample of reformation in the barbarous style into which modern statutes have degenerated from their ancient simplicity.—To GEORGE WYTHE. i, 146. FORD ED., ii, 203. (M., 1778.) See 4531.

4526. — —. In the execution of my part [of the revision of the Virginia laws], I thought it material not to vary the diction of the ancient statutes by modernizing it, nor to give rise to new questions by new expressions. The text of these statutes had been so fully explained and defined by numerous adjudications, as scarcely ever now to produce a question in our courts.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 44. FORD ED., i, 60. (1821.)

4527. — —. I am pleased with the style and diction of your laws [in Louisiana Code]. Plain and intelligible as the ordinary writings of common sense, I hope it will produce imitation. Of all the countries on earth of which I have any knowledge, the style of the acts of the British parliament is the most barbarous, uncouth and unintelligible. It can be understood by those alone who are in the daily habit of studying such tautologous, involved and parenthetical jargon. Where they found their model, I know not. Neither ancient nor modern codes, nor even their own early statutes, furnish any such example. And, like faithful apes, we copy it faithfully.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 404. (M., 1825.)

4528. LAW, Transcending.—The question you propose, whether circumstances do not sometimes occur, which make it a duty in officers of high trust, to assume authorities beyond the law, is easy of solution in principle, but sometimes embarrassing in practice. A strict observance of the written laws is doubtless one of the high duties of a good citizen, but it is not the highest. The laws of necessity, of self-preservation, of saving our country when in danger, are of higher obligation. To lose our country by a scrupulous adherence to written law, would be to lose the law itself, with life, liberty, property, and all those who are enjoying them with us; thus absurdly sacrificing the end to the means.

When in the battle of Germantown, General Washington's army was annoyed from Chew's house, he did not hesitate to plant his cannon against it, although the property of a citizen. When he besieged Yorktown, he levelled the suburbs, feeling that the laws of property must be postponed to the safety of the nation. While the army was before York, the Governor of Virginia [Jefferson] took horses, carriages, provisions, and even men by force, to enable that army to stay together till it could master the public enemy; and he was justified. A ship at sea in distress for provisions, meets another having abundance, yet refusing a supply; the law of self-preservation authorizes the distressed to take a supply by force. In all these cases, the unwritten laws of necessity, of self-preservation, and of the public safety, control the written laws of meum and tuum. Further to exemplify the principle, I will state an hypothetical case. Suppose it had been made known to the Executive of the Union in the autumn of 1805, that we might have the Floridas for a reasonable sum, that that sum had not indeed been so appropriated by law, but that Congress were to meet within three weeks, and might appropriate it on the first or second day of their session. Ought he, for so great an advantage to his country, to have risked himself by transcending the law and making the purchase? The public advantage offered, in this supposed case, was indeed immense, but a reverence for law and the probability that the advantage might still be legally accomplished by a delay of only three weeks, were powerful reasons against hazarding the act. But suppose it foreseen that a John Randolph would find means to protract the proceeding on it by Congress, until the ensuing spring, by which time new circumstances would change the mind of the other party. Ought the Executive, in that case, and with that foreknowledge, to have secured the good to his country, and to have trusted to their justice for the transgression of the law? I think he ought, and that the act would have been approved. After the affair of the Chesapeake, we thought war a very possible result. Our magazines were illy provided with some necessary articles, nor had any appropriations been made for their purchase. We ventured, however, to provide them, and to place our country in safety; and stating the case to Congress, they sanctioned the act. To proceed to the conspiracy of Burr, and particularly to General Wilkinson's situation in New Orleans. In judging this case, we are bound to consider the state of the information, correct and incorrect, which he then possessed. He expected Burr and his band from above, a British fleet from below, and he knew there was a formidable conspiracy within the city. Under these circumstances, was he justifiable, first, in seizing notorious conspirators? On this there can be but two opinions; one, of the guilty and their accomplices; the other, that of all honest men. Secondly, in sending them to the seat of government, when the written law gave them a right to trial in the territory?

The danger of their rescue, of their continuing their machinations, the tardiness and weakness of the law, apathy of the judges, active patronage of the whole tribe of lawyers, unknown disposition of the juries, an hourly expectation of the enemy, salvation of the city, and of the Union itself, which would have been convulsed to its centre, had that conspiracy succeeded; all these constituted a law of necessity and self-preservation, and rendered the salus populi supreme over the written law. The officer who is called to act on this superior ground, does indeed risk himself on the justice of the controlling powers of the Constitution, and his station makes it his duty to incur that risk. But those controlling powers, and his fellow citizens generally, are bound to judge according to the circumstances under which he acted. They are not to transfer the information of this place or moment to the time and place of his action; but to put themselves into his situation. We knew here [Washington] that there never was danger of a British fleet from below, and that Burr's band was crushed before it reached the Mississippi. But General Wilkinson's information was very different, and he could act on no other. From these examples and principles you may see what I think on the question proposed. They do not go to the case of persons charged with petty duties, where consequences are trifling, and time allowed for a legal course, nor to authorize them to take such cases out of the written law. In these, the example of over-leaping the law is of greater evil than a strict adherence to its imperfect provisions. It is incumbent on those only who accept of great charges, to risk themselves on great occasions, when the safety of the nation, or some of its very high interests are at stake. An officer is bound to obey orders; yet he would be a bad one who should do it in cases for which they were not intended, and which involved the most important consequences. The line of discrimination between cases may be difficult; but the good officer is bound to draw it at his own peril, and throw himself on the justice of his country and the rectitude of his motives.—To J. B. COLVIN. v, 542. FORD ED., ix, 279. (M., Sep. 1810.)

4529. ——. On great occasions every good officer must be ready to risk himself in going beyond the strict line of law, when the public preservation requires it; his motives will be a justification as far as there is any discretion in his ultra-legal proceedings, and no indulgence of private feelings.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 40. (W., 1807.)

4530. ——. Should we have ever gained our Revolution, if we had bound our hands by manacles of the law, not only in the beginning, but in any part of the revolutionary conflict?—To JAMES BROWN. v, 379. FORD ED., ix, 211. (W., 1808.) See 1852.

4531. LAW, Virginia's Revised Code.—The [Revision] Committee was appointed in the latter part of 1776, and reported in the spring or summer of 1779. At the first and only meeting of the whole committee (of five persons), the question was discussed whether we would attempt to reduce the whole body of the law into a code, the text of which should become the law of the land? We decided against that, because every word and phrase in that text would become a new subject of criticism and litigation, until its sense should have been settled by numerous decisions, and that, in the meantime, the rights of property would be in the air. We concluded not to meddle with the common law, i. e., the law preceding the existence of the Statutes, further than to accommodate it to our new principles and circumstances; but to take up the whole body of statutes and Virginia laws, to leave out everything obsolete or improper, insert what was wanting, and reduce the whole within as moderate a compass as it would bear, and to the plain language of common sense, divested of the verbiage, the barbarous tautologies and redundancies which render the British statutes unintelligible. From this, however, were excepted the ancient statutes, particularly those commented on by Lord Coke, the language of which is simple, and the meaning of every word so well settled by decisions, as to make it safest not to change words where the sense was to be retained. After setting our plan, Colonel Mason declined undertaking the execution of any part of it, as not being sufficiently read in the law. Mr. Lee very soon afterwards died, and the work was distributed between Mr. Wythe, Mr. Pendleton and myself. To me was assigned the common law (so far as we thought of altering it) and the statutes down to the Reformation, or the end of the reign of Elizabeth; to Mr. Wythe, the subsequent body of the statutes, and to Mr. Pendleton the Virginia laws. This distribution threw into my part the laws concerning crimes and punishments, the law of descents, and the laws concerning religion. After completing our work separately, we met (Mr. W., Mr. P., and myself) in Williamsburg, and held a long session, in which we went over the first and second parts in the order of time, weighing and correcting every word, and reducing them to the form in which they were afterwards reported. When we proceeded to the third part, we found that Mr. Pendleton had not exactly seized the intentions of the committee, which were to reform the language of the Virginia laws, and reduce the matter to a simple style and form. He had copied the acts verbatim, only omitting what was disapproved; and some family occurrence calling him indispensably home, he desired Mr. Wythe and myself to make it what we thought it ought to be, and authorized us to report him as concurring in the work. We accordingly divided the work, and reexecuted it entirely so as to assimilate its plan and execution to the other parts, as well as the shortness of the time would admit, and we brought the whole of the British Statutes and laws of Virginia into 127 acts, most of them short. This is the history of that work as to its execution. * * * Experience has convinced me that the change in the style of the laws was for the better, and it has sensibly reformed the style of our laws from that time downwards, insomuch that they have obtained, in that respect, the approbation of men of consideration on both sides of the Atlantic. Whether the change in the style and form of the criminal law, as introduced by Mr. Taylor, was for the better, is not for me to judge. The digest of that act employed me longer than I believe all the rest of the work, for it rendered it necessary for me to go with great care over Bracton, Britton, the Saxon statutes, and the works of authority on criminal law; and it gave me great satisfaction to find that, in general, I had only to reduce the law to its ancient Saxon condition, stripping it of all the innovations and rigorisms of subsequent times, to make it what it should be. The substitution of the penitentiary, instead of labor on the high road, and of some other punishments truly objectionable, is a just merit to be ascribed to Mr. Taylor's law. When our report was made, the idea of a penitentiary had never been suggested; the happy experiment of Pennsylvania we had not then the benefit of.—To SKELTON JONES, v. 459. (M., 1809.)

4532. ——. When I left Congress in 1776, it was in the persuasion that our whole code (of Virginia) must be reviewed, adapted to our republican form of government; and now that we had no negatives of Councils, Governors, and Kings to restrain us from doing right, that it should be corrected, in all its parts, with a single eye to reason, and the good of those for whose government it was framed. Early, therefore, in the session of '76, to which I returned, I moved and presented a bill for the revision of the laws which was passed on the 24th of October; and on the 5th of November, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. Wythe, George Mason, Thomas L. Lee, and myself, were appointed a committee to execute the work. We agreed to meet at Fredericksburg to settle the plan of operation, and to distribute the work. We met there accordingly on the 13th of January, 1777. The first question was, whether we should propose to abolish the whole existing system of laws, and prepare a new and complete Institute, or preserve the general system, and only modify it to the present state of things. Mr. Pendleton, contrary to his usual disposition in favor of ancient things, was for the former proposition, in which he was joined by Mr. Lee. To this it was objected, that to abrogate our whole system would be a bold measure, and probably far beyond the views of the legislature; that they had been in the practice of revising from time to time the laws of the Colony, omitting the expired, the repealed, and the obsolete, amending only those retained, and probably meant we should now do the same, only including the British statutes as well as our own; that to compose a new Institute, like those of Justinian and Bracton, or that of Blackstone, which was the model proposed by Mr. Pendleton, would be an arduous undertaking, of vast research, of great consideration and judgment; and when reduced to a text, every word of that text, from the imperfections of human language, and its incompetence to express distinctly every shade of idea, would become a subject of question and chicanery, until settled by repeated adjudications; and this would involve us for ages in litigation, and render property uncertain until, like the statutes of old, every word had been tried and settled by numerous decisions, and by new volumes of reports and commentaries; and that no one of us, probably, would undertake such a work which, to be systematical, must be the work of one hand. This last was the opinion of Mr. Wythe, Mr. Mason, and myself. When we proceeded to the distribution of the work, Mr. Mason excused himself, as, being no lawyer, he felt himself unqualified for the work, and he resigned soon after. Mr. Lee excused himself on the same ground, and died, indeed, in a short time. The other two gentlemen, therefore, and myself divided the work among us. The common law and statutes to the 4 James I. (when our separate legislature was established) were assigned to me; the British statutes, from that period to the present day, to

Mr. Wythe; and the Virginia laws to Mr. Pendleton.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 42. FORD ED., i, 57. (1821.)

4533. ——. In giving this account of the laws of which I was myself the mover and draughtsman, I, by no means, mean to claim to myself the merit of obtaining their passage. I had many occasional and strenuous coadjutors in debate, and one, most steadfast, able and zealous; who was himself a host. This was George Mason.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 40. FORD ED., i, 56. (1821.)

4534. ——. We were employed in this work (revising Virginia laws) from January, 1777, to February, 1779, when we met at Williamsburg, that is to say, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. Wythe and myself; and meeting day by day, we examined critically our several parts, sentence by sentence, scrutinizing and amending, until we had agreed on the whole. We then returned home, had fair copies made of our several parts, which were reported to the General Assembly, June 18, 1779, by Mr. Wythe and myself, Mr. Pendleton's residence being distant, and he having authorized us by letter to declare his approbation. We had, in this work, brought so much of the Common Law as it was thought necessary to alter, all the British statutes from Magna Charta to the present day, and all the laws of Virginia, from the establishment of our Legislature, in the 4th Jac. 1. to the present time, which we thought should be retained, within the compass of one hundred and twenty-six bills, making a printed folio of ninety pages only. Some bills were taken out, occasionally, from time to time, and passed; but the main body of the work was not entered on by the Legislature until after the general peace, in 1785, when, by the unwearied exertions of Mr. Madison, in opposition to the endless quibbles, chicaneries, perversions, vexations and delays of lawyers and demi-lawyers, most of the bills were passed by the Legislature, with little alteration.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 44. FORD ED., i, 61. (1821.)

4535. LAW, Voluntary support of.—The voluntary support of laws, formed by persons of their own choice, distinguishes peculiarly the minds capable of self-government. The contrary spirit is anarchy, which of necessity produces despotism.—R. to A. PHILADELPHIA CITIZENS. viii, 145. (1809.)

4536. LAW OF WASTE, Explained.—The main objects of the law of Waste in England are: 1, to prevent any disguise of the lands which might lessen the reversioner's evidence of title, such as the change of pasture into arable, &c.; 2, to prevent any deterioration of it, as the cutting down forest, which in England is an injury. So careful is the law there against permitting a deterioration of the land, that though it will permit such improvements in the same line, as manuring arable lands, leading water into pasture lands, &c., yet it will not permit improvements in a different line, such as erecting buildings, converting pasture into arable, &c., lest these should lead to a deterioration. Hence we might argue in Virginia, that though the cutting down of forest in Virginia is, in our husbandry, rather an improvement generally, yet it is not so always, and therefore it is safer never to admit it. Consequently, there is no reason for adopting different rules of waste here from those established in England.—To PETER CARR. iii, 452. FORD ED., vi, 91. (Pa., 1792.)

4537. LAWS OF ENGLAND, History.—

The laws of England, in their progress from the earliest to the present times, may be likened to the road of a traveller, divided into distinct stages or resting places, at each of which a review is to be taken of the ground passed over so far. The first of these was Bracton's De Legibus Angliæ; the second Coke's Institutes; the third the Abridgment of the Law by Matthew Bacon; and the fourth, Blackstone's Commentaries. Doubtless there were others before Bracton which have not reached us. Alfred, in the preface to his laws, says they were compiled from those of Ina, Offa, and Æthelbert, into which, or rather preceding them, the clergy have interpolated the 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d and 24th chapters of Exodus, so as to place Alfred's preface to what was really his, awkwardly enough in the body of the work. An interpolation, the more glaring, as containing laws expressly contradicted by those of Alfred. This pious fraud seems to have been first noted by Howard, in his Coutumes Anglo Normandes, and the pious judges of England have had no inclination to question it. * * * This digest of Alfred of the laws of the Heptarchy into a single code, common to the whole Kingdom, by him first reduced into one, was probably the birth of what is called the Common law. He has been styled, "Magnus Juris Anglicani Conditor"; and his code, the Dom-Dec, or Doom-Book. That which was afterwards under Edward the Confessor, was but a restoration of Alfred's with some intervening alterations. And this was the code which the English so often, under the Norman princes, petitioned to have restored to them. But, all records previous to the Magna Charta, having been early lost, Bracton's is the first digest of the whole body of law which has come down to us entire. What materials existed for it in his time we know not, except the unauthoritative collections of Lambard and Wilkins, and the treatise of Glanville, tempore H. 2. Bracton's is the more valuable, because being written a very few years after the Magna Charta, which commences what is called the statute law, it gives us the state of the common law in its ultimate form, and exactly at the point of division between the Common and Statute law. It is a most able work, complete in its matter and luminous in its method. The statutes which introduced changes began now to be preserved; applications of the law to new cases by the courts, began soon after to be reported in the Year-Books, these to be methodized and abridged by Fitzherbert, Broke, Rolle, and others; individuals continued the business of reporting; particular treatises were written by able men, and all these, by the time of Lord Coke, had formed so large a mass of matter as to call for a new digest, to bring it within reasonable compass. This he undertook in his Institutes, reasoning all the decisions and opinions which were reconcilable, and rejecting those not so. This work is executed with so much learning and judgment, that I do not recollect that a single position in it has ever been judicially denied. And although the work loses much of its value by its chaotic form it may still be considered as the fundamental code of the English law. The same processes recommending of statutory changes, new divisions, multiplied reports, and special treatises, a new accumulation had formed, calling for new reduction, by the time of Matthew Bacon. His work, therefore, although not pretending to the textual merit of Bracton's, or Coke's, was very acceptable. His alphabetical arrangement, indeed, although better than Coke's jumble, was far inferior to Bracton's. But it was a sound digest of the materials existing on the several alphabetical heads under which he arranged them. His work was not admitted in Westminster Hall; yet it was the manual of every judge and lawyer, and, what better proves its worth, has been its daily growth in the general estimation. A succeeding interval of changes and additions of matter produced Blackstone's Commentaries, the most lucid in arrangement which had yet been written, correct in its matter, classical in style, and rightfully taking its place by the side of the Justinian Institutes. But, like them, it was only an elementary book. It did not present all the subjects of the law in all their details. It still left it necessary to recur to the original works of which it was the summary. The great mass of law books from which it was extracted, was still to be consulted on minute investigations. It wanted, therefore, a species of merit which entered deeply into the value of those of Bracton, Coke and Bacon. They had in effect swept the shelves of all the materials preceding them. To give Blackstone, therefore, a full measure of value, another work is still wanting, to wit: to incorporate with his principles a compend of the particular cases subsequent to Bacon, of which they are the essence. This might be done by printing under his text a digest like Bacon's, continued to Blackstone's time. It would * * * increase its value peculiarly to us, because just here we break off from the parent stem of the English law, unconcerned in any of its subsequent changes or decisions.—To Dr. THOMAS COOPER. vi, 291. (M., 1814.)

4538. LAWS OF NATURE, Opposition to.—It is not only vain, but wicked, in a legislator to frame laws in opposition to the laws of nature, and to arm them with the terrors of death. This is truly creating crimes in order to punish them.—NOTE ON CRIMES BILL. i, 159. FORD ED., ii, 218. (1779.)

4539. LAWS OF NATURE, Writers on.—Those who write treatises of natural law, can only declare what their own moral sense and reason dictate in the several cases they state. Such of them as happen to have feelings and a reason coincident with those of the wise and honest part of mankind, are respected and quoted as witnesses of what is morally right or wrong in particular cases. Grotius, Puffendorf, Wolf, and Vattel are of this number. Where they agree their authority is strong; but where they differ (and they often differ), we must appeal to our own feelings and reason to decide between them.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 618. FORD ED., vi, 225. (1793.)

4540. LAWS OF VIRGINIA, Collection of.—The only object I had in making my collection of the laws of Virginia, was to save all those for the public which were not then already lost, in the hope that at some future day they might be republished. Whether this be by public or private enterprise, my end will be equally answered.*—TO WILLIAM WALTER HENNING. v, 31. FORD ED., ix, 10. (W., 1807.)

4541. LAWYERS, Antipathies and.—No profession is open to stronger antipathies than that of the law.—TO WM. WIRT. v, 233. (W., 1808.)

4542. LAWYERS, Blackstone.—I am sure you join me in lamenting the general defection of lawyers and judges from the free principles of government. I am sure they do not derive this degenerate spirit from the father of our science, Lord Coke. But it may be the reason why they cease to read him, and the source of what are now called "Blackstone Lawyers".—TO DR. THOMAS COOPER. vi, 296. (M., 1814.)

4543. LAWYERS, Education of.—Carry on the study of the law with that of politics and history. Every political measure will, forever, have an intimate connection with the laws of the land; and he, who knows nothing of these, will always be perplexed and often foiled by adversaries having the advantage of that knowledge over him. Besides, it is a source of infinite comfort to reflect, that under chance of fortune, we have a resource in ourselves from which we may be able to derive an honorable subsistence.—TO T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. ii, 176. FORD ED., iv, 405. (P., 1787.)

4544. ——. I have long lamented the depreciation of law science. The opinion seems to be that Blackstone is to us what the Alkoran is to the Mahometans, that everything which is necessary is in him; and what is not in him is not necessary. I still lend my counsel and books to such young students as will fix themselves in the neighborhood. Coke's Institutes and reports are their first, and Blackstone their last book, after an intermediate course of two or three years. It is nothing more than an elegant digest of what they will then have acquired from the real fountains of the law. Now, men are born scholars, lawyers, doctors; in our day this was confined to poets.—TO JOHN TYLER. v, 524. FORD ED., ix, 276. (M., 1810.)

4545. ——. Begin with Coke's four Institutes. These give a complete body of the law as it stood in the reign of the First James, an epoch the more interesting to us, as we separated at that point from English legislation, and acknowledged no subsequent statutory alterations. Then passing over (for occasional reading as hereafter proposed) all the reports and treatises to the time of Matthew Bacon, read his abridgment, compiled about one hundred years after Coke's, in which they are all embodied. This gives numerous applications of the old principles to new cases, and gives the general state of the English law at that period. Here, too, the student should take up the Chancery branch of the law, by reading the first and second abridgments of the cases in Equity. The second is by the same Matthew Bacon, the first having been published some time before. The alphabetical order adopted by Bacon, is certainly not as satisfactory as the systematic. But the arrangement is under very general and leading heads, and these, indeed, with very little difficulty, might be systematically instead of alphabetically arranged and read. Passing now in like manner over all intervening reports and tracts, the student may take up Blackstone's Commentaries, published about twenty-five years later than Bacon's abridgment, and giving the substance of these new reports and tracts. This review is not so full as that of Bacon, by any means, but better digested. Here, too, Wooddeson should be read as supplementary to Blackstone, under heads too shortly treated by him. Fonblanque's edition of Francis's Maxims of Equity, and Bridgman's Digested Index, into which the latter cases are incorporated, are also supplementary in the Chancery branch, in which Blackstone is very short. This course comprehends about twenty-six 8vo. volumes, and reading four or five hours a day would employ about two years. After these, the best of the reporters since Blackstone should be read for the new cases which have occurred since his time.

* * * By way of change and relief for another hour or two in the day, should be read the law-tracts of merit which are many, and among them all those of Baron Gilbert are of the first order. In these hours, too, may be read Bracton and Justinian's Institutes. The method of these two last works is very much the same, and their language often quite so. Justinian is very illustrative of the doctrines of Equity, and is often appealed to, and Cooper's edition is the best on account of the analogies and contrasts he has given of the Roman and English law. After Bracton, Reeves's History of the English Law may be read to advantage. During this same hour or two of lighter law reading, select and leading cases of the reporters may be successively read, which the several digests will have pointed out and referred to. I have here sketched the reading in Common Law and Chancery which I suppose necessary for a reputable practitioner in those courts. But there are other branches of law in which, although it is not expected he should be an adept, yet when it occurs to speak of them, it should be understandingly to a decent degree. These are the Admiralty law, Ecclesiastical law, and the Law of Nations. I would name as elementary books in these branches, Molloy de Jure Maritimo; Brown's Compend of the Civil and Admiralty Law; the Jura Ecclesiastica, and Les Institutions du Droit de la Nature et des Gens de Reyneval. Besides these six hours of law reading, light and heavy, and those necessary for the reports of the day, for exercise and sleep, which suppose to be ten or twelve, there will be six or eight hours for reading history, politics, ethics, physics, oratory, poetry, criticism, &c., as necessary as law to form an accomplished lawyer.—To DABNEY TERRELL. vii, 207. (M., 1821.)

4546. LAWYERS, Future Judges and.—I think the bar of the General Court a proper and excellent nursery for future judges, if it be so regulated that science may be encouraged and may live there. But this can never be if an inundation of insects is permitted to come from the county courts, and consume the harvest. These people, traversing the counties, seeing the clients frequently at their own courts, or, perhaps, at their own houses, must of necessity pick up all the business. The convenience of frequently seeing their counsel, without going from home, cannot be withstood by the country people. Men of science, then (if there were to be any), would only be employed as auxiliary counsel in difficult cases. But can they live by that? Certainly not. The present members of that kind therefore must turn marauders in the county courts; and in future none will have leisure to acquire science. I should, therefore, be for excluding the county court attorneys; or rather for taking the General Court lawyers from the incessant drudgery of the county courts and confining them to their studies, that they may qualify themselves as well to support their clients, as to become worthy successors to the bench.—To GEORGE WYTHE. i, 211. FORD ED., ii, 166. (F., 1779.)

4547. LAWYERS, History and.—History, especially, is necessary to form a lawyer.—To JOHN GARLAND JEFFERSON. FORD ED., v, 180. (N.Y., 1790.)

4548. LAWYERS, Monarchy and.—I join in your reprobation of our * * * lawyers, for their adherence to England and monarchy, in preference to their own country and its Constitution. * * * They have, in the mother country, been generally the firmest supporters of the free principles of their constitution. But there, too, they have changed. I ascribe much of this to the substitution of Blackstone for my Lord Coke, as an elementary work.—To HORATIO G. SPAFORD. vi, 334. (M., 1814.)

— LAWYERS, In office.—See CONGRESS.

4549. LAWYERS, Opinions of.—On every question the lawyers are about equally divided, and were we to act but in cases where no contrary opinion of a lawyer can be had, we should never act.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 369. (M., 1808.)

4550. LAWYERS, Politics and.—The study of the law qualifies a man to be useful to himself, to his neighbors, and to the public.

It is the most certain stepping stone to public preferment in the political line.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 144. FORD ED., v, 172. (N.Y., 1790.)

4551. LAWYERS, Prosperity of.—Never fear the want of business. A man who qualifies himself well for his calling never fails of employment in it.—To PETER CARR. iii, 452. FORD ED., vi, 92. (Pa., 1792.)

4552. LAWYERS, Success of.—It is superiority of knowledge which can alone lift you above the heads of your competitors, and insure you success.—To JOHN GARLAND JEFFERSON. FORD ED., v, 182. (N.Y., 1790.)

4553. LAWYERS, Too many.—Law is quite overdone. It is fallen to the ground, and a man must have great powers to raise himself in it to either honor or profit. The mob of the profession get as little money and less respect, than they would by digging the earth. The followers of Æsculapius are also numerous. Yet I have remarked that wherever one sets himself down in a good neighborhood, not preoccupied, he secures to himself its practice, and if prudent, is not long in acquiring whereon to retire and live in comfort. The physician is happy in the attachment of the families in which he practices. All think he has saved some one of them, and he finds himself everywhere a welcome guest, a home in every house. If, to the consciousness of having saved some lives, he can add that of having at no time, from want of caution, destroyed the boon he was called on to save, he will enjoy, in age, the happy reflection of not having lived in vain; while the lawyer has only to recollect how many, by his dexterity, have been cheated of their right and reduced to beggary.—To DAVID CAMPBELL. v, 499. (M., 1810.)

4554. LAWYERS, Trade of.—Their trade is to question everything, yield nothing and talk by the hour. That one hundred and fifty lawyers should do business together ought not to be expected.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 58. FORD ED., i, 82. (1821.)

— LEAGUE, The marine.—See 1335.

4555. LEANDER, Case of the.—Whereas, satisfactory information has been received that Henry Whitby, commanding a British armed vessel called the Leander, did, on the 25th day of the month of April [1806], within the waters and jurisdiction of the United States, and near to the entrance of the harbor of New York, by a cannon shot fired from the said vessel, Leander, commit a murder on the body of John Pearce, a citizen of the United States, * * * I do, hereby, especially enjoin, and require all officers, having authority, civil or military, * * * within the limits or jurisdiction of the United States * * * to apprehend * * * the said Henry Whitby, * * * and him * * * deliver to the civil authority, * * * to be proceeded against according to law.—PROCLAMATION. FORD ED., viii, 445. (May 1806.)

4556. LEAR (Tobias), Secretary of the Navy.—If General Smith does not accept [the Secretaryship of the Navy], there is no remedy but to appoint Lear permanently. He is equal to the office if he possessed equally the confidence of the public.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 14. (W., March 1801.)

4557. LEARNING, Classical.—For classical learning I have ever been a zealous advocate. * * * I have not, however, carried so far as you do my ideas of the importance of a hypercritical knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages. I have believed it sufficient to possess a substantial understanding of their authors.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 390. (M., 1814.)

4558. — — — Among the values of classical learning, I estimate the luxury of reading the Greek and Roman authors in all the beauties of their originals. And why should not this innocent and elegant luxury take its preeminent stand ahead of all those addressed merely to the senses? I think myself more indebted to my father for this than for all the other luxuries his cares and affections have placed within my reach; and more now than when younger, and more susceptible of delights from other sources. When the decays of age have enfeebled the useful energies of the mind, the classic pages fill up the vacuum of ennui, and become sweet composers to that rest of the grave into which we are all sooner or later to descend.—To JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 131. (P.F., 1819.) See EDUCATION, LANGUAGES, SCIENCE, and UNIVERSITY.

4559. LEDYARD (John), Explorer.—In 1786, while at Paris, I became acquainted with John Ledyard, of Connecticut, a man of genius, of some science, and of fearless courage and enterprise. He had accompanied Captain Cook in his voyage to the Pacific, had distinguished himself on several occasions by an unrivalled intrepidity, and published an account of that voyage, with details unfavorable to Cook's deportment towards the savages, and lessening our regrets at his fate. Ledyard had come to Paris in the hope of forming a company to engage in the fur trade of the Western coast of America. He was disappointed in this, and, being out of business, and of a roaming, restless character, I suggested to him the enterprise of exploring the western part of our continent, by passing through St. Petersburg to Kamschatka, and procuring a passage thence in some of the Russian vessels to Nootka Sound, whence he might make his way across the continent to the United States; and I undertook to have the permission of the Empress of Russia solicited. He eagerly embraced the proposition, and M. de Sémourin, the Russian Ambassador, and more particularly Baron Grimm, the special correspondent of the Empress, solicited her permission for him to pass through her dominions, to the western coast of America. And here I must correct a material error which I have committed in another place, to the prejudice of the Empress. In writing some notes of the life of Captain Lewis, prefixed to his "Expedition to the Pacific", I stated that the Empress gave the permission asked, and afterwards retracted it. This idea, after a lapse of twenty-six years, had so insinuated itself into my mind, that I committed it to paper, without the least suspicion of error. Yet I find, on recurring to my letters of that date, that the Empress refused permission at once, considering the enterprise as entirely chimerical. But Ledyard would not relinquish it, persuading himself that, by proceeding to St. Petersburg, he could satisfy the Empress of its practicability, and obtain her permission. He went accordingly, but she was absent on a visit to some distant part of her dominions [the Crimea], and he pursued his course to within two hundred miles of Kamschatka, where he was overtaken by an arrest from the Empress, brought back to Poland, and there dismissed. I must therefore, in justice, acquit the Empress of ever having for a moment countenanced, even by the indulgence of an innocent passage through her territories, this interesting enterprise.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 68. FORD ED., i, 94. (1821.)

4560. LEDYARD (John), Imaginative.—He is a person of ingenuity and information. Unfortunately, he has too much imagination.—To CHARLES THOMSON. ii, 276. FORD ED., iv, (1787.)

4561. LEDYARD (John), Poverty.—I had a letter from Ledyard lately, dated at St. Petersburg. He had but two shirts, and yet more shirts than shillings. Still he was determined to obtain the palm of the first circumambulator of the earth. He says, that having no money, they kick him from place to place, and thus he expects to be kicked round the globe.—To J. BANNISTER, JR. ii, 150. (P., 1787.)

4562. LEDYARD (John), Penetrating Africa.—A countryman of ours, a Mr. Ledyard of Connecticut, set out from Paris, some time ago, for St. Petersburg, to go thence to Kamschatka, thence to cross over to the western coast of America, and penetrate through the continent to the other side of it. He had got within a few days' journey of Kamschatka, when he was arrested by order of the Empress of Russia, sent back, and turned adrift in Poland. He went to London; engaged under the auspices of a private society, formed there for pushing discoveries into Africa; passed by Paris * * * for Marseilles, where he will embark for Alexandria and Grand Cairo; thence explore the Nile to its source, cross the head of the Niger, and descend that to its mouth. He promises me, if he escapes through his journey, he will go to Kentucky, and endeavor to penetrate westerly to the South Sea.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 433. (P., 1788.)

4563. — — — My last accounts of Ledyard were from Grand Cairo. He was just been plunging into the unknown regions of Africa, probably never to emerge again. If he returns, he has promised me to go to America and penetrate from Kentucky to the western side of the continent.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. FORD ED., v, 75. (P., 1789.)

4564. LEE (Arthur), In the Treasury.—I am sorry to see a possibility of Arthur Lee's being put into the Treasury. He has no talents for the office, and what he has will be employed in rummaging old accounts to involve you in eternal war with Robert Morris; and he will, in a short time, introduce such dissensions into the commission as to break it up. If he goes on the other appointment to Kaskaskia, he will produce a revolt of that settlement from the United States.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 348. FORD ED., iv, 53. (P., 1785.)

4565. LEE (Richard Henry), In Convention.—I shall return to Virginia after the 11th of August. I wish my successor may be certain to come before that time; in that case I shall hope to see you and not Wythe, in convention, that the business of Government, which is of everlasting concern, may receive your aid.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE. i, 204. (1776.)

4566. LEE (Richard Henry), In the Revolution.—I presume you have received a copy of the Life of Richard H. Lee, from his grandson of the same name, author of the work. You and I know that he merited much during the Revolution. Eloquent, bold, and ever watchful at his post, of which his biographer omits no proof. I am not certain whether the friends of George Mason, of Patrick Henry, yourself,* and even of General Washington, may not reclaim some feathers of the plumage given him, noble as was his proper and original coat.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 422. FORD ED., x, 347. (M., 1825.)

4567. LEE (Richard Henry), As a soldier.—I am glad to see the romance of Lee removed from the shelf of history to that of fable. Some small portion of the transactions he relates were within my own knowledge; and of these I can say he has given more falsehood than fact; and I have heard many officers declare the same as to what had passed under their eyes.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. FORD ED., x, 222. (M., 1822.)

4568. LEE (Richard Henry), As a Writer.—[John] Marshall, in the first volume of his history [of Washington], chap. 3, p. 180, ascribes the petition to the King, of 1774 (1 Journ. Cong. 67) to the pen of Richard Henry Lee. I think myself certain it was not written by him, as well from what I recollect to have heard, as from the internal evidence of style. His was loose, vague, frothy, rhetorical. He was a poorer writer than his brother Arthur; and Arthur's standing may be seen in his Monitor's letters, to insure the sale of which, they took the precaution of tacking to them a new edition of the Farmers' letters like Mezentins, who "Mortua jungebat corpora vivis".—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 193. FORD ED., ix, 418. (M., 1813.)

— LEGAL TENDER.—See MONEY.

4569. LEGISLATION, The colonists and.—To continue their [the Colonists] connection with the friends whom they had left, they arranged themselves by charters of compact under the same common king, who thus completed their powers of full and perfect legislation and became the link of union between the several parts of the empire.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 465. (July 1775.)

4570. — — — The proposition [of Lord North] is altogether unsatisfactory * * * because they [Parliament] do not renounce the power * * * of legislating for us themselves in all cases whatsoever.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 480. (July 1775.)

4571. LEGISLATION, Dignity of.—The dignity of legislation admits not of changes backwards and forwards.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 531. (P., 1788.)

4572. LEGISLATION, Ex post facto.—I recollect no case where a question simply between citizens of the same State, has been transferred to the foreign department, except that of inhibiting tenders but of metallic money, and ex post facto legislation.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 342. FORD ED., x, 300. (M., 1824.)

* The address of this letter was lost.—EDITOR.

† By Johnson in his Life of General Nathaniel Greene.—EDITOR.

4573. LEGISLATION, Indiscriminate.—To show they [Parliament] mean no discontinuance of injury, they pass acts at the very time of holding out this proposition, for restraining the commerce and fisheries of the province of New England, and for interdicting the trade of the other colonies with all foreign nations. This proves unequivocally they mean not to relinquish the exercise of indiscriminate legislation over us.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 480. (July 1775.)

4574. LEGISLATION, Powers of.—From the nature of things, every society must, at all times, possess within itself the sovereign powers of legislation. The feelings of human nature revolt against the supposition of a state so situated, as that it may not, in any emergency, provide against dangers which, perhaps, threaten immediate ruin.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 138. FORD ED., i, 443. (1774.)

4575. LEGISLATION, Reform in.—They will not be able to undo all which the two preceding Legislatures * * * have done. Public faith and right will oppose this. But some parts of the system may be rightfully reformed; a liberation from the rest unremittably pursued as fast as right will permit, and the door shut in future against similar commitments of the nation.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 362. FORD ED., vi, 4. (Pa. May 1792.)

4576. LEGISLATION, Self-government and.—Rather than submit to the rights of legislating for us, assumed by the British Parliament, * * * I would lend my hand to sink the whole Island in the ocean.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 201. FORD ED., i, 484. (M., Aug. 1775.)

4577. LEGISLATURES, Conference committees.—The House of Delegates has desired [a] conference in order to preserve that harmony and friendly correspondence with the Senate, which is necessary for the discharge of their joint duties of legislation. and to prevent, both now and in future, the delay of public business, and injury which may accrue to individuals, should the two Houses differ in opinion as to the distinct office of each.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 135. (1777.)

4578. LEGISLATURES, Convening.—He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by refusing to call legislatures for a long space of time, thereby leaving the political system without any legislative head.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 10. (June 1776.)

4579. — — — He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4580. LEGISLATURES, Credentials.—The Legislature shall form one house only for the verification of their credentials.—NOTES FOR A VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., vi, 521. (1794.)

4581. LEGISLATURES, Despotism and.—All the powers of government, legislative, executive, and judiciary, result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the republic of Venice.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 361. FORD ED., iii, 223. (1782.)

4582. LEGISLATURES, Dissolution by George III.—One of the articles of impeachment against Trestrain and the other Judges of Westminster Hall, in the reign of Richard the Second, for which they suffered death, as traitors to their country, was, that they had advised the king that he might dissolve his Parliament at any time; and succeeding kings have adopted the opinion of these unjust Judges. Since the reign of the Second William, however, under which the British constitution was settled on its free and ancient principles, neither his Majesty, nor his ancestors, have exercised such a power of dissolution in the Island of Great Britain *; and when his Majesty was petitioned, by the united voice of his people there, to dissolve the present Parliament, who had become obnoxious to them, his Ministers were heard to declare, in open Parliament, that his Majesty possessed no such power by the constitution. But how different their language, and his practice, here! To declare, as their duty required, the known rights of their country, to oppose the usurpations of every foreign judicature, to disregard the imperious mandates of a minister or governor, have been the avowed causes of dissolving Houses of Representatives in America. But if such powers be really invested in his Majesty, can he suppose they are there placed to awe the members from such purposes as these? When the representative body have lost the confidence of their constituents, when they have notoriously made sale of their most valuable rights, when they have assumed to themselves powers which the people never put into their hands, then, indeed, their continuing in office becomes dangerous to the State, and calls for an exercise of the power of dissolution. Such being the causes for which the representative body should, and should not be dissolved, will it not appear strange to an unbiased observer, that that of Great Britain was not dissolved, while those of the Colonies have repeatedly incurred that sentence?—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 137. FORD ED., i, 441. (1774.)

4583. — — — Your Majesty, or your governors, have carried this power [to dissolve

* "Since this period the King has several times dissolved the parliament a few weeks before its expiration, merely as an assertion of right."—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

"On further inquiry, I find two instances of dissolutions before the Parliament would, of itself, have been at an end: viz., the Parliament called to meet August 24, 1688, was dissolved by King William, December 10, 1700, and a new one called to meet February 6, 1701, which was also dissolved, November 11, 1701, and a new one met December 30, 1701."—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

legislatures] beyond every limit known, or provided for, by the laws. After dissolving one House of Representatives, they have refused to call another, so that, for a great length of time, the legislature provided by the laws has been out of existence. From the nature of things, every society must at all times possess within itself the sovereign powers of legislation. The feelings of humanity revolt against the supposition of a state so situated as that it may not, in any emergency, provide against dangers which, perhaps, threaten immediate ruin. While those bodies are in existence to whom the people have delegated the powers of legislation, they alone possess and may exercise those powers. But when they are dissolved by the lopping off of one or more of their branches, the power reverts to the people, who may exercise it to unlimited extent, either assembling together in person, sending deputies, or in any other way they may think proper. * We forbear to trace consequences further; the dangers are conspicuous with which this practice is replete.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 137. FORD ED., i, 442. (1774.)

4588. LEGISLATURES, Division of.—The Legislature shall be separated by lot into two chambers, which shall be called [a and w] ‡ on the first day of their session in every week; which separation shall be effected by presenting to the representatives from each county separately a number of lots equal to their own number, if it be an even one or to the next even number above, if their number be odd.

* A note in Jefferson's pamphlet copy of the "Rights," &c., reads: "Insert and the frame of government, thus dissolved, should the people take upon them to lay the throne of your Majesty prostrate, or to discontinue their connection with the British empire, none will be so bold as to decide against the right or the efficacy of such avulsion."—EDITOR.

one half of which lots shall be distinctively marked for the one chamber and the other half for the other, and each member shall be, for that week, of the chamber whose lot he draws. Members not present at the first drawing for the week shall draw on their first attendance after.—NOTES FOR A CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., vi, 521. (1794.)

4589. ——. Each chamber shall appoint a speaker for the session, and it shall be weekly decided by lot between the two speakers, of which chamber each shall be for the ensuing week; and the chamber to which he is allotted shall have one the less in the lots presented to his colleagues for that week.—NOTES FOR A CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., vi, 521. (1794.)

4590. ——. Our legislatures are composed of two houses, the Senate and Representatives, elected in different modes, and for different periods, and in some States, with a qualified veto in the Executive chief. But to avoid all temptation to superior pretensions of the one over the other house, and the possibility of either erecting itself into a privileged order, might it not be better to choose at the same time and in the same mode, a body sufficiently numerous to be divided by lot into two separate houses, acting as independently as the two houses in England, or in our governments, and to shuffle their names together and redistribute them by lot, once a week for a fortnight? This would equally give the benefit of time and separate deliberation, guard against an absolute passage by acclamation, derange cabals, intrigues, and the count of noses, disarm the ascendancy which a popular demagogue might at any time obtain over either house, and render impossible all disputes between the two houses, which often form such obstacles to business.—To M. CORAY. vii, 321. (M., 1823.)

4591. ——. In the structure of our legislatures, we think experience has proved the benefit of subjecting questions to two separate bodies of deliberants; but in constituting these, natural right has been mistaken, some making one of these bodies, and some both, the representatives of property instead of persons; whereas the double deliberation might be as well obtained without any violation of true principle, either by requiring a greater age in one of the bodies, or by electing a proper number of representatives of persons, dividing them by lots into two chambers, and renewing the division at frequent intervals, in order to break up all cabals.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 357. (M., 1824.)

4592. LEGISLATURES, Election of members.—So many [representatives] only shall be deemed elected as there are units actually voting on that particular election, adding one for any fraction of votes exceeding the half unit. Nor shall more be deemed elected than the number last apportioned. If a county has not a half unit of votes, the Legislature shall incorporate its votes with those of some adjoining county.—NOTES FOR A VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., vi, 520. (1794.)

4593. ——. Every elector may vote for as many representatives as were apportioned by the Legislature to his county at the last establishment of the unit.—NOTES FOR A VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., vi, 520. (1794.)

4594. ——. There are parts of the new constitution of Spain in which you would expect, of course, that we should not concur. * * * One of these is the aristocracy, quater sublimata, of her legislators; for the ultimate electors of these will themselves have been three times sifted from the mass of the people, and may choose from the nation at large persons never named by any of the electoral bodies.—To CHEVALIER DE ONIS. vi, 342. (M., 1814.)

4595. ——. Let every man who fights or pays, exercise his just and equal right in the election of the legislature.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 11. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

4596. LEGISLATURES, Freedom of action.—The House of Representatives, when met, shall be free to act according to their own judgment and conscience.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 15. (June 1776.)

4597. LEGISLATURES, Interregnum of.—He [George III.] has refused for a long time after such dissolutions [of representative houses] to cause others to be elected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise, the State remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without and convulsions within.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4598. LEGISLATURES, Officers of.—The General Assembly shall have power to appoint the speakers of their respective houses, treasurer, auditors, attorney general, register, all general offices of the military, their own clerks and sergeants, and no other officers, except where, in other parts of this constitution, such appointment is expressly given them.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. viii, 446. FORD ED., iii, 325. (1783.)

4599. LEGISLATURES, The people and.—The people are not qualified to legislate. With us, therefore, they only choose the legislators.—To L'ABBÉ ARNOND. iii, 89. FORD ED., v, 103. (P., 1789.)

4600. LEGISLATURES, Powers of.—Our legislators are not sufficiently apprized of the rightful limits of their power; that their true office is to declare and enforce only our natural rights and duties, and to take none of them from us.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 3. FORD ED., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

4601. LEGISLATURES, Privileges.—The members [of the General Assembly], during the attendance on the General Assembly, and for so long a time before and after as shall be necessary for travelling to and from the same, shall be privileged from all personal restraint and assault, and shall have no other privilege whatsoever.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 444. FORD ED., iii, 324. (1783.)

4602. — — —. The Legislature shall form one house only for * * * what relates to their privileges.—NOTES FOR A VA. CONSTITUTION. vi, 521. (1794.)

4603. LEGISLATURES, Qualifications of Members.—Any member of the * * * Assembly accepting any office of profit under this State, or the United States, or any of them, shall thereby vacate his seat, but shall be capable of being reelected.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. viii, 445. FORD ED., iii, 325. (1783.)

4604. — — —. Of this General Assembly, the treasurer, attorney general, register, ministers of the gospel, officers of the regular armies of this State, or of the United States, persons receiving salaries or emoluments from any power foreign to our confederacy, those who are not resident in the county for which they are chosen delegates, or districts for which they are chosen senators, those who are not qualified as electors, persons who shall have committed treason, felony, or such other crime as would subject them to infamous punishment, or shall have been convicted by due course of law of bribery or corruption, in endeavoring to procure an election to the said assembly, shall be incapable of being members. All others, not herein elsewhere excluded, who may elect, shall be capable of being elected thereto.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 445. FORD ED., iii, 324. (1783.)

4605. LEGISLATURES, Size of.—Is it meant to confine the legislative body to their present numbers, that they may be the cheaper bargain whenever they shall become worth a purchase?—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 136. FORD ED., i, 441. (1774.)

4606. — — —. Twelve hundred men in one room are too many.—TO THOMAS PAINE. iii, 71. (P., 1789.)

4607. — — —. The [National] Assembly [of France] proceeds slowly in the forming their constitution. The original vice of their numbers causes this, as well as a tumultuous manner of doing business.—TO JOHN JAY. iii, 115. (P., 1789.)

4608. — — —. Render the [Virginia] legislature a desirable station by lessening the number of representatives (say to 100) and lengthening somewhat their term, and proportion them equally among the electors.—TO ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.)

4609. — — —. Reduce the legislature to a convenient number for full, but orderly discussion.—TO SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 11. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

4610. LEGISLATURES, Slothful.—The sloth of the [French National] Assembly (unavoidable from their number) has done the most sensible injury to the public cause. The patience of a people who have less of that quality than any other nation in the world, is worn threadbare.—TO JOHN JAY. iii, 115. (P., Sep. 1789.)

4611. LEGISLATURES, Suspension of.—The act passed in the seventh year of the reign of George III., having been a peculiar attempt, must ever require peculiar mention. It is entitled, "An Act for Suspending the Legislature of New York". One free and independent legislature hereby takes upon itself to suspend the powers of another, free and independent as itself; thus exhibiting a phenomenon unknown in nature, the creator and creature of its own power.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 131. FORD ED., i, 435. (1774.)

4612. — — —. The proposition [of Lord North] is altogether unsatisfactory * * * because they [Parliament] do not renounce the power of suspending our own legislatures.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 480. (July 1775.)

4613. — — —. He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and unsupportable tyranny * * * by combining with others to subject us to a foreign jurisdiction, giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation * * * for suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 11. (June 1776.)

4614. LEGISLATURES, Two chambers.—The purpose of establishing different houses of legislation is to introduce the influence of different interests or different principles. Thus in Great Britain, it is said, their constitution relies on the House of Commons for honesty, and the Lords for wisdom; which would be a rational reliance, if honesty were to be bought with money, and if wisdom were hereditary. In some of the American States, the delegates and senators are so chosen, as that the first represent the persons, and the second the property of the State. But with us, wealth and wisdom have equal chance for admission into both houses. We do not, therefore, derive from the separation of our legislature into two houses, those benefits which a proper complication of principles is capable of producing, and those which alone can compensate the evils which may be produced by their dissensions.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 361. FORD ED., iii, 223. (1782.)

4615. — — —. For good legislation two houses are necessary.—TO MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. iii, 20. FORD ED., v, 92. (P., 1789.)

4616. — — —. I find my countrymen * * * thinking with the National Assembly [of France] in all points except that of a single house of legislation. They think their own experience has so decidedly proved the necessity of two Houses to prevent the tyranny of one that they fear that this single error will shipwreck your new constitution. I am myself persuaded that theory and practice are not at variance in this instance, and that you will find it necessary hereafter to add another branch.—To DUKE DE LA ROCHEFOUCAULD. iii, 136. (N. Y., 1790.)

4617. LEGISLATURES, Tyranny of.—

4618. LEGISLATURES, Unit of representation.—The Legislature shall provide that returns be made to themselves periodically of the qualified voters in every county, by their name and qualification; and from the whole number of qualified voters * * * such an unit of representation shall be * * * taken as will keep the number of representatives within the limits of 150 and 300, allowing to every county a representative for every unit and fraction of more than half an unit it contains.—NOTES FOR A VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., vi, 520. (1794.)

4619. LEGISLATURES, Usurpation of power.—He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation for * * * suspending our own legislatures and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4620. LEGISLATURES, Vacancies.—Vacancies in the House of Representatives, by death or disqualification, shall be filled by the electors, under a warrant from the Speaker of the said house.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 14. (June 1776.)

4621. LEGISLATURES, Virginia.—Legislation shall be exercised by two separate houses, to wit, a House of Representatives, and a House of Senators, which shall be called the General Assembly of Virginia.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 13. (June 1776.)

4622. ——. The House of Representatives shall be composed of persons chosen by the people annually on the first day of October, and shall meet in General Assembly on the first day of November following, and so, from time to time, on their own adjournments, or at any time when summoned by the Administrator, and shall continue sitting so long as they shall think the public service requires.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 14. (June 1776.)

4623. ——. The Senate shall consist of not less than [15]* nor more than [50] members, who shall be appointed by the House of Representatives. One-third of them shall be removed out of office by lot at the end of the first [three] years, and their places be supplied by a new appointment; one other third shall be removed by lot, in like manner, at the end of the second [three] years and their places be supplied by a new appointment; after which one-third shall be removed annually at the end of every [three] years according to seniority. When once removed, they shall be forever incapable of being reappointed to that House. Their qualifications shall be an oath of fidelity to the State, and of duty in their office, the being [31] years of age at the least, and the having given no bribe, directly or indirectly, to obtain their appointment. While in the senatorial office, they shall be incapable of holding any public pension, or post of profit, either themselves, or by others for their use.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 15. (June 1776.)

4624. L'ENFANT (Major), Dismissal of.

—It having been found impracticable to employ Major L'Enfant about the Federal city, in that degree of subordination which was lawful and proper, he has been notified that his services are at an end. It is now proper that he should receive the reward of his past services; and the wish that he should have no just cause of discontent, suggests that it should be liberal. The President thinks of two thousand five hundred, or three thousand dollars; but leaves the determination to you.*—To MESSRS. JOHNSON, CARROLL AND STEWART. iii, 336. (Pa., 1792.)

4625. LETHARGY, Fatal to liberty.—

Lethargy is the forerunner of death to the public liberty.—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 318. FORD ED., iv, 467. (P., 1787.)

4626. LETTERS, Answering.—

Instead of writing ten or twelve letters a day, which I have been in the habit of doing as a thing in course, I put off answering my letters now farmer-like, till a rainy day, and then find them sometimes postponed by other necessary occupations.—To JOHN ADAMS. iv, 103. FORD ED., vi, 505. (M., April 1794.)

4627. LETTERS, Distorted.—

Every word which goes from me, whether verbally or in writing, becomes the subject of so much malignant distortion, and perverted construction, that I am obliged to caution my friends against admitting the possibility of my letters getting into the public papers or a copy of them to be taken under any degree of confidence.—To EDWARD DOWSE. iv, 477. (W., 1803.)

4628. LETTERS, Gleams of light.—

Your letters * * * serve, like gleams of light, to cheer a dreary scene; where envy, hatred, malice, revenge, and all the worst passions of men, are marshalled to make one another as miserable as possible.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J. 248. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

4629. LETTERS, Private.—

I have generally great aversion to the insertion of my letters in the public papers; because of my passion for quiet retirement, and never to be exhibited in scenes on the public stage.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 254. (M., 1822.)

4630. LETTERS, Sanctity of.—

I should wish never to put pen to paper; and the more

* L'Enfant was a French engineer who was employed in laying out the City of Washington.—EDITOR because of the treacherous practice some people have of publishing one's letters without leave. Lord Mansfield declared it a breach of trust, and punishable at law. I think it should be a penitentiary felony.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 244. FORD ED., x, 216. (M., 1822.)

4631. LETTERS, Unanswered.—The constant pressure of business has forced me to follow the practice of not answering letters which do not necessarily require it.—To ROBERT WILLIAMS. v, 209. FORD ED., ix, 166. (W., 1807.)

4632. LETTER-WRITING, Dangers of.—The abuse of confidence by publishing my letters has cost me more than all other pains, and makes me afraid to put pen to paper in a letter of sentiment.—To C. HAMMOND. vii, 217. (M., 1821.)

4633. — I sometimes expressly desire that my letter may not be published; but this is so like requesting a man not to steal or cheat, that I am ashamed of it after I have done it.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 223. FORD ED., x, 193. (M., 1821.)

4634. LETTER-WRITING, Drudgery of.—From sunrise to one or two o'clock, and often from dinner to dark, I am drudging at the writing table. And all this to answer letters into which neither interest nor inclination on my part enters; and often from persons whose names I have never before heard. Yet, writing civilly, it is hard to refuse them civil answers. This is the burthen of my life, a very grievous one indeed, and one which I must get rid of. Delaplaine lately requested me to give him a line on the subject of his book; meaning, as I well knew, to publish it. This I constantly refuse; but in this instance yielded, that in saying a word for him I might say two for myself. I expressed in it freely my sufferings from this source; hoping it would have the effect of an indirect appeal to the discretion of those, strangers and others, who, in the most friendly dispositions, oppress me with their concerns, their pursuits, their projects, inventions and speculations, political, moral, religious, mechanical, mathematical, historical, &c., &c. I hope the appeal will bring me relief, and that I shall be left to exercise and enjoy correspondence with the friends I love, and on subjects which they, or my own inclinations present.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 54. FORD ED., x, 71. (M., 1817.)

4635. LETTER-WRITING, Relief from.—It occurs then, that my condition of existence, truly stated in that letter, if better known, might check the kind indiscretions which are so heavily oppressing the departing hours of life. Such a relief [from letter-writers] would, to me, be an ineffable blessing. But yours, * * * equally interesting and affecting, should accompany that to which it is an answer. The two, taken together, would excite a joint interest, and place before our fellow-citizens the present condition of two ancient servants, who having faithfully performed their forty or fifty campaigns, stipendiis omnibus expletis, have a reasonable claim to repose from all disturbance in the sanctuary of invalids and superannuates.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 254. FORD ED., x, 218. (M., 1822.)

4636. LETTER-WRITING, Voluminous.—I do not know how far you may suffer, as I do, under the persecution of letters, of which every mail brings me a fresh load. They are letters of enquiry, for the most part, always of good will, sometimes from friends whom I esteem, but much oftener from persons whose names are unknown to me, but written kindly and civilly, and to which, therefore, civility requires answers. * * * I happened to turn to my letter-list some time ago, and a curiosity was excited to count those received in a single year. It was the year before the last. I found the number to be one thousand two hundred and sixty-seven, many of them requiring answers of elaborate research, and all to be answered with due attention and consideration. Take an average of this number for a week or a day, and I will repeat the question * * * is this life? At best, it is but the life of a mill-horse, who sees no end to his circle but in death. To such a life, that of a cabbage is paradise.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 254. FORD ED., x, 218. (M., 1822.)

4637. LETTER-WRITING vs. READING.—The drudgery of letter writing often denies me the leisure of reading a single page in a week.—To EZRA STILES. vii, 127. (M., 1819.)

4638. LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION, Jefferson suggests.—The river Missouri, and the Indians inhabiting it, are not as well known as is rendered desirable by their connection with the Mississippi, and consequently with us. It is, however, understood, that the country on that river is inhabited by numerous tribes, who furnish great supplies of furs and peltry to the trade of another nation, carried on in a high latitude, through an infinite number of portages and lakes, shut up by ice through a long season. The commerce on that line could bear no competition with that of the Missouri, traversing a moderate climate, offering, according to the best accounts, a continued navigation from its source, and possibly with a single portage, from the Western Ocean, and finding to the Atlantic a choice of channels through the Illinois or Wabash, the Lakes and Hudson, through the Ohio and Susquehanna, or Potomac or James rivers, and through the Tennessee and Savannah rivers. An intelligent officer, with ten or twelve chosen men, fit for the enterprise, and willing to undertake it, taken from our posts, where they may be spared without inconvenience, might explore the whole line, even to the Western Ocean; have conferences with the natives on the subject of commercial intercourse; get admission among them for our traders, as others are admitted; agree on convenient deposits for an interchange of articles; and return with the information required, in the course of two summers. Their arms and accoutrements, some instruments of observation, and light and cheap presents for the Indians, would be all the apparatus they could carry, and with an expectation of a soldier's portion of land on their return, would constitute the whole expense. Their pay would be going on, whether here or there. While other civilized nations have encountered great expense to enlarge the boundaries of knowledge, by undertaking voyages of discovery, and for other literary purposes, in various parts and directions, our nation seems to owe to the same object, as well as to its own interests, to explore this, the only line of easy communication across the continent, and so directly traversing our own part of it. The interests of commerce place the principal object within the constitutional powers and care of Congress, and that it should incidentally advance the geographical knowledge of our continent, cannot be but an additional gratification. The nation, claiming the territory, regarding this as a literary pursuit, which it is in the habit of permitting within its Dominions, would not be disposed to view it with jealousy, even if the expiring state of its interests there did not render it a matter of indifference. The appropriation of two thousand five hundred dollars "for the purpose of extending the external commerce of the United States", while understood and considered by the Executive as giving the legislative sanction, would cover the undertaking from notice, and prevent the obstructions which interested individuals might otherwise previously prepare in its way.—CONFIDENTIAL MESSAGE. viii, 243. FORD ED., viii, 201. (Jan. 1803.)

4639. LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION, Preparations.—I had long deemed it incumbent on the authorities of our country to have the great western wilderness beyond the Mississippi explored, to make known its geography, its natural productions, its general character and inhabitants. Two attempts which I had myself made formerly, before the country was ours, the one from west to east, the other from east to west, had both proved abortive. When called to the administration of the general government, I made this an object of early attention, and proposed it to Congress. They voted a sum of five thousand dollars for its execution, and I placed Captain Lewis at the head of the enterprise. No man within the range of my acquaintance united so many of the qualifications necessary for its successful direction. But he had not received such an astronomical education as might enable him to give us the geography of the country with the precision desired. The Missouri and Columbia, which were to constitute the tract of his journey, were rivers which varied little in their progressive latitudes, but changed their longitudes rapidly and at every step. To qualify him for making these observations, so important to the value of the enterprise, I encouraged him to apply himself to this particular object, and gave him letters to Doctor Patterson and Mr. Ellicott, requesting them to instruct him in the necessary processes. Those for the longitude would, of course, be founded on the lunar distances. But as these require essentially the aid of a time-keeper, it occurred to me that during a journey of two, three, or four years, exposed to so many accidents as himself and the instrument would be, we might expect with certainty that it would become deranged, and in a desert country where it could not be repaired. I thought it then highly important that some means of observation should be furnished him which should be practicable and competent to ascertain his longitudes in that event. The equatorial occurred to myself as the most promising substitute. I observed only that Ramsden, in his explanation of its uses, and particularly that of finding the longitude at land, still required his observer to have the aid of a time-keeper. But this cannot be necessary, for the margin of the equatorial circle of this instrument being divided into time by hours, minutes and seconds, supplies the main functions of the time-keeper, and for measuring merely the interval of the observations, is such as not to be neglected. A portable pendulum for counting, by an assistant, would fully answer that purpose. I suggested my fears to several of our best astronomical friends, and my wishes that other processes should be furnished him, if any could be, which might guard us ultimately from disappointment. Several other methods were proposed, but all requiring the use of a time-keeper. That of the equatorial being recommended by none, and other duties refusing me time for protracted consultations, I relinquished the idea for that occasion. But, if a sound one, it should not be neglected. Those deserts are yet to be explored, and their geography given to the world and ourselves with a correctness worthy of the science of the age. The acquisition of the country before Captain Lewis's departure facilitated our enterprise, but his time-keeper failed early in his journey. His dependence, then, was on the compass and log-line, with the correction of latitudes only; and the longitudes of the different points of the Missouri, of the Stony Mountains, the Columbia and Pacific, at its mouth, remain yet to be obtained by future enterprise.—To ———, vii, 224. (M., 1821.) See LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE.

4640. ———. In the journey you are about to undertake * * * should you reach the Pacific Ocean * * * and be * * * without money * * * your resource * * * can only be the credit of the United States; for which purpose I hereby authorize you to draw on the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy of the United States, according as you may find your drafts will be most negotiable, for the purpose of obtaining money or necessaries for yourself and men; and I solemnly pledge the faith of the United States that these drafts shall be paid punctually * * * And to give more entire satisfaction and confidence to those who may be disposed to aid you, I, Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, have written this letter of general credit for you with my own hand, and signed it with my name.—TO CAPTAIN MERIWETHER LEWIS. iv, 492. (W., July 4, 1803.)

4641. LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION, Success.—The expedition of Messrs. Lewis and Clark, for exploring the river Missouri, and the best communication from that to the Pacific ocean, has had all the success which could have been expected. They have traced the Missouri nearly to its source, descended the Columbia to the Pacific ocean, ascertained with accuracy the geography of that interesting communication across our continent, learned the character of the country, of its commerce, and inhabitants; and it is but justice to say that Messrs. Lewis and Clark, and their brave companions, have by this arduous service deserved well of their country.—SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 66. FORD ED., viii, 492. (Dec. 1806.)

4642. LEVEES, Presidential.—Edmund Randolph tells James Madison and myself a curious fact which he had from Lear. When the President went to New York, he resisted for three weeks the efforts to introduce levees. At length he yielded, and left it to Humphreys and some others to settle the forms. Accordingly, an antechamber and presence room were provided, and when those who were to pay their court were assembled, the President set out, preceded by Humphreys. After passing through the antechamber, the door of the inner room was thrown open, and Humphreys entered first, calling out with a loud voice, "the President of the United States". The President was so much disconcerted with it, that he did not recover from it the whole time of the levee, and when the company was gone, he said to Humphreys, "Well, you have taken me in once, but by God you shall never take me in a second time".—THE ANAS. ix, 132. FORD ED., i, 216. (1793.)

4643. LEVEES, Washington's explanation.—President Washington [in conversation with me] went lengthily into the late attacks on him for levees, &c., and explained how he had been led into them by the persons he consulted at New York; and that if he could but know what the sense of the public was, he would most cheerfully conform to it.—THE ANAS. ix, 132. FORD ED., i, 216. (Feb. 1793.) See CEREMONY, ETIQUETTE and FORMS.

4644. LIANCOURT (Duke de), Appeal for.—I wish the present government would permit M. de Liancourt's return. He is an honest man, sincerely attached to his country, and very desirous of being permitted to live retired in the bosom of his family. My sincere affection for his connections at Rocheguyon * * * would render it a peculiar felicity to me to be any ways instrumental in having him restored to them. I have no means, however, unless you can interpose without giving offence.—TO JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 88. (M., 1796.)

4645. LIANCOURT (Duke de), Patriot.—The bearer hereof is the Duke de Liancourt, one of the principal noblemen of France, and one of the richest. All this he has lost in the revolutions of his country, retaining only his virtue and good sense, which he possesses in a high degree. He was President of the National Assembly of France in its earliest stage, and forced to fly from the proscriptions of Marat.—TO MR. HITZ. iv, 145. (M., 1796.)

4646. LIBELS, Federal cognizance.—Libels, falsehood, and defamation, equally with heresy and false religion, are withheld from the cognizance of Federal tribunals.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 466. FORD ED., vii, 295. (1798.)

4647. LIBELS, Guarding against.—I have seen in the New York papers a calumny which I suppose will run through the Union, that I had written by Doctor Logan letters to Merlin and Talleyrand. On retiring from the Secretary of State's office, I determined to drop all correspondence with France, knowing the base calumnies which would be built on the most innocent correspondence. I have not, therefore, written a single letter to that country, within that period except to Mr. Short on his own affairs merely which are under my direction, and once or twice to Colonel Monroe. By Logan, I did not write even a letter to Mr. Short, nor to any other person whatever. I thought this notice of the matter due to my friends, though I do not go into the newspapers with a formal declaration of it.—TO AARON BURR. FORD ED., vii, 259. (M., Nov. 1798.)

4648. LIBELS, Jefferson and.—At this moment my name is running through all the city [Philadelphia] as detected in a criminal correspondence with the French Directory, and fixed upon me by the documents from our Envoys, now before the two Houses. The detection of this by the publication of the papers, should they be published, will not relieve all the effects of the lie, and should they not be published, they may keep it up as long and as successfully as they did and do that of my being involved in Blount's conspiracy.—TO JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 233. (Pa., April 1798.)

4649. — — — Party passions are indeed high. Nobody has more reasons to know it than myself. I receive daily bitter proofs of it from people who never saw me. nor know anything of me but through "Porcupine"

[William Cobbett] and Fenno.—TO JAMES LEWIS, JR. iv, 241. FORD ED., vii, 250. (Pa., May 1798.)

4650. — — — Our very long intimacy as fellow laborers in the same cause, the recent expressions of mutual confidence which had preceded your mission [to France], the interesting course which that had taken, and particularly and personally as it regarded yourself, made me anxious to hear from you * * *. I was the more so, too, as I had myself, during the whole of your absence, as well as since your return, been a constant butt for every shaft of calumny which malice and falsehood could form, and the presses, public speakers, or private letters disseminate. One of these, too, was of a nature to touch yourself; as if, wanting confidence in your efforts, I had been capable of usurping powers committed to you, and authorizing negotiations private and collateral to yours. The real truth is, that though Doctor Logan, the pretended missionary, about four or five days before he sailed for Hamburg, told me he was going there, and thence to Paris, and asked and received from me a certificate of his citizenship, character, and circumstances of life, merely as a protection, should he be molested on his journey, in the present turbulent and suspicious state of Europe, yet I had been led to consider his object as relative to his private affairs; and though, from an intimacy of some standing, he knew well enough my wishes for peace and my political sentiments in general, he nevertheless received then no particular declaration of them, no authority to communicate them to any mortal, nor to speak to any one in my name, or in anybody's name, on that, or on any other subject whatever; nor did I write by him a scrip of a pen to any person whatever. This he has himself honestly and publicly declared since his return; and from his well-known character and every other circumstance, every candid man must perceive that his enterprise was dictated by his own enthusiasm, without consultation or communication with any one; that he acted in Paris on his own ground, and made his own way. Yet to give some color to his proceedings, which might implicate the republicans in general, and myself particularly, they have not been ashamed to bring forward a supposititious paper, drawn by one of their own party in the name of Logan, and falsely pretended to have been presented by him to the government of France; counting that the bare mention of my name therein, would connect that in the eye of the public with this transaction.—TO ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 266. FORD ED., vii, 325. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

4651. — — — It is hardly necessary for me to declare to you, on everything sacred, that the part they assigned to me was entirely a calumny. Logan called on me four or five days before his departure, and asked and received a certificate (in my private capacity) of his citizenship and circumstances of life, merely as a protection, should he be molested in the present turbulent state of Europe. I have given such to an hundred others, and they have been much more frequently asked and obtained by Tories than Whigs. I did not write a scrip of a pen by him to any person. From long acquaintance he knew my wishes for peace, and my political sentiments generally, but he received no particular declaration of them nor one word of authority to speak in my name, or anybody's name on that or any other subject. It was an enterprise founded in the enthusiasm of his own character. He went on his own ground, and made his own way. His object was virtuous, and the effect meritorious.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 276. FORD ED., vii, 338. (Pa., 1799.)

4652. LIBELS, Jurisdiction over.—Nor does the [my] opinion of the unconstitutionality, and consequent nullity of that law, [Sedition] remove all restraint from the overwhelming torrent of slander, which is confounding all vice and virtue, all truth and falsehood, in the United States. The power to do that is fully possessed by the several State Legislatures. It was reserved to them, and was denied to the General Government, by the Constitution, according to our construction of it. While we deny that Congress have a right to control the freedom of the press, we have ever asserted the right of the States, and their exclusive right, to do so. They have accordingly, all of them, made provisions for punishing slander, which those who have time and inclination, resort to for the vindication of their characters.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 561. FORD ED., viii, 311. (M., 1804.)

4655. ——. No inference is here intended, that the laws, provided by the States against false and defamatory publications, should not be enforced; he who has time, renders a service to public morals and public tranquillity, in reforming these abuses by the salutary coercions of the law.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 44. FORD ED., viii, 346. (1805.)

4656. ——. We have received from your [Massachusetts] presses a very malevolent and incendiary denunciation of the administration, bottomed on absolute falsehood from beginning to end. The author would merit exemplary punishment for so flagitious a libel, were not the torment of his own abominable temper punishment sufficient for even as base a crime as this.—To LEVI LINCOLN. v, 264. (W., March 1808.)

4659. LIBELS, Punishment for.—I might have filled the courts of the United States with actions for slanders, and have ruined perhaps many persons who are not innocent. But this would be no equivalent for the loss of character. I leave them, therefore, to the reproof of their own consciences. If these do not condemn them, there will yet come a day when the false witness will meet a Judge who has not slept over his slanders.—To URIAH M'GREGORY. iv, 333. (M., 1800.)

4660. LIBELS, Sedition law and.—Mr. Randolph has proposed an inquiry [in Congress] into certain prosecutions at common law in Connecticut, for libels on the government, and not only himself but others have stated them with such affected caution, and such hints at the same time, as to leave on every mind the impression that they had been instituted either by my direction, or with my acquiescence, at least. This has not been denied by my friends, because probably the fact is unknown to them. I shall state it for their satisfaction, and leave it to be disposed of as they think best. I had observed in a newspaper some dark hints of a prosecution in Connecticut, but so obscurely hinted that I paid little attention to it. Some considerable time after, it was again mentioned, so that I understood that some prosecution was going on in the federal court there, for calumnies uttered from the pulpit against me by a clergyman. I immediately wrote to Mr. Granger, who, I think, was in Connecticut at the time, stating that I had laid it down as a law to myself, to take no notice of the thousand calumnies issued against me, but to trust my character to my own conduct, and the good sense and candor of my fellow citizens; that I had found no reason to be dissatisfied with that course, and I was unwilling it should be broke through by others as to any matter concerning me; and I therefore, requested him to direct the district attorney to dismiss the prosecution. Some time after this, I heard of subpoenas being served on General Lee, David M. Randolph, and others, as witnesses to attend the trial. I then for the first time conjectured the subject of the libel. I immediately wrote to Mr. Granger, to require an immediate dismissal of the prosecution. The answer of Mr. Huntington the district attorney, was that these subpoenas had been issued by the defendant without his knowledge, that it had been his intention to dismiss all the prosecutions at the first meeting of the court, and to accompany it with an avowal of his opinion, that they could not be maintained, because the federal court had no jurisdiction over libels. This was accordingly done. I did not till then know that there were other prosecutions of the same nature, nor do I now know what were their subjects. But all went off together; and I afterwards saw in the hands of Mr. Granger, a letter written by the clergyman, disavowing any personal ill will towards me, and solemnly declaring he had never uttered the words charged. I think Mr. Granger either showed me, or said there were affidavits of at least half a dozen respectable men, who were present at the sermon and swore no such expressions were uttered, and as many equally respectable men who swore the contrary. But the clergyman expressed his gratification at the dismissal of the prosecution. * * * Certain it is, that the prosecutions had been instituted, and had made considerable progress, without my knowledge, that they were disapproved by me as soon as known, and directed to be discontinued. The attorney did it on the same ground on which I had acted myself in the cases of Duane, Callendar and others; to wit, that the Sedition law was unconstitutional and null, and that my obligation to execute what was law, involved that of not suffering rights secured by valid laws to be prostrated by what was no law.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v, 452. FORD ED., ix, 253. (M., 1809.)

4663. — — — When we reflect that the eyes of the virtuous all over the earth are turned with anxiety on us, as the only depositories of the sacred fire of liberty, and that our falling into anarchy would decide forever the destinies of mankind, and seal the political heresy that man is incapable of self-government, the only contest between divided friends should be who will dare farthest into the ranks of the common enemy.—To JOHN HOLLINS. v, 597. (M., 1811.) See 296.

4664. LIBERTY, Attachment to.—Our attachment to no nation on earth should supplant our attachment to liberty.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 470. (1775.)

4665. LIBERTY, Blood and.—The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants. It is its natural manure.—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 319. FORD ED., iv, 467. (P., 1787.)

4666. — — — A warm zeal for the attainment and enjoyment by all mankind of as much liberty, as each may exercise without injury to the equal liberty of his fellow citizens. I have lamented that in France the

endeavors to obtain this should have been attended with the effusion of so much blood.—To M. DE MEUNIER. FORD ED., vii, 13. (M., April 1795.)

4668. LIBERTY, Contagious.—The disease of liberty is catching.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 194. FORD ED., x, 179. (M., 1820.)

4672. LIBERTY, European.—Heaven send that the glorious example of France may be but the beginning of the history of European liberty, and that you may live many years in health and happiness to see at length that heaven did not make man in its wrath.—To LA DUCHESSE D'AUVILLE. iii, 135. FORD ED., v, 154. (N.Y., April 1790.)

4673. — — — God send that all the nations who join in attacking the liberties of France may end in the attainment of their own.—To JOEL BARLOW. iii, 451. FORD ED., vi, 88. (Pa., 1792.)

4674. LIBERTY, First of all.—Postpone to the great object of Liberty every smaller motive and passion.—To THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 298. (Wg., 1780.)

4675. LIBERTY, France and.—The atrocious proceedings of France towards this country, had well nigh destroyed its liberties. The Anglomans and monocrats had so artfully confounded the cause of France with that of freedom, that both went down in the same scale.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 301. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

4676. — — — May you see France re-established in that temperate portion of liberty which does not infer either anarchy or licentiousness, in that high degree of prosperity which would be the consequence, of such a government, in that, in short, which the constitution of 1789 would have insured it, if wisdom could have stayed at that point the fervid but imprudent zeal of men, who did not know the character of their own countrymen.—To MADAME DE STAEL. vi, 120. (May 1813.)

4677. LIBERTY, Free Press and.—The functionaries of every government have propensities to command at will the liberty and property of their constituents. There is no safe deposit for these but with the people themselves; nor can they be safe with them without information. Where the press is free, and every man able to read, all is safe.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 517. FORD ED., x, 4. (M., 1816.)

4678. LIBERTY, French Revolution and.—The success of the French Revolution will ensure the progress of liberty in Europe, and its preservation here.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. FORD ED., v, 358. (Pa., 1791.)

4679. — — — The liberty of the whole earth was depending on the issue of the contest, and was ever such a prize won with so little innocent blood?—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 502. FORD ED., vi, 154. (Pa., 1793.)

4680. — — — I continue eternally attached to the principles of your [French] Revolution. I hope it will end in the establishment of some firm government, friendly to liberty, and capable of maintaining it. If it does, the world will become inevitably free.—To J. P. BRISSOT DE WARVILLE. FORD ED., vi, 249. (Pa., 1793.)

4681. LIBERTY, Gift of God.—All men * * * are endowed by their Creator with inherent* and inalienable rights. Among these * * * [is] liberty.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4683. LIBERTY, Government and.—The natural progress of things is for liberty to yield and government to gain ground.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v, 20. (P., 1788.)

4684. — — — The policy of the American government is to leave their citizens free, neither restraining nor aiding them in their pursuits.—To M. L'HOMMANDE. ii, 236. (P., 1787.)

4686. LIBERTY, Happiness and.—It is our glory that we first put the ball of liberty into motion, and our happiness that, being foremost, we had no bad examples to follow.—To TENCH COXE. FORD ED., vii, 22. (M., 1795.)

4687. LIBERTY, Kosciusko and.—General Kosciusko is as pure a son of liberty as I have ever known, and of that liberty which is to go to all, and not to the few or the rich alone.—To HORATIO GATES. iv, 212. FORD ED., vii, 204. (Pa., 1798.)

4688. LIBERTY, Life and.—The God who gave us life, gave us liberty at the same time: the hand of force may destroy, but it cannot disjoin them.*—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 142. FORD ED., i, 447. (1774.)

4689. LIBERTY, Light and.—Light and liberty go together.—To TENCH COXE. FORD ED., vii, 22. (M., 1795.)

4690. — — — I will not believe our labors are lost. I shall not die without a hope that light and liberty are on steady advance.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 217. (M., 1821.)

4691. LIBERTY, Love of.—The commotions in Massachusetts† are a proof that the people love liberty, and I could not wish them less than they have.—To EZRA STILES. ii, 77. (P., 1786.)

4692. LIBERTY, Napoleon and.—If the hero [Napoleon] who has saved you from a combination of enemies, shall also be the means of giving you as great a portion of liberty as the opinions, habits and character of the nation are prepared for, progressive preparation may fit you for progressive portions of that first of blessings, and you may in time attain what we erred in supposing could be hastily seized and maintained, in the present state of political information among your citizens at large.—To M. CABANIS. iv, 496. (W., 1803.)

4693. LIBERTY, Natural.—Under the law of nature, we are all born free.—LEGAL ARGUMENT. FORD ED., i, 380. (1770.)

4694. LIBERTY, No easy road to.—We are not to expect to be translated from despotism to liberty in a feather bed.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 132. FORD ED., v, 152. (N.Y., 1790.)

4695. — — — The ground of liberty is to be gained by inches and we must be contented to secure what we can get, from time to time, and eternally press forward for what is yet to get. It takes time to persuade men to do even what is for their own good.—To REV. CHARLES CLAY. iii, 126. FORD ED., v, 142. (M., 1790.)

4696. LIBERTY, Order and.—Possessing ourselves the combined blessing of liberty and order, we wish the same to other countries.—To M. CORAY. vii, 318. (M., 1823.)

4697. LIBERTY, Preservation of.—We do then most solemnly, before God and the world declare that, regardless of every consequence, at the risk of every distress, the arms we have been compelled to assume we will use with the perseverance, exerting to their utmost energies all those powers which our Creator hath given us, to preserve that liberty which He committed to us in sacred deposit and to protect from every hostile hand our lives and our properties.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 474. (July 1775.)

4698. ——. I am convinced that, on the good sense of the people, we may rely with the most security for the preservation of a due degree of liberty.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 480. (P., 1787.)

4699. ——. The people are the only sure reliance for the preservation of our liberty.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 332. (1787.)

4700. ——. The preservation of the holy fire is confided to us by the world, and the sparks which will emanate from it will ever serve to rekindle it in other quarters of the globe, Numinibus secundis.—To REV. MR. KNOX. v, 503. (M., 1810.)

4701. LIBERTY, Preparation for.—A full measure of liberty is not now perhaps to be expected by your nation, nor am I confident they are prepared to preserve it. More than a generation will be requisite, under the administration of reasonable laws favoring the progress of knowledge in the general mass of the people, and their habitation to an independent security of person and property, before they will be capable of estimating the value of freedom, and the necessity of a sacred adherence to the principles on which it rests for preservation. Instead of that liberty which takes root and growth in the progress of reason, if recovered by mere force or accident, it becomes, with an unprepared people, a tyranny still, of the many, the few, or the one.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vi, 421. FORD ED., ix, 505. (M., Feb. 1815.)

4704. LIBERTY, Resistance and.—What country can preserve its liberties if its rulers are not warned from time to time that the people preserve the spirit of resistance?—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 318. FORD ED., iv, 467. (P., 1787.) See REBELLION.

4705. LIBERTY, Restricted.—I had hoped that Geneva was familiarized to such a degree of liberty, that they might without difficulty or danger fill up the measure to its maximum; a term, which, though in the insulated man, bounded only by his natural powers, must, in society, be so far restricted as to protect himself against the evil passions of his associates, and consequently, them against him.—To M. D'IVERNOIS. iv, 114. FORD ED., vii, 4. (M., Feb. 1795.)

4706. LIBERTY, Royalty and.—The public liberty may be more certainly secured by abolishing an office [royalty] which all experience hath shown to be inveterately inimical thereto.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 12. (June 1776.)

4707. ——. It is impossible for you to conceive what is passing in our conclave, and it is evident that one or two at least, under pretence of avoiding war on the one side, have no great antipathy to run foul of it on the other, and to make a part in the confederacy of princes against human liberty.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 563. FORD ED., vi, 261. (Pa., May 1793.)

4708. ——. I am not for * * * joining in the confederacy of kings to war against the principles of liberty.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

4709. LIBERTY, Sacred.—For promoting the public happiness, those persons whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth, birth, or other accidental condition or circumstance.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. 4711. LIBERTY, Safeguards of.—[I disapproved from the first moment [in the new Constitution] the want of a bill of rights, to guard liberty against the legislative as well as the executive branches of the government.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 586. FORD ED., v, 76. (P., March 1789.)

4712. ——. To insure the safety of the public liberty, its depository should be subject to be changed with the greatest ease possible, and without suspending or disturbing for a moment the movements of the machine of government.—To M. DESTUTT TRACY. v, 569. FORD ED., ix, 308. (M., 1811.)

4713. LIBERTY, Science and virtue.—Liberty is the great parent of science and of virtue; and a nation will be great in both in proportion as it is free.—To DR. WILLARD. iii, 17. (P., 1789.)

4714. — — —. The general spread of the light of science has already laid open to every view the palpable truth, that the mass of mankind has not been born with saddles on their backs, nor a favored few booted and spurred, ready to ride them legitimately, by the grace of God.—To ROGER C. WEIGHTMAN. vii, 451. FORD ED., x, 391. (M., 1826.)

4715. LIBERTY, Sea of.—The boisterous sea of liberty is never without a wave.—To RICHARD RUSH. vii, 182. (M., 1820.)

4716. LIBERTY, Security for.—We agree particularly in the necessity of some * * * better security for civil liberty.—To JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 259. FORD ED., vii, 309. (M., 1798.)

4717. — — —. Since, by the choice of my constituents, I have entered on a second term of administration, I embrace the opportunity to give this public assurance, * * * that I will zealously cooperate with you in every measure which may tend to secure the liberty, property, and personal safety of our fellow citizens, and to consolidate the republican forms and principles of our government.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 53. FORD ED., viii, 396. (Dec. 1805.)

4718. LIBERTY, Subversion of.—The moderation and virtue of a single character have probably prevented this Revolution from being closed, as most others have been, by a subversion of that liberty it was intended to establish.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 335. FORD ED., iii, 467. (A., 1784.)

4719. LIBERTY, Universal.—The ball of liberty is now so well in motion that it will roll round the globe.—To TENCH COXE. FORD ED., vii, 22. (M., 1795.)

4721. — — —. That we should wish to see the people of other countries free, is as natural, and at least as justifiable, as that one king should wish to see the kings of other countries maintained in their despotism.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 78. FORD ED., x, 90. (M., 1817.)

4722. LIBERTY vs. WEALTH.—What a cruel reflection that a rich country cannot long be a free one.—TRAVELS IN FRANCE. ix, 319. (1787.)

4723. LIBRARY, Circulating.—Nothing would do more extensive good at small expense than the establishment of a small circulating library in every country.—To JOHN WYCHE. v, 448. (M., 1809.)

4724. LIBERTY, Founding.—There shall be paid out of the treasury [of Virginia] every year the sum of two thousand pounds, to be laid out in such books and maps as may proper to be preserved in a public library; which library shall be established at the town of Richmond.—PUBLIC LIBRARY BILL. FORD ED., ii, 236. (1799.)

4725. LIBRARY, Free.—No person shall remove any book or map out of the library; * * * but the same [may] be made useful by indulging the researches of the learned and curious, within the said library, without fee or reward.—PUBLIC LIBRARY BILL. FORD ED., ii, 236. (1799.)

4726. LIBRARY, Jefferson's.—You know my collection, its condition and extent. I have been fifty years making it, and have spared no pains, opportunity or expense, to make it what it is. While residing in Paris. I devoted every afternoon I was disengaged, for a summer or two, in examining all the principal book stores, turning over every book with my own hand, and putting by everything which related to America, and indeed whatever was rare and valuable in every science. Besides this, I had standing orders during the whole time I was in Europe, on its principal book-marts, particularly Amsterdam, Frankfurt, Madrid and London, for such works relating to America as could not be found in Paris. So that in that department particularly, such a collection was made as probably can never again be effected, because it is hardly probable that the same opportunities, the same time, industry, perseverance and expense, with some knowledge of the bibliography of the subject, would again happen to be in concurrence. During the same period, and after my return to America, I was led to procure, also, whatever related to the duties of those in the high concerns of the nation. So that the collection, which I suppose is of between nine and ten thousand volumes, while it includes what is chiefly valuable in science and literature generally, extends more particularly to whatever belongs to the American Statesman. In the diplomatic and parliamentary branches, it is particularly full.—To S. H. SMITH. vi, 383. FORD ED., ix, 486. (M., Sep. 1814.)

4727. LIBRARY, Sale to Congress.—It is long since I have been sensible it ought not to continue private property, and had provided that at my death, Congress should have the refusal of it at their own price. But the loss they have now incurred, makes the present the proper moment for their accommodation, without regard to the small remnant of time and the barren use of my enjoying it. I ask of your friendship, therefore, to make for me the tender of it to the Library Committee of Congress, not knowing myself of whom the Committee consists. Nearly the whole are well bound, abundance of them elegantly, and of the choicest editions existing. They may be valued by persons named by themselves, and the payment made convenient to the public. * * * I do not know that it contains any branch of science which Congress would wish to exclude from their collection; there is, in fact, no subject to which a member of Congress may not have occasion to refer. But such a wish would not correspond with my views of preventing its dismemberment. My desire is either to place it in their hands entire, or to preserve it so here.—To S. H. SMITH. vi, 384. FORD ED., ix, 486. (M., Sep. 1814.) See 1133.

4729. LIES, Circulating.—There is an enemy somewhere endeavoring to sow discord among us. Instead of listening first, then doubting, and lastly believing anile tales handed round without an atom of evidence, if my friends will address themselves to me directly, as you have done, they shall be informed with frankness and thankfulness.—To WILLIAM DUANE. iv, 590. FORD ED., viii, 431. (W., 1806.)

4730. LIES, Fearless of.—The man who fears no truths has nothing to fear from lies.—To DR. GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x, 27. (M., 1816.)

4731. LIES, Folly of.—It is of great importance to set a resolution, not to be shaken, never to tell an untruth. There is no vice so mean, so pitiful, so contemptible; and he who permits himself to tell a lie once, finds it much easier to do it a second and third time, till at length it becomes habitual; he tells lies without attending to it, and truths without the world's believing him. This falsehood of the tongue leads to that of the heart, and in time depraves all its good dispositions.—To PETER CARR. i, 396. (P., 1785.)

4732. LIES, Newspaper.—There was an enthusiasm towards us all over Europe at the moment of the peace. The torrent of lies published unremittingly in every day's London papers first made an impression and produced a coolness. The republication of these lies in most of the papers of Europe (done probably by authority of the governments to discourage emigrations), carried them home to the belief of every mind. They supposed everything in America was anarchy, tumult and civil war. The reception of the Marquis Lafayette gave a check to these ideas.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 413. (P., 1785.)

4733. — — —. It has been so impossible to contradict all their lies, that I have determined to contradict none; for while I should be engaged with one, they would publish twenty new ones. Thirty years of public life have enabled most of those who read newspapers to judge of one for themselves.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 448. (Ep., May 1800.)

4734. LIES, Political.—Were I to buy off every federal lie by a sacrifice of two or three thousand dollars, a very few such purchases would make me as bankrupt in reputation as in fortune. To buy off one lie is to give a premium for the invention of others. From the moment I was proposed for my present office, the volumes of calumny and falsehood issued to the public, rendered impracticable every idea of going into the work of finding and proving. I determined, therefore, to go straight forward in what was right, and to rest my character with my countrymen not on depositions and affidavits, but on what they should themselves witness, the course of my life. I have had no reason to be dissatisfied with the confidence reposed in the public; on the contrary, great encouragement to persevere in it to the end.—To WILLIAM A. BURWELL. FORD ED., ix, 229. (W., 1808.)

4735. — — —. Many of the [federal] lies would have required only a simple denial, but I saw that even that would have led to the infallible inference, that whatever I had not denied was to be presumed true. I have, therefore, never done even this, but to such of my friends as happen to converse on these subjects, and I have never believed that my character could hang upon every two-penny lie of our common enemies.—To WILLIAM A. BURWELL. FORD ED., ix, 230. (W., 1808.)

4736. — — —. The federalists, instead of lying me down, have lied themselves down.—To WILLIAM A. BURWELL. FORD ED., ix, 230. (W., 1808.)

4737. LIES, Useless.—I consider it always useless to read lies.—To DE WITT CLINTON. iv, 520. (W., 1803.)

4738. LIFE, Art of.—The art of life is the art of avoiding pain; and he is the best pilot who steers clearest of the rocks and shoals with which it is beset.—To MRS. COSWAY. ii, 37. FORD ED., iv, 317. (P., 1786.)

4739. LIFE, Chronicles of.—Fifteen volumes of anecdotes and incidents, within the compass of my own time and cognizance, written by a man of genius, of taste, of point, an acquaintance, the measure and traverses of whose mind I know, could not fail to turn the scale in favor of life during their perusal.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 27. (M., 1816.)

4740. LIFE, City.—A city life offers * * * more means of dissipating time, but more frequent also and more painful objects of vice and wretchedness. New York, for example, like London seems to be a cloacina of all the depravities of human nature. Philadelphia doubtless has its share. Here [Virginia], on the contrary, crime is scarcely heard of, breaches of order rare, and our societies, if not refined, are rational, moral and affectionate at least.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 310. (M., 1823.)

4741. LIFE, Declining.—I endeavor to beguile the wearisomeness of declining life by the delights of classical reading and of mathematical truths, and by the consolations of a sound philosophy, equally indifferent to hope and fear.—To W. SHORT. vii, 140. FORD ED., x, 145. (M., 1819.)

4742. LIFE, Enjoyment of.—I sincerely pray that all the members of the human family may, in the time prescribed by the Father of us all, find themselves securely established in the enjoyment of life, liberty and happiness.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. viii, 119. (1807.)

4743. LIFE, Government and.—The care of human life and happiness, and not their destruction, is the first and only legitimate object of good government.—R. to A. MARYLAND CITIZENS. viii, 165. (1809.)

4744. LIFE, Happiness and.—The Giver of life * * * gave it for happiness and not for wretchedness.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 319. FORD ED., iii, 59. (M., 1782.)

4745. LIFE, Individual.—In a government bottomed on the will of all, the life * * * of every individual citizen becomes interesting to all.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 50. FORD ED., viii, 392. (1805.)

4746. LIFE, Jefferson's habits of.—I am retired to Monticello, where, in the bosom of my family, and surrounded by my books, I enjoy a repose to which I have been long a stranger. My mornings are devoted to correspondence. From breakfast to dinner, I am in my shops, my garden, or on horseback among my farms; from dinner to dark, I give to society and recreation with my neighbors and friends; and from candle light to early bedtime, I read. My health is perfect; and my strength considerably reinforced by the activity of the course I pursue; perhaps it is as great as usually falls to the lot of near sixty-seven years of age. I talk of ploughs and harrows, of seeding and harvesting, with my neighbors, and of politics, too, if they choose, with as little reserve as the rest of my fellow citizens, and feel, at length, the blessing of being free to say and do what I please, without being responsible for it to any mortal. A part of my occupation, and by no means the least pleasing, is the direction of the studies of such young men as ask it. They place themselves in the neighboring village, and have the use of my library and counsel, and make a part of my society.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 508. (M., 1810.)

4747. — — — My present course of life admits less reading than I wish. From breakfast, or noon at latest, to dinner, I am mostly on horseback, attending to my farm or other concerns, which I find healthful to my body, mind and affairs; and the few hours I can pass in my cabinet, are devoured by correspondences; not those with my intimate friends, with whom I delight to interchange sentiments, but with others, who, writing to me on concerns of their own in which I have had an agency, or from motives of mere respect and approbation, are entitled to be answered with respect and a return of good will. My hope is that this obstacle to the delights of retirement, will wear away with the oblivion which follows that, and that I may at length be indulged in those studious pursuits, from which nothing but revolutionary duties would ever have called me.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 558. FORD ED., ix, 294. (M., 1811.)

4748. — — — I am on horseback three or four hours of every day; visit three or four times a year a possession I have ninety miles distant, performing the winter journey on horseback. I walk little, however, a single mile being too much for me, and I live in the midst of my grandchildren, one of whom has lately promoted me to be a great grandfather.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 37. FORD ED., ix, 334. (M., 1812.)

and having been remarkably exempted from colds (not having had one in every seven years of my life on an average), I have supposed it might be ascribed to that practice.—To MA. MAURY. vi, 472. (M., 1815.)

4750. — — — The request of the history of my physical habits would have puzzled me not a little, had it not been for the model with which you accompanied it, of Doctor Rush's answer to a similar inquiry. I live so much like other people, that I might refer to ordinary life as the history of my own. * * * I have lived temperately, eating little animal food, and that not as an aliment, so much as a condiment for the vegetables which constitute my principal diet. I double, however, the Doctor's glass and a half of wine, and even treble it with a friend; but halve its effects by drinking the weak wines only. The ardent wines I cannot drink, nor do I use ardent spirits in any form. Malt liquors and cider are my table drinks, and my breakfast is of tea and coffee. I have been blest with organs of digestion which accept and concoct, without ever murmuring, whatever the palate chooses to consign to them, and I have not yet lost a tooth by age. I was a hard student until I entered on the business of life, the duties of which leave no idle time to those disposed to fulfil them; and now, retired, and at the age of seventy-six, I am again a hard student. Indeed, my fondness for reading and study revolts me from the drudgery of letter writing. And a stiff wrist, the consequence of an early dislocation, makes writing both slow and painful. I am not so regular in my sleep as the Doctor says he was, devoting to it from five to eight hours, according as my company or the book I am reading interests me; and I never go to bed without an hour, or half hour's previous reading of something moral, whereon to ruminate in the intervals of sleep. But whether I retire to bed early or late, I rise with the sun. I use spectacles at night, but not necessarily in the day, unless in reading small print. My hearing is distinct in particular conversation, but confused when several voices cross each other, which unfits me for the society of the table. I have been more fortunate than my friend in the article of health. So free from catarrhs that I have not had one (in the breast, I mean) on an average of eight or ten years through life. I ascribe this exemption partly to the habit of bathing my feet in cold water every morning, for sixty years past. A fever of more than twenty-four hours I have not had above two or three times in my life. A periodical headache has afflicted me occasionally, once, perhaps, in six or eight years, for two or three weeks at a time, which now seems to have left me; and except on a late occasion of indisposition, I enjoy good health; too feeble, indeed, to walk much, but riding without fatigue six or eight miles a day, and sometimes thirty or forty. I may end these egotisms, therefore, as I began, by saying that my life has been so much like that of other people, that I might say with Horace, to every one "nomine mutato, de te fabula narratur."—To DOCTOR VINE UTLEY. vii, 116. FORD ED., x, 125. (M., 1819.)

4751. LIFE, Liberty and.—The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy, but cannot disjoin them.*—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 142. FORD ED., i, 447. (1774.)

* "Ab eo libertas, a quo spiritus," was the motto on one of Jefferson's seals.—EDITOR.

4752. LIFE, Order and.—The life of a citizen is never to be endangered, but as the last melancholy effort for the maintenance of order and obedience to the laws.*—CIRCULAR LETTER TO STATE GOVERNORS. v, 414. FORD ED., ix, 238. (W., 1809.)

4753. LIFE, Outdoor.—During the pleasant season, I am always out of doors, employed, not passing more time at my writing table than will dispatch my current business. But when the weather becomes cold, I shall go out but little.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 476. FORD ED., ix, 263. (M., 1809.)

4754. LIFE, Pledge of.—And for the support of this Declaration,† we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4755. — — — It is from the supporters of regular government only that the pledge of life, fortune and honor is worthy of confidence.—R. TO A. PHILADELPHIA CITIZENS. viii, 145. (1809.)

— LIFE, Private.—See PRIVATE LIFE.

4756. LIFE, Prolonged.—My health has been always so uniformly firm, that I have for some years dreaded nothing so much as the living too long. I think, however, that a flaw has appeared which ensures me against that, without cutting short any of the period during which I could expect to remain capable of being useful. It will probably give me as many years as I wish, and without pain or debility. Should this be the case, my most anxious prayers will have been fulfilled by Heaven. * * * My florid health is calculated to keep my friends as well as foes quiet, as they should be.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 426. FORD ED., viii, 128. (W., 1801.)

4757. — — — The most undesirable of all things is long life; and there is nothing I have ever so much dreaded.—To DR. BENJAMIN WATERHOUSE. FORD ED., x, 336. (M., 1825.)

4758. LIFE, Reliving.—You ask, if I would agree to live my seventy or rather seventy-three years over again? To which I say, yea. I think with you, that it is a good world on the whole; that it has been framed on a principle of benevolence, and more pleasure than pain dealt out to us. There are, indeed, (who might say nay) gloomy and hypochondriac minds, inhabitants of diseased bodies, disgusted with the present, and despairing of the future; always counting that the worst will happen, because it may happen. To these I say, how much pain have cost us the evils which have never happened! My temperament is sanguine. I steer my bark with Hope in the head, leaving Fear in the stern. My hopes, indeed, sometimes fail; but not oftener than the forebodings of the gloomy. There are, I acknowledge, even in the happiest life, some terrible convulsions, heavy set-offs against the opposite page of the account.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 575. (M., April 1816.)

4759. — — — Putting to myself your question, would I agree to live my seventy-three years over again forever? I hesitate to say. With Chew's limitations from twenty-five to sixty, I would say yes; and I might go further back, but not come lower down. For, at the latter period, with most of us, the powers of life are sensibly on the wane; sight becomes dim, hearing dull, memory constantly enlarging its frightful blank and parting with all we have ever seen or known, spirits evaporate, bodily debility creeps on palsying every limb, and so faculty after faculty quits us, and where, then, is life? If, in its full vigor, of good as well as evil, your friend Vassall could doubt its value, it must be purely a negative quantity when its evils alone remain. Yet I do not go into his opinion entirely. I do not agree that an age of pleasure is no compensation for a moment of pain. I think, with you, that life is a fair matter of account, and the balance often, nay generally, in its favor. It is not indeed easy, by calculation of intensity and time, to apply a common measure, or to fix the par between pleasure and pain; yet it exists, and is measurable.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 26. (M., Aug. 1816.)

4760. — — — You tell me my granddaughter repeated to you an expression of mine, that I should be willing to go again over the scenes of past life. I should not be unwilling, without, however wishing it; and why not? I have enjoyed a greater share of health than falls to the lot of most men; my spirits have never failed me except under those paroxysms of grief which you, as well as myself, have experienced in every form, and with good health and good spirits, the pleasures surely outweigh the pains of life. Why not, then, taste them again, fat and lean together? Were I indeed permitted to cut off from the train the last seven years, the balance would be much in favor of treading the ground over again. Being at that period in the neighborhood of our warm springs and well in health, I wished to be better, and tried them. They destroyed, in a great measure, my internal organism, and I have never since had a moment of perfect health.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 421. FORD ED., x, 347. (M., 1825.)

4761. LIFE, Right to.—We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inherent* and inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4762. LIFE, Security of.—In no portion of the earth were life, liberty and property ever so securely held; and it is with infinite satisfaction that withdrawing from the active scenes of life, I see the sacred design of these blessings committed to those who are sensible of their value and determined to defend them.—R. TO A. VIRGINIA ASSEMBLY. viii, 148. (1809.)

4763. LIFE, Social.—Life is of no value but as it brings us gratifications. Among the most valuable of these is rational society. It informs the mind, sweetens the temper, cheers our spirits, and promotes health.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 406. (A., 1784.)

molested in the present turbulent state of Europe. I have given such to an hundred others, and they have been much more frequently asked and obtained by Tories than Whigs. I did not write a scrip of a pen by him to any person. From long acquaintance he knew my wishes for peace, and my political sentiments generally, but he received no particular declaration of them nor one word of authority to speak in my name, or anybody's name on that or any other subject. It was an enterprise founded in the enthusiasm of his own character. He went on his own ground, and made his own way. His object was virtuous, and the effect meritorious.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 276. FORD ED., vii, 338. (Pa., 1799.)

4652. LIBELS, Jurisdiction over.—Nor does the [my] opinion of the unconstitutionality, and consequent nullity of that law, [Sedition] remove all restraint from the overwhelming torrent of slander, which is confounding all vice and virtue, all truth and falsehood, in the United States. The power to do that is fully possessed by the several State Legislatures. It was reserved to them, and was denied to the General Government, by the Constitution, according to our construction of it. While we deny that Congress have a right to control the freedom of the press, we have ever asserted the right of the States, and their exclusive right, to do so. They have accordingly, all of them, made provisions for punishing slander, which those who have time and inclination, resort to for the vindication of their characters.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 561. FORD ED., viii, 311. (M., 1804.)

4654. — — — In those States where they do not admit even the truth of allegations to protect the printer, they have gone too far.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 561. FORD ED., viii, 311. (M., 1804.)

4655. — — — No inference is here intended, that the laws, provided by the States against false and defamatory publications, should not be enforced; he who has time, renders a service to public morals and public tranquillity, in reforming these abuses by the salutary coercions of the law.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 44. FORD ED., viii, 346. (1805.)

4656. — — — We have received from your [Massachusetts] presses a very malevolent and incendiary denunciation of the administration, bottomed on absolute falsehood from beginning to end. The author would merit exemplary punishment for so flagitious a libel, were not the torment of his own abominable temper punishment sufficient for even as base a crime as this.—To LEVI LINCOLN. v, 264. (W., March 1808.)

4659. LIBELS, Punishment for.—I might have filled the courts of the United States with actions for slanders, and have ruined, perhaps many persons who are not innocent. But this would be no equivalent for the loss of character. I leave them, therefore, to the reproof of their own consciences. If these do not condemn them, there will yet come a day when the false witness will meet a Judge who has not slept over his slanders.—To URIAH M'GREGORY. iv, 333. (M., 1800.)

4660. LIBELS, Sedition law and.—Mr. Randolph has proposed an inquiry [in Congress] into certain prosecutions at common law in Connecticut, for libels on the government, and not only himself but others have stated them with such affected caution, and such hints at the same time, as to leave on every mind the impression that they had been instituted either by my direction, or with my acquiescence, at least. This has not been denied by my friends, because probably the fact is unknown to them. I shall state it for their satisfaction, and leave it to be disposed of as they think best. I had observed in a newspaper some dark hints of a prosecution in Connecticut, but so obscurely hinted that I paid little attention to it. Some considerable time after, it was again mentioned, so that I understood that some prosecution was going on in the federal court there, for calumnies uttered from the pulpit against me by a clergyman. I immediately wrote to Mr. Granger, who, I think, was in Connecticut at the time, stating that I had laid it down as a law to myself, to take no notice of the thousand calumnies issued against me, but to trust my character to my own conduct, and the good sense and candor of my fellow citizens; that I had found no reason to be dissatisfied with that course, and I was unwilling it should be broke through by others as to any matter concerning me; and I, therefore, requested him to direct the district attorney to dismiss the prosecution. Some time after this, I heard of subpoenas being served on General Lee, David M. Randolph, and others, as witnesses to attend the trial. I then for the first time conjectured the subject of the libel. I immediately wrote to Mr. Granger, to require an immediate dismissal of the prosecution. The answer of Mr. Huntington, the district attorney, was that these subpoenas had been issued by the defendant without his knowledge, that it had been his intention to dismiss all the prosecutions at the first meeting of the court, and to accompany it with an avowal of his opinion, that they could not be maintained, because the federal court had no jurisdiction over libels. This was accordingly done. I did not till then know that there were other prosecutions of the same nature, nor do I now know what were their subjects. But all went off together; and I afterwards saw in the hands of Mr. Granger, a letter written by the clergyman, disavowing any personal ill will towards me, and solemnly declaring he had never uttered the words charged. I think Mr. Granger either showed me, or said there were affidavits of at least half a dozen respectable men, who were present at the sermon and swore no such expressions were uttered, and as many equally respectable men who swore the contrary. But the clergyman expressed his gratification at the dismissal of the prosecution. * * * Certain it is, that the prosecutions had been instituted, and had made considerable progress, without my knowledge, that they were disapproved by me as soon as known, and directed to be discontinued. The attorney did it on the same ground on which I had acted myself in the cases of Duane, Callendar and others; to wit, that the Sedition law was unconstitutional and null, and that my obligation to execute what was law, involved that of not suffering rights secured by valid laws to be prostrated by what was no law.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v, 452. FORD ED., ix, 253. (M., 1809.)

4663. — — — When we reflect that the eyes of the virtuous all over the earth are turned with anxiety on us, as the only depositories of the sacred fire of liberty, and that our falling into anarchy would decide forever the destinies of mankind, and seal the political heresy that man is incapable of self-government, the only contest between divided friends should be who will dare farthest into the ranks of the common enemy.—To JOHN HOLLINS. v, 597. (M., 1811.) See 296.

4664. LIBERTY, Attachment to.—Our attachment to no nation on earth should supplant our attachment to liberty.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 470. (1775.)

4665. LIBERTY, Blood and.—The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants. It is its natural manure.—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 319. FORD ED., iv, 467. (P., 1787.)

4666. — — — A warm zeal for the attainment and enjoyment by all mankind of as much liberty, as each may exercise without injury to the equal liberty of his fellow citizens. I have lamented that in France the

endeavors to obtain this should have been attended with the effusion of so much blood.—To M. DE MEUNIER. FORD ED., vii, 13. (M., April 1795.)

4667. LIBERTY, Concern for.—Affectionate concern for the liberty of my fellow citizens will cease but with life to animate my breast.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. v, 262. (1808.)

4668. LIBERTY, Contagious.—The disease of liberty is catching.—To MARQUIS LA FAYETTE. vii, 194. FORD ED., x, 179. (M., 1820.)

4670. LIBERTY, Degrees of.—I would rather be exposed to the inconveniences attending too much liberty than to those attending too small a degree of it.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 314. FORD ED., v, 409. (Pa., 1791.)

4672. LIBERTY, European.—Heaven send that the glorious example of France may be but the beginning of the history of European liberty, and that you may live many years in health and happiness to see at length that heaven did not make man in its wrath.—To LA DUCHESSE D'AUVILLE. iii, 135. FORD ED., v, 154. (N.Y., April 1790.)

4673. — — — God send that all the nations who join in attacking the liberties of France may end in the attainment of their own.—To JOEL BARLOW. iii, 451. FORD ED., vi, 88. (Pa., 1792.)

4674. LIBERTY, First of all.—Postpone to the great object of Liberty every smaller motive and passion.—To THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 298. (Wg., 1780.)

4675. LIBERTY, France and.—The atrocious proceedings of France towards this country, had well nigh destroyed its liberties. The Anglomans and monocrats had so artfully confounded the cause of France with that of freedom, that both went down in the same scale.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 301. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

4676. — — — May you see France re-established in that temperate portion of liberty which does not infer either anarchy or licentiousness, in that high degree of prosperity which would be the consequence, of such a government, in that, in short, which the constitution of 1789 would have insured it, if wisdom could have stayed at that point the fervid but imprudent zeal of men, who did not know the character of their own countrymen.—To MADAME DE STAEL. vi, 120. (May 1813.)

4677. LIBERTY, Free Press and.—The functionaries of every government have propensities to command at will the liberty and property of their constituents. There is no safe deposit for these but with the people themselves; nor can they be safe with them without information. Where the press is free, and every man able to read, all is safe.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 517. FORD ED., x, 4. (M., 1816.)

4678. LIBERTY, French Revolution and.—The success of the French Revolution will ensure the progress of liberty in Europe, and its preservation here.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. FORD ED., v, 358. (Pa., 1791.)

4679. — — — The liberty of the whole earth was depending on the issue of the contest, and was ever such a prize won with so little innocent blood?—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 502. FORD ED., vi, 154. (Pa., 1793.)

4680. — — — I continue eternally attached to the principles of your [French] Revolution. I hope it will end in the establishment of some firm government, friendly to liberty, and capable of maintaining it. If it does, the world will become inevitably free.—To J. P. BRISSOT DE WARVILLE. FORD ED., vi, 249. (Pa., 1793.)

4681. LIBERTY, Gift of God.—All men * * * are endowed by their Creator with inherent* and inalienable rights. Among these * * * [is] liberty.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4683. LIBERTY, Government and.—The natural progress of things is for liberty to yield and government to gain ground.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v, 20. (P., 1788.)

4684. — — — The policy of the American government is to leave their citizens free, neither restraining nor aiding them in their pursuits.—To M. L'HOMMANDE. ii, 236. (P., 1787.)

4686. LIBERTY, Happiness and.—It is our glory that we first put the ball of liberty into motion, and our happiness that, being foremost, we had no bad examples to follow.—To TENCH COXE. FORD ED., vii, 22. (M., 1795.)

4687. LIBERTY, Kosciusko and.—General Kosciusko is as pure a son of liberty as I have ever known, and of that liberty which is to go to all, and not to the few or the rich alone.—To HORATIO GATES. iv, 212. FORD ED., vii, 204. (Pa., 1798.)

4689. LIBERTY, Light and.—Light and liberty go together.—To TENCH COXE. FORD ED., vii, 22. (M., 1795.)

4692. LIBERTY, Napoleon and.—If the hero [Napoleon] who has saved you from a combination of enemies, shall also be the means of giving you as great a portion of liberty as the opinions, habits and character of the nation are prepared for, progressive preparation may fit you for progressive portions of that first of blessings, and you may in time attain what we erred in supposing could be hastily seized and maintained, in the present state of political information among your citizens at large.—To M. 4697. LIBERTY, Preservation of.—We do then most solemnly, before God and the world declare that, regardless of every consequence, at the risk of every distress, the arms we have been compelled to assume we will use with the perseverance, exerting to their utmost energies all those powers which our Creator hath given us, to preserve that liberty which He committed to us in sacred deposit and to protect from every hostile hand our lives and our properties.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 474. 4699. — — —. The people are the only sure reliance for the preservation of our liberty.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 332. (1787.)

4701. LIBERTY, Preparation for.—A full measure of liberty is not now perhaps to be expected by your nation, nor am I confident they are prepared to preserve it. More than a generation will be requisite, under the administration of reasonable laws favoring the progress of knowledge in the general mass of the people, and their habituation to an independent security of person and property, before they will be capable of estimating the value of freedom, and the necessity of a sacred adherence to the principles on which it rests for preservation. Instead of that liberty which takes root and growth in the progress of reason, if recovered by mere force or accident, it becomes, with an unprepared people, a tyranny still, of the many, the few, or the one.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vi, 421. FORD ED., ix, 505. (M., Feb. 1815.)

4702. LIBERTY, The Press and.—Our liberty cannot be guarded but by the freedom of the press, nor that be limited without danger of losing it.—To JOHN JAY. FORD ED., iv, 186. (P., 1786.) See PRESS and NEWSPAPERS.

4703. LIBERTY, Progress of.—I cordially wish well to the progress of liberty in all nations, and would forever give it the weight of our countenance.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 301. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

4704. LIBERTY, Resistance and.—What country can preserve its liberties if its rulers are not warned from time to time that the people preserve the spirit of resistance?—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 318. FORD ED., iv, 467. (P., 1787.) See REBELLION.

4705. LIBERTY, Restricted.—I had hoped that Geneva was familiarized to such a degree of liberty, that they might without difficulty or danger fill up the measure to its maximum; a term, which, though in the insulated man, bounded only by his natural powers, must, in society, be so far restricted as to protect himself against the evil passions of his associates, and consequently, them against him.—To M. D'IVERNOIS. iv, 114. FORD ED., vii, 4. (M., Feb. 1795.)

4707. — — —. It is impossible for you to conceive what is passing in our conclave, and it is evident that one or two at least, under pretence of avoiding war on the one side, have no great antipathy to run foul of it on the other, and to make a part in the confederacy of princes against human liberty.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 563. FORD ED., vi, 261. (Pa., May 1793.)

4708. — — —. I am not for * * * joining in the confederacy of kings to war against the principles of liberty.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

4709. LIBERTY, Sacred.—For promoting the public happiness, those persons whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth, birth, or other accidental condition or circumstance.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. FORD ED., x, 192. (M., 1821.)

4803. LOUISIANA, Area of United States doubled.—The territory acquired, as it includes all the waters of the Missouri and Mississippi, has more than doubled the area of the United States, and the new part is not inferior to the old in soil, climate, productions and important communications.—To GENERAL HORATIO GATES. iv, 494. FORD ED., viii, 249. (W., 1803.)

4804. LOUISIANA, Bonaparte and.—I very early saw that Louisiana was indeed a speck in our horizon which was to burst in a tornado; and the public are unapprized how near this catastrophe was. Nothing but a frank and friendly development of causes and effects on our part, and good sense enough in Bonaparte to see that the train was unavoidable, and would change the face of the world, saved us from that storm. I did not expect he would yield till a war took place between France and England, and my hope was to palliate and endure, if Messrs. Ross, Morris, &c. did not force a premature rupture, until that event. I believed the event not very distant, but acknowledge it came on sooner than I had expected. Whether, however, the good sense of Bonaparte might not see the course predicted to be necessary and unavoidable, even before a war should be imminent, was a chance which we thought it our duty to try; but the immediate prospect of rupture brought the case to immediate decision. The dénouement has been happy; and I confess I look to this duplication of area for the extending a government so free and economical as ours, as a great achievement to the mass of happiness which is to ensue.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 525. FORD ED., viii, 294. (W., Jan. 1804.)

4805. LOUISIANA, The Constitution and.—There is no constitutional difficulty as to the acquisition of territory, and whether, when acquired, it may be taken into the Union by the Constitution as it now stands, will become a question of expediency. I think it will be safer not to permit the enlargement of the Union but by amendment of the Constitution.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 241. (Jan. 1803.)

4806. — —. There is a difficulty in this acquisition which presents a handle to the malcontents among us, though they have not yet discovered it. Our confederation is certainly confined to the limits established by the Revolution. The General Government has no powers but such as the Constitution has given it; and it has not given it a power of holding foreign territory, and still less of incorporating it into the Union. An amendment of the Constitution seems necessary for this. In the meantime, we must ratify and pay our money, as we have treated, for a thing beyond the Constitution, and rely on the nation to sanction an act done for its great good, without its previous authority.—To JOHN DICKINSON. FORD ED., viii, 262. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4807. — —. The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence [Louisiana purchase] which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution. The Legislature in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties, and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized, what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it. It is the case of a guardian, investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory; and saying to him when of age, I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you: you may disavow me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can: I thought it my duty to risk myself for you. But we shall not be disavowed by the nation, and their act of indemnity will confirm and not weaken the Constitution, by more strongly marking out its lines.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 500. FORD ED., viii, 244. (M., Aug. 12, 1803.)

4808. LOUISIANA, Constitutional amendments.—

The province of Louisiana is incorporated with the United States, and made part thereof. The rights of occupancy in the soil, and of self-government are confirmed to the Indian inhabitants, as they now exist. Preemption only of the portions rightfully occupied by them, and a succession to the occupancy of such as they may abandon, with the full rights of possession as well as of property and sovereignty in whatever is not or shall cease to be so rightfully occupied by them shall belong to the United States. The Legislature of the Union shall have authority to exchange the right of occupancy in portions where the United States have full right for lands possessed by Indians within the United States on the east side

Louisiana, as ceded by France to the United States is made a part of the United States. Its white inhabitants shall be citizens, and stand, as to their rights and obligations on the same footing with other citizens of the United States in analogous situations. Save only that as to the portion thereof lying north of an east and west line drawn through the mouth of the Arkansas river, no new State shall be established, nor any grants of land made, other than to Indians in exchange for equivalent portions of land occupied by them, until authorized by further subsequent amendment to the Constitution shall be made for these purposes.

Florida, also, whenever it may be right-of the Mississippi: to exchange lands on the east side of the river for those of the white inhabitants on the west side thereof and above the latitude of 31 degrees: to maintain in any part of the province such military posts as may be requisite for peace or safety: to exercise police over all persons therein, not being Indian inhabitants: to work salt springs, or mines of coal, metals and other minerals within the possession of the United States or in any others with the consent of the possessors; to regulate trade and intercourse between the Indian inhabitants and all other persons; to explore and ascertain the geography of the province, its productions and other interesting circumstances; to open roads and navigation therein where necessary for beneficial communication; and to establish agencies and factories therein for the cultivation of commerce, peace and good understanding with the Indians residing there. The Legislature shall have no authority to dispose of the lands of the province otherwise than as hereinbefore permitted, until a new amendment of the Constitution shall give that authority. Except as to that portion thereof which lies south of the latitude of 31 degrees; which whenever they deem expedient, they may erect into a territorial government, either separate or as making part with one on the eastern side of the river, vesting the inhabitants thereof with all the rights possessed by other territorial citizens of the United States.

fully obtained, shall become a part of the United States. Its white inhabitants shall thereupon be citizens, and shall stand, as to their rights and obligations, on the same footing with other citizens of the United States, in analogous situations.—

4811. ——. On further consideration as to the amendment to our Constitution respecting Louisiana, I have thought it better, instead of enumerating the powers which Congress may exercise, to give them the same powers they have as to other portions of the Union generally, and to enumerate the special exceptions. * * * The less that is said about any constitutional difficulty, the better; and * * * it will be desirable for Congress to do what is necessary, in silence.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 504. FORD ED., viii, 246. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4812. ——. Whatever Congress shall think it necessary to do, should be done with as little debate as possible, and particularly so far as respects the constitutional difficulty. I am aware of the force of the observations you make on the power given by the Constitution to Congress, to admit new States into the Union, without restraining the subject to the territory then constituting the United States. But when I consider, that the limits of the United States are precisely fixed by the treaty of 1783, that the Constitution expressly declares itself to be made for the United States, I cannot help believing that the intention was to permit Congress to admit into the Union new States, which should be formed out of the territory for which, and under whose authority alone, they were then acting. I do not believe it was meant that they might receive England, Ireland, Holland, &c., into it, which would be the case on your construction. When an instrument admits two constructions, the one safe, the other dangerous; the one precise, the other indefinite, I prefer that which is safe and precise. I had rather ask an enlargement of power from the nation, where it is found necessary, than to assume it by a construction which would make our powers boundless. Our peculiar security is in the possession of a written Constitution. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction. I say the same as to the opinion of those who consider the grant of the treaty making power as boundless. If it is, then we have no Constitution. If it has bounds, they can be no others than the definitions of the powers which that instrument gives. It specifies and delineates the operations permitted to the Federal Govern-

LOUISIANA, The Constitution and.—There is no constitutional difficulty as to the acquisition of territory, and whether, when acquired, it may be taken into the Union by the Constitution as it now stands, will become a question of expediency. I think it will be safer not to permit the enlargement of the Union but by amendment of the Constitution.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 241. (Jan. 1803.)

4806. — —. There is a difficulty in this acquisition which presents a handle to the malcontents among us, though they have not yet discovered it. Our confederation is certainly confined to the limits established by the Revolution. The General Government has no powers but such as the Constitution has given it; and it has not given it a power of holding foreign territory, and still less of incorporating it into the Union. An amendment of the Constitution seems necessary for

4807. — —. The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence [Louisiana purchase] which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution. The Legislature in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties, and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized, what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it. It is the case of a guardian, investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory; and saying to him when of age, I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you: you may disavow me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can: I thought it my duty to risk myself for you. But we shall not be disavowed by the nation, and their act of indemnity will confirm and not weaken the Constitution, by more strongly marking out its lines.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 500. FORD ED., viii, 244. (M., Aug. 12, 1803.)

4808. LOUISIANA, Constitutional amendments.—

The province of Louisiana is incorporated with the United States, and made part thereof. The rights of occupancy in the soil, and of self-government are confirmed to the Indian inhabitants, as they now exist. Preemption only of the portions rightfully occupied by them, and a succession to the occupancy of such as they may abandon, with the full rights of possession as well as of property and sovereignty in whatever is not or shall cease to be so rightfully occupied by them shall belong to the United States. The Legislature of the Union shall have authority to exchange the right of occupancy in portions where the United States have full right for lands possessed by Indians within the United States on the east side

Louisiana, as ceded by France to the United States is made a part of the United States. Its white inhabitants shall be citizens, and stand, as to their rights and obligations on the same footing with other citizens of the United States in analogous situations. Save only that as to the portion thereof lying north of an east and west line drawn through the mouth of the Arkansas river, no new State shall be established, nor any grants of land made, other than to Indians in exchange for equivalent portions of land occupied by them, until authorized by further subsequent amendment to the Constitution shall be made for these purposes.

Florida, also, whenever it may be right-of the Mississippi: to exchange lands on the east side of the river for those of the white inhabitants on the west side thereof and above the latitude of 31 degrees: to maintain in any part of the province such military posts as may be requisite for peace or safety: to exercise police over all persons therein, not being Indian inhabitants: to work salt springs, or mines of coal, metals and other minerals within the possession of the United States or in any others with the consent of the possessors; to regulate trade and intercourse between the Indian inhabitants and all other persons; to explore and ascertain the geography of the province, its productions and other interesting circumstances; to open roads and navigation therein where necessary for beneficial communication; and to establish agencies and factories therein for the cultivation of commerce, peace and good understanding with the Indians residing there. The Legislature shall have no authority to dispose of the lands of the province otherwise than as heretofore permitted, until a new amendment of the Constitution shall give that authority. Except as to that portion thereof which lies south of the latitude of 31 degrees; which whenever they deem expedient, they may erect into a territorial government, either separate or as making part with one on the eastern side of the river, vesting the inhabitants thereof with all the rights possessed by other territorial citizens of the United States.

fully obtained, shall become a part of the United States. Its white inhabitants shall thereupon be citizens, and shall stand, as to their rights and obligations, on the same footing with other citizens of the United States, in analogous situations.—

4811. — —. On further consideration as to the amendment to our Constitution respecting Louisiana, I have thought it better, instead of enumerating the powers which Congress may exercise, to give them the same powers they have as to other portions of the Union generally, and to enumerate the special exceptions. * * * The less that is said about any constitutional difficulty, the better; and * * * it will be desirable for Congress to do what is necessary, in silence.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 504. FORD ED., viii, 246. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4812. — —. Whatever Congress shall think it necessary to do, should be done with as little debate as possible, and particularly so far as respects the constitutional difficulty. I am aware of the force of the observations you make on the power given by the Constitution to Congress, to admit new States into the Union, without restraining the subject to the territory then constituting the United States. But when I consider, that the limits of the United States are precisely fixed by the treaty of 1783, that the Constitution expressly declares itself to be made for the United States, I cannot help believing that the intention was to permit Congress to admit into the Union new States, which should be formed out of the territory for which, and under whose authority alone, they were then acting. I do not believe it was meant that they might receive England, Ireland, Holland, &c., into it, which would be the case on your construction. When an instrument admits two constructions, the one safe, the other dangerous; the one precise, the other indefinite. I prefer that which is safe and precise. I had rather ask an enlargement of power from the nation, where it is found necessary, than to assume it by a construction which would make our powers boundless. Our peculiar security is in the possession of a written Constitution. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction. I say the same as to the opinion of those who consider the grant of the treaty making power as boundless. If it is, then we have no Constitution. If it has bounds, they can be no others than the definitions of the powers which that instrument gives. It specifies and delineates the operations permitted to the Federal Government, and gives all the powers necessary to carry these into execution. Whatever of these enumerated objects is proper for a law, Congress may make the law; whatever is proper to be executed by way of a treaty, the President and Senate may enter into the treaty; whatever is to be done by a judicial sentence, the judges may pass the sentence. Nothing is more likely than that their enumeration of powers is defective. This is the ordinary case of all human works. Let us go on, then, perfecting it, by adding, by way of amendment to the Constitution, those powers which time and trial show are still wanting. But it has been taken too much for granted, that by this rigorous construction the treaty power would be reduced to nothing. I had occasion once to examine its effect on the French treaty, made by the old Congress, and found that out of thirty odd articles which that contained, there were one, two or three only which could not now be stipulated under our present Constitution. I confess, then, I thought it important, in the present case, to set an example against broad construction, by appealing for new power to the people. If, however, our friends shall think differently, certainly I shall acquiesce with satisfaction; confiding, that the good sense of our country will correct the evil of construction whenever it shall produce ill effects.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 505. FORD ED., viii, 247. (M., Sep. 1803.)

4813. LOUISIANA, Defence of.—What would you think of raising a force for the defence of New Orleans in this manner? Give a bounty of 50 acres of land, to be delivered immediately, to every able-bodied man who will immediately settle on it, and hold himself in readiness to perform two years' military service (on the usual pay) if called on within the first seven years of his residence? The lands to be chosen by himself of any of those in the Orleans Territory, * * * each to have his choice in the order of his arrival on the spot, a proclamation to be issued to this effect to engage as many as will go on, and present themselves to the officer there; and, moreover, recruiting officers to be sent into different parts of the Union to raise and conduct settlers at the public expense? When settled there, to be well trained as militia by officers living among them? *—CIRCULAR LETTER TO CABINET OFFICERS. FORD ED., viii, 425. (Feb. 1806.)

4814. ——. Satisfied that New Orleans must fall a prey to any power which shall attack it, in spite of any means we now possess, I see no security for it but in planting on the spot the force which is to defend it. I therefore suggest to some members of the Senate to add to the volunteer bill now before them, as an amendment, some such section as that enclosed, which is on the principles of what we agreed on last year, except the omission of the two years' service. If, by giving one hundred miles square of that country, we can secure the rest, and at the same time create an American majority before Orleans becomes a State, it will be the best bargain ever made.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 36. (W., Jan. 1807.)

4815. ——. I propose to the members of Congress in conversation, the enlisting thirty thousand volunteers, Americans by birth, to be carried at the public expense, and settled immediately on a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land each, on the west side of the Mississippi, on the condition of giving two years of military service, if that country should be attacked within seven years. The defence of the country would thus be placed on the spot, and the additional number would entitle the Territory to become a State, would make the majority American, and make it an American instead of a French State. This would not sweeten the pill to the French; but in making the acquisition we had some view to our own good as well as theirs, and I believe the greatest good of both will be promoted by whatever will amalgamate us together.—To JOHN DICKINSON. v, 30. FORD ED., ix, 9. (W., 1807.)

4816. LOUISIANA, Expansion and.—I know that the acquisition of Louisiana has been disapproved by some, from a candid apprehension that the enlargement of our territory would endanger its Union. But who can limit the extent to which the federative principle may operate effectively? The larger our association, the less will it be shaken by local passions; and, in any view, is it not better that the opposite bank of the Mississippi should be settled by our own brethren and children, than by strangers of another family? With which shall we be most likely to live in harmony and friendly intercourse?—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 41. FORD ED., viii, 344. (1805.) See TERRITORY.

4817. LOUISIANA, Federalist opposition.—The opposition caught it as a plank in a shipwreck, hoping it would tack the western people to them. They raised the cry of war, were intriguing in all quarters to exasperate the western inhabitants to arm and go down on their own authority and possess themselves of New Orleans, and in the meantime were daily reiterating, in new shapes, inflammatory resolutions for the adoption of the House [of Representatives].—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 460. FORD ED., viii, 209. (W., Feb. 1803.)

4818. ——. These grumblers [the opposition], too, are very uneasy lest the administration should share some little credit for the acquisition, the whole of which they ascribe to the accident of war. They would be cruelly mortified could they see our files from May, 1801 [April 1801 in Ford edition], the first organization of the administration, but more especially from April, 1802. They would see, that though we could not say when war would arise, yet we said with energy what would take place when it should arise. We did not, by our intrigues, produce the war; but we availed ourselves of it when it happened. The other party saw the case now existing, on which our representations were predicted, and the wisdom of timely sacrifice. But when these people make the war give us everything, they authorize us to ask what the war gave us in their day? They had a war. What did they make it bring us? Instead of making our neutrality the ground of gain to their country, they were for plunging into the war. And if they were now in place, they would now be at war against the atheists and disorganizers of France. They were for making their country an appendage to England. We are friendly, cordially and conscientiously friendly to England. We are not hostile to France. We will be rigorously just and sincerely friendly to both. I do not believe we shall have as much to swallow from them as our predecessors had.—To GENERAL HORATIO GATES. iv, 495. FORD ED., viii, 250. (W., July 1803.)

4819. — —. These federalists [who are raising objections against the vast extent of our boundaries] see in this acquisition [Louisiana] the formation of a new confederacy, embracing all the waters of the Mississippi, on both sides of it, and a separation of its eastern waters from us. These combinations depend on so many circumstances which we cannot foresee, that I place little reliance on them. We have seldom seen neighborhood produce affection among nations. The reverse is almost the universal truth. Besides, if it should become the great interest of those nations to separate from this, if their happiness should depend on it so strongly as to induce them to go through that convulsion, why should the Atlantic States dread it? But especially why should we, their present inhabitants, take side in such a question? When I view the Atlantic States, procuring for those on the Eastern waters of the Mississippi friendly instead of hostile neighbors on its western waters, I do not view it as an Englishman would the procuring future blessings for the French nation, with whom he has no relations of blood or affection. The future inhabitants of the Atlantic and Mississippi States will be our sons. We leave them in distinct but bordering establishments. We think we see their happiness in their union, and we wish it. Events may prove it otherwise; and if they see their interest in separation, why should we take side with our Atlantic rather than our Mississippi descendants. It is the elder and the younger son differing. God bless them both, and keep them in union, if it be for their good, but separate them, if it be better.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 499. FORD ED., viii, 243. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4820. — —. Objections are raising to the eastward against the vast extent of our boundaries, and propositions are made to exchange Louisiana, or a part of it, for the Floridas. But * * * we shall get the Floridas without, and I would not give one inch of the waters of the Mississippi to any nation, because I see in a light very important to our peace the exclusive right to its navigation, and the admission of no nation into it, but as into the Potomac or Delaware, with our consent and under our police.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 499. FORD ED., viii, 243. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4821. — —. Some inflexible federalists have still ventured to brave the public opinion. It will fix their character with the world and with posterity, who, not descending to the other points of difference between us, will judge them by this fact, so palpable as to speak for itself in all times and places.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 508. (W., 1803.)

4822. — —. The federalists spoke and voted against it, but they are now so reduced in their numbers as to be nothing.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 510. FORD ED., viii, 278. (W., Nov. 1803.)

4823. — —. The federal leaders have had the imprudence to oppose it pertinaciously, which has given an occasion to a great proportion of their quondam honest adherents to abandon them, and join the republican standard. They feel themselves now irretrievably lost.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 287. (W., Jan. 1804.)

4824. LOUISIANA, French possession of.—The exchange, which is to give us new neighbors in Louisiana (probably the present French armies when disbanded), has opened us to a combination of enemies on that side where we are most vulnerable.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 177. FORD ED., vii, 129. (Pa., May 1797.)

4825. — —. There is considerable reason to apprehend that Spain cedes Louisiana and the Floridas to France. It is a policy very unwise in both, and very ominous to us.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 58. (W., May 1801.)

4826. — —. The cession of Louisiana and the Floridas by Spain to France, works most sorely on the United States. On this subject the Secretary of State has written to you fully, yet I cannot forbear recurring to it personally, so deep is the impression it makes on my mind. It completely reverses all the political relations of the United States, and will form a new epoch in our political course. Of all nations of any consideration, France is the one, which hitherto, has offered the fewest points on which we could have any conflict of right, and the most points of a communion of interests. From these causes, we have ever looked to her as our natural friend, as one with which we never could have an occasion of difference. Her growth, therefore, we viewed as our own, her misfortunes ours. There is on the globe one single spot, the possessor of which is our natural and habitual enemy. It is New Orleans, through which the produce of three-eighths of our territory must pass to market and from its fertility it will ere long yield more than half of our whole produce, and contain more than half of our inhabitants.

France, placing herself in that door, assumes to us the attitude of defiance. Spain might have retained it quietly for years. Her pacific dispositions, her feeble state, would induce her to increase our facilities there, so that her possession of the place would be hardly felt by us, and it would not, perhaps, be very long before some circumstance might arise, which might make the cession of it to us the price of something of more worth to her. Not so can it ever be in the hands of France. The impetuosity of her temper, the energy and restlessness of her character, placed in a point of eternal friction with us, and our character, which, though quiet and loving peace and the pursuit of wealth, is high-minded, despising wealth in competition with insult or injury, enterprising and energetic as any nation on earth; these circumstances render it impossible that France and the United States can continue long friends, when they meet in so irritable a position. They, as well as we, must be blind if they do not see this; and we must be very improvident if we do not begin to make arrangements on that hypothesis. The day that France takes possession of New Orleans, fixes the sentence which is to restrain her forever within her low-water mark. It seals the union of two nations, who, in conjunction, can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment, we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation. We must turn all our attention to a maritime force, for which our resources place us on very high ground; and having formed and cemented together a power which may render reinforcement of her settlements here impossible to France, make the first cannon, which shall be fired in Europe, the signal for tearing up any settlement she may have made, and for holding the two continents of America in sequestration for the common purposes of the united British and American nations. This is not a state of things we seek or desire. It is one which this measure, if adopted by France, forces on us, as necessarily as any other cause, by the laws of nature, brings on its necessary effect. It is not from a fear of France that we deprecate this measure proposed by her. For, however greater her force is than ours, compared in the abstract, it is nothing in comparison of ours, when to be exerted on our soil. But it is from a sincere love of peace, and a firm persuasion that bound to France by the interests and the strong sympathies still existing in the minds of our citizens, and holding relative positions which ensure their continuance, we are secure of a long course of peace. Whereas, the change of friends, which will be rendered necessary if France changes that position, embarks us necessarily as a belligerent power in the first war of Europe. In that case, France will have held possession of New Orleans during the interval of a peace, long or short, at the end of which it will be wrested from her. Will this short-lived possession have been an equivalent to her for the transfer of such a weight into the scale of her enemy? Will not the amalgamation of a young, thriving, nation continue to that enemy the health and force which are at present so evidently on the decline? And will a few years' possession of New Orleans add equally to the strength of France? She may say she needs Louisiana for the supply of her West Indies. She does not need it in time of peace, and in war she could not depend on them, because they would be so easily intercepted. I should suppose that all these considerations might, in some proper form, be brought into view of the government of France. Though stated by us, it ought not to give offence; because we do not bring them forward as a menace, but as consequences not controllable by us, but inevitable from the course of things. We mention them, not as things which we desire by any means, but as things we deprecate; and we beseech a friend to look forward and to prevent them for our common interests. If France considers Louisiana, however, as indispensable for her views, she might perhaps be willing to look about for arrangements which might reconcile it to our interests. If anything could do this, it would be the ceding to us the island of New Orleans and the Floridas. This would certainly, in a great degree, remove the causes of jarring and irritation between us, and perhaps for such a length of time, as might produce other means of making the measure permanently conciliatory to our interests and friendships. It would, at any rate, relieve us from the necessity of taking immediate measures for countervailing such an operation by arrangements in another quarter. But still we should consider New Orleans and the Floridas as no equivalent for the risk of a quarrel with France, produced by her vicinage.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 431. FORD ED., viii, 144. (April 1802.)

4827. ——. I believe * * * that this measure will cost France, and perhaps not very long hence, a war which will annihilate her on the ocean, and place that element under the despotism of two nations, which I am not reconciled to the more because my own would be one of them. Add to this the exclusive appropriation of both continents of America as a consequence. I wish the present order of things to continue, and with a view to this I value highly a state of friendship between France and us. You know, too well how sincere I have ever been in these dispositions to doubt them. You know, too, how much I value peace, and how unwillingly I should see any event take place which would render war a necessary resource; and that all our movements should change their character and object. I am thus open with you, because I trust that you will have it in your power to impress on that government considerations, in the scale against which the possession of Louisiana is nothing. In Europe, nothing but Europe is seen, or supposed to have any right in the affairs of nations; but this little event, of France's possessing herself of Louisiana, which is thrown in as nothing, as a mere make-weight in the general settlement of accounts,—this speck which now appears as an almost invisible point in the horizon, is the embryo of a tornado which will burst on the countries on both sides of the Atlantic, and involve in its effects their highest destinies. That it may yet be avoided is my sincere prayer; and if you can be the means of informing the wisdom of Bonaparte of all its consequences, you will have deserved well of both countries. Peace and abstinence from European interferences are our objects, and so will continue while the present order of things in America remains uninterrupted.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 435. (W., April 1802.)

4828. ——. Whatever power, other than ourselves, holds the country east of the Mississippi becomes our natural enemy. Will such a possession do France as much good, as such an enemy may do her harm? And how long would it be hers, were such an enemy, situated at its door, added to Great Britain? I confess, it appears to me as essential to France to keep at peace with us, as it is to us to keep at peace with her; and that, if this cannot be secured without some compromise as to the territory in question, it will be useful for both to make some sacrifices to effect the compromise.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 458. FORD ED., viii, 207. (W., Feb. 1803.)

4829. LOUISIANA, Government for.—With respect to the territory acquired, I do not think it will be a separate government, as you imagine. I presume the island of New Orleans, and the settled country on the opposite bank, will be annexed to the Mississippi territory. We shall certainly endeavor to introduce the American laws there, and that cannot be done but by amalgamating the people with such a body of Americans as may take the lead in legislation and government. Of course, they will be under the Governor of Mississippi. The rest of the territory will probably be locked up from American settlement, and under the self-government of the native occupants.—To GENERAL HORATIO GATES. FORD ED., viii, 250. (W., July 1803.)

4830. ——. I thought I perceived in you the other day a dread of the job of preparing a constitution for the new acquisition. With more boldness than wisdom I, therefore, determined to prepare a canvas, give it a few daubs of outline, and send it to you to fill up. * * * In communicating it to you I must do it in confidence that you will never let any person know that I have put pen to paper on the subject. * * * My time does not permit me to go into explanation of the enclosed by letter. I will only observe as to a single feature of the Legislature, that the idea of an Assembly of Notables came into my head while writing, as a thing more familiar and pleasing to the French, than a legislation of judges. True it removes their dependence from the judges to the Executive; but this is what they are used to and would prefer. Should Congress reject the nomination of judges for four years, and make them during good behavior, as is probable, then, should the judges take a kink in their heads in favor of leaving the present laws of Louisiana unaltered, that evil will continue for their lives, unamended by us, and become so inveterate that we may never be able to introduce the uniformity of law so desirable. The making the same persons so directly judges and legislators is more against principle, than to make the same persons executive, and the elector of the legislative members. The former, too, are placed above all responsibility; the latter is under a perpetual control if he goes wrong. The judges have to act on nine out of ten of the laws which are made; the governor not on one in ten. But strike it out, and insert the judges if you think it better, as it was a sudden conceit to which I am not attached.—To JOHN BRECKENRIDGE. FORD ED., viii, 279. (W., Nov. 1803.)

4831. ——. Without looking at the old Territorial Ordinance, I had imagined it best to found a government for the territory or territories of lower Louisiana on that basis. But on examining it, I find it will not do at all; that it would turn all their laws topsy-turvy. Still, I believe it best to appoint a governor and three judges, with legislative powers; only providing that the judges shall form the laws, and the governor have a negative only, subject further to the negative of a national legislature. The existing laws of the country being now in force, the new legislature will, of course, introduce the trial by jury in criminal cases, first; the habeas corpus, the freedom of the press, freedom of religion, &c., as soon as can be, and in general draw their laws, and organizations to the mould of ours by degrees, as they find practicable, without exciting too much discontent. In proportion as we find the people there riper for receiving these first principles of freedom, Congress may from session to session, confirm their enjoyment of them.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 275. (Nov. 1803.)

4833. ——. Our policy will be to form New Orleans, and the country on both sides of it on the Gulf of Mexico, into a State; and, as to all above that, to transplant our Indians into it, constituting them a Marchausée to prevent emigrants crossing the river, until we shall have filled up all the vacant country on this side. This will secure both Spain and us as to the mines of Mexico, for half a century, and we may safely trust the provisions for that time to the men who shall live in it.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 509. (W., 1803.)

1834. — —. The inhabited part of Louisiana, from Point Coupee to the sea, will of course be immediately a territorial government, and soon a State. But above that, the best use we can make of the country for some time, will be to give establishments in it to the Indians on the East side of the Mississippi, in exchange for their present country, and open land offices in the last, and thus make this acquisition the means of filling up the eastern side, instead of drawing off its population. When we shall be full on this side, we may lay off a range of States on the western bank from the head to the mouth, and so, range after range, advancing compactly as we multiply.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 500. FORD ED., viii, 244. (M., Aug. 1803.)

1835. — —. In order to lessen the causes of appeal to the Convention, I sincerely wish that Congress at the next session may give to the Orleans Territory a legislature to be chosen by the people, as this will be advancing them quite as fast as the rules of our government will admit; and the evils which may arise from the irregularities which such a legislature may run into, will not be so serious as leaving them the pretext of calling in a foreign umpire between them and us.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 314. (M., Aug. 1804.)

1836. — —. We are now at work on a * * * government for Louisiana. It will probably be a small improvement of our former territorial governments, or first grade of government. The act proposes to give them an assembly of Notables, selected by the Governor from the principal characters of the territory. This will, I think, be a better legislature than the former territorial one, and will not be a greater departure from sound principle.—To THOMAS MCKEAN. FORD ED., viii, 293. (Jan. 1804.)

1837. — —. The Legislative Council for the Territory of New Orleans, * * * to be appointed by me, * * * ought to be composed of men of integrity, of understanding, of clear property and influence among the people, well acquainted with the laws, customs, and habits of the country, and drawn from the different parts of the Territory, whose population is considerable.*—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. iv, 551. (W., July 1804.) See CLAIBORNE.

1838. — —. I am so much impressed with the expediency of putting a termination to the right of France to patronize the rights of Louisiana, which will cease with their complete adoption as citizens of the United States, that I hope to see that take place on the meeting of Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 557. FORD ED., viii, 315. (M., Aug. 1804.)

Orleans. Those of the French inhabitants have for their sources, 1, the prohibition of importing slaves. This may be partly removed by Congress permitting them to receive slaves from the other States, which, by dividing that evil, would lessen its danger; 2, the administration of justice in our forms, principles, and language, with all of which they are unacquainted, and are the more abhorrent, because of the enormous expense, greatly exaggerated by the corruption of bankrupt and greedy lawyers, who have gone there from the United States and engrossed the practice; 3, the call on them by the land commissioners to produce the titles of their lands. The object of this is really to record and secure their rights. But as many of them hold on rights so ancient that the title papers are lost, they expect the land is to be taken from them whenever they cannot produce a regular deduction of title in writing. In this they will be undeceived by the final result, which will evince to them a liberal disposition of the government towards them.—To JOHN DICKINSON. v, 29. FORD ED., ix, 8. (W., 1807.)

1840. LOUISIANA, Mission to France respecting.—The urgency of the case, as well as the public spirit, induced us to make a more solemn appeal to the justice and judgment of our neighbors, by sending a Minister Extraordinary to impress them with the necessity of some arrangement. Mr. Monroe has been selected. His good dispositions cannot be doubted. Multiplied conversations with him, and views of the subject taken in all the shapes in which it can present itself, have possessed him with our estimates of everything relating to it, with a minuteness which no written communication to Mr. Livingston could ever have attained. These will prepare them to meet and decide on every form of proposition which can occur, without awaiting new instructions from hence, which might draw to an indefinite length a discussion where circumstances imperiously oblige us to a prompt decision. For the conclusion of the Mississippi is a state of things in which we cannot exist. He goes, therefore, joined with Chancellor Livingston, to aid in the issue of a crisis the most important the United States have ever met since their Independence, and which is to decide their future character and career.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 456. FORD ED., viii, 204. (W., Feb. 1803.) See MONROE.

1841. — —. The future destinies of our country hang on the event of this negotiation, and I am sure they could not be placed in more able or more zealous hands. On our parts we shall be satisfied that what you do not effect, cannot be effected.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 461. FORD ED., viii, 210. (W., Feb. 1803.)

1842. — —. It may be said, if this object be so all-important to us, why do we not offer such a sum as to ensure its purchase? The answer is simple. We are an agricultural people, poor in money, and owing great debts. These will be falling due by instalments for fifteen years to come, and require from us the practice of a rigorous economy to accomplish their payment; and it is our principle to pay to a moment whatever we have engaged, and never to engage what we cannot, and mean not faithfully to pay. We have calculated our resources, and find the sum to be moderate which they would enable us to pay, and we know from late trials that little can be added to it by borrowing.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 458. FORD ED., viii, 206. (W., Feb. 1803.)

4843. ——. The country, too, which we wish to purchase, except the portion already granted, and which must be confirmed to the private holders, is a barren sand, six hundred miles from east to west, and from thirty to forty and fifty miles from north to south, formed by deposition of the sands by the Gulf Stream in its circular course round the Mexican Gulf, and which being spent after performing a semicircle, has made from its last depositions the sand bank of East Florida. In West Florida, indeed, there are on the borders of the rivers some rich bottoms, formed by the mud brought from the upper country. These bottoms are all possessed by individuals. But the spaces between river and river are mere banks of sand; and in East Florida there are neither rivers, nor consequently any bottoms. We cannot, then, make anything by a sale of the lands to individuals. So that it is peace alone which makes it an object with us, and which ought to make the cession of it desirable to France.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 458. FORD ED., viii, 206. (W., Feb. 1803.)

4844. ——. You see with what frankness I communicate with you on this subject; that I hide nothing from you, and that I am endeavoring to turn our private friendship to the good of our respective countries. And can private friendship ever answer a nobler end than by keeping two nations at peace, who, if this new position which one of them is taking were rendered innocent, have more points of common interest, and fewer of collision, than any two on earth; who become natural friends, instead of natural enemies, which this change of position would make them.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 459. FORD ED., viii, 207. (W., Feb. 1803.)

4845. ——. The measure was more-over proposed from another cause. We must know at once whether we can acquire New Orleans or not. We are satisfied nothing else will secure us against a war at no distant period; and we cannot press this reason without beginning those arrangements which will be necessary if war is hereafter to result. For this purpose it was necessary that the negotiators should be fully possessed of every idea we have on the subject, so as to meet the propositions of the opposite party, in whatever form they may be offered; and give them a shape admissible by us without being obliged to wait new instructions hence. With this view, we have joined Mr. Monroe with yourself at Paris, and to Mr. Pinckney at Madrid, although we believe it will be hardly necessary for him to go to this last place. Should we fail in this object of the mission, a further one will be superadded for the other side of the channel.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 461. FORD ED., viii, 209. (W., Feb. 1803.)

4846. LOUISIANA, Mississippi navigation secured.—The acquisition of New Orleans would of itself have been a great thing, as it would have ensured to our western brethren the means of exporting their produce; but that of Louisiana is inappreciable, because, giving us the sole dominion of the Mississippi, it excludes those bickerings with foreign powers, which we know of a certainty would have put us at war with France immediately; and it secures to us the course of a peaceful nation.—To JOHN DICKINSON. FORD ED., viii, 261. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4847. ——. The acquisition of Louisiana, although more immediately beneficial to the western States, by securing for their produce a certain market, not subject to interruptions by officers over whom we have no control, yet is also deeply interesting to the maritime portion of our country, inasmuch as by giving the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, it avoids the burthens and sufferings of a war, which conflicting interests on that river would inevitably have produced at no distant period. It opens, too, a fertile region for the future establishments in the progress of that multiplication so rapidly taking place in all parts.—R. to A. TENNESSEE LEGISLATURE. viii, 115. (1803.)

4848. LOUISIANA, Payment for.—We shall not avail ourselves of the three months' delay after possession of the province, allowed by the treaty for the delivery of the stock, but shall deliver it the moment that possession is known here, which will be on the eighteenth day after it has taken place.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 512. FORD ED., viii, 279. (W., Nov. 1803.)

4849. ——. When we contemplate the ordinary annual augmentation of imposts from increasing population and wealth, the augmentation of the same revenue by its extension to the new acquisition, and the economies which may still be introduced into our public expenditures, I cannot but hope that Congress in reviewing their resources will find means to meet the intermediate interests of this additional debt without recurring to new taxes, and applying to this object only the ordinary progression of our revenue.—THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 27. FORD ED., viii, 271. (Oct. 1803.)

congratulated Mr. King on the acquisition, and declared that the King had learned it with great pleasure; and when Baring, the British banker, asked leave of the minister to purchase the debt and furnish the money to France, the minister declared to him, that so far from throwing obstacles in the way, if there were any difficulty in the payment of the money, it was the interest of Great Britain to aid it.—To W. A. BURWELL. v, 20. FORD ED., viii, 469. (M., Sep. 1806.)

4851. LOUISIANA, Possession by Great Britain.—I am so deeply impressed with the magnitude of the dangers which will attend our government, if Louisiana and the Floridas be added to the British empire, that, in my opinion, we ought to make ourselves parties in the general war expected to take place, should this be the only means of preventing the calamity. But I think we should defer this step as long as possible; because war is so full of chances, which may relieve us from the necessity of interfering; and if necessary, still the later we interfere, the better we shall be prepared. It is often indeed more easy to prevent the capture of a place than to retake it. Should it be so in the case in question, the difference between the two operations of preventing and retaking, will not be so costly as two, three, or four years more of war. So that I am for preserving neutrality as long, and entering into the war as late, as possible.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 509. FORD ED., v, 238. (August 1790.)

4852. — — —. It is said that Arnold is at Detroit reviewing the militia there. Other symptoms indicate a general design on all Louisiana and the two Floridas. What a tremendous position would success in these two objects place us in! Embraced from the St. Croix to the St. Mary's on one side by their possessions, on the other by their fleet, we need not hesitate to say that they would soon find means to unite to them all the territory covered by the ramifications of the Mississippi.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., v, 199. (N.Y., July 1790.)

4853. LOUISIANA, Questions of boundary.—I suppose Monroe will touch on the limits of Louisiana only incidentally, inasmuch as its extension to Perdido curtails Florida, and renders it of less worth. * * * I am satisfied our right to the Perdido is substantial, and can be opposed by a quibble on form only; and our right westwardly to the bay of St. Bernard, may be strongly maintained.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 502. FORD ED., viii, 245. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4854. — — —. We did not collect the sense of our brethren the other day by regular questions, but as far as I could understand from what was said, it appeared to be,—1. That an acknowledgment of our right to the Perdido, is a sine qua non, and no price to be given for it. 2. No absolute and perpetual relinquishment of right is to be made of the country east of the Rio Bravo del Norte, even in exchange for Florida. (I am not quite sure that this was the opinion of all.) It would be better to lengthen term of years to any definite degree than to cede in perpetuity. 3. That a country may be laid off within which no further settlement shall be made by either party for a given time, say thirty years. This country to be from the North river eastwardly towards the Rio Colorado, or even to, but not beyond the Mexican or Sabine river. To whatever river it be extended, it might from its source run northwest, as the most eligible direction; but a due north line would produce no restraint that we should feel in twenty years. This relinquishment, and two millions of dollars, to be the price of all the Floridas east of the Perdido, or to be apportioned to whatever part they will cede. But on entering into conferences, both parties should agree that, during their continuance, neither should strengthen their situation between the Iberville, Mississippi, and Perdido, nor interrupt the navigation of the rivers therein. If they will not give such an order instantly, they should be told that we have for peace's sake only, forbore till they could have time to give such an order, but that as soon as we receive notice of their refusal to give the order, we shall enter into the exercise of our right of navigating the Mobile, and protect it, and increase our force there pari passu with them.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 550. FORD ED., viii, 309. (July 1804.)

4855. — — —. In conversation with Mr. Gallatin as to what might be deemed the result of our conference, he seemed to have understood the former opinion as not changed, to wit, that for the Floridas east of the Perdido might be given not only the two millions of dollars and a margin to remain unsettled, but an absolute relinquishment from the North river to the Bay of St. Bernard and Colorado river. This, however, I think should be the last part of the price yielded, and only for an entire cession of the Floridas, not for a part only.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 313. (1804.)

4856. LOUISIANA, Spain and acquisition.—At this moment a little cloud hovers in the horizon. The government of Spain has protested against the right of France to transfer; and it is possible she may refuse possession, and that this may bring on acts of force. But against such neighbors as France there, and the United States here, what she can expect from so gross a compound of folly and false faith, is not to be sought in the book of wisdom. She is afraid of her enemies in Mexico; but not more than we are.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 509. (W., Nov. 1803.)

4857. — — —. Spain entered with us a protestation against our ratification of the treaty, grounded, first, on the assertion that the First Consul had not executed the conditions of the treaties of cession; and, secondly, that he had broken a solemn promise not to alienate the country to any nation. We answered, that these were private questions between France and Spain, which they must settle together; that we derived our title from the First Consul, and did not doubt his guarantee of it.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 511. FORD ED., viii, 278. (W., Nov. 1803.) See SPAIN.

4858. LOUISIANA, Taking possession of.—We * * * [have] sent off orders to the Governor of the Mississippi Territory and

General Wilkinson to move down with the troops at hand to New Orleans, to receive the possession from M. Laussat. If he is heartily disposed to carry the order of the [First] Consul into execution, he can probably command a volunteer force at New Orleans, and will have the aid of ours also, if he desires it, to take the possession, and deliver it to us. If he is not so disposed, we shall take the possession, and it will rest with the government of France, by adopting the act as their own, and obtaining the confirmation of Spain, to supply the non-execution of their stipulation to deliver, and to entitle themselves to the complete execution of our part of the agreements.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 511. FORD ED., viii, 279. (W., Nov. 1803.)

4859. ——. I think it possible that Spain, recollecting our former eagerness for the island of New Orleans, may imagine she can, by a free delivery of that, redeem the residue of Louisiana; and that she may withhold the peaceable cession of it. In that case no doubt force must be used.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 263. (M., Sep. 1803.)

4860. LOUISIANA, Treaty ratified.—This treaty [Louisiana] must, of course, be laid before both Houses [of Congress], because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably be never again in their power. But, I suppose, they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution, approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 500. FORD ED., viii, 244. (M., Aug. 1803.)

4861. ——. Your treaty has obtained nearly a general approbation. * * * The question on its ratification in the Senate was decided by twenty-four against seven, which was ten more than enough. The vote in the House of Representatives for making provision for its execution was carried by eighty-nine against twenty-three, which was a majority of sixty-six, and the necessary bills are going through the Houses by greater majorities.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 510. FORD ED., viii, 278. (W., Nov. 1803.)

4862. ——. You will observe in the enclosed letter from Monroe a hint to do without delay what we are bound to do [regarding the treaty]. There is reason, in the opinion of our ministers, to believe, that if the thing were to do over again, it could not be obtained, and that if we give the least opening, they will declare the treaty void. A warning amounting to that has been given them, and an unusual kind of letter written by their minister to our Secretary of State, direct.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 505. FORD ED., viii, 247. (M., Sep. 1803.)

4863. ——. M. Pichon, according to instructions from his government, proposed to have added to the ratification a protestation against any failure in time or other circumstances of execution, on our part. He was told, that in that case we should annex a counter protestation, which would leave the thing exactly where it was; that this transaction had been conducted, from the commencement of the negotiation to this stage of it, with a frankness and sincerity honorable to both nations, and comfortable to the heart of an honest man to review; that to annex to this last chapter of the transaction such an evidence of mutual distrust, was to change its aspect dishonorably for us both, and, contrary to truth, as to us; for that we had not the smallest doubt that France would punctually execute its part; and I assured M. Pichon that I had more confidence in the word of the First Consul than in all the parchment we could sign. He saw that we had ratified the treaty; that both branches had passed, by great majorities, one of the bills for execution, and would soon pass the other two; that no circumstances remained that could leave a doubt of our punctual performance; and like an able and honest minister (which he is in the highest degree), he undertook to do what he knew his employers would do themselves, were they here spectators of all the existing circumstances, and exchanged the ratifications purely and simply; so that this instrument goes to the world as an evidence of the candor and confidence of the nations in each other, which will have the best effects.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 510. FORD ED., viii, 278. (W., Nov. 1803.)

4864. ——. The treaty which has so happily sealed the friendship of our two countries has been received here with general acclamation.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 508. (W., 1803.)

4865. ——. For myself and my country, I thank you for the aids you have given in it; and I congratulate you on having lived to give those aids in a transaction replete with blessings to unborn millions of men, and which will mark the face of a portion on the globe so extensive as that which now composes the United States of America.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 509. (W., 1803.)

4866. ——. It is not true that the Louisiana treaty was antedated, lest Great Britain should consider our supplying her enemies with money as a breach of neutrality. After the very words of the treaty were finally agreed to, it took some time, perhaps some days, to make out all the copies in the very splendid manner of Bonaparte's treaties. Whether the 30th of April, 1803, the date expressed, was the day of the actual compact, or that on which it was signed, our memories do not enable us to say. If the former, then it is strictly conformable to the day of the compact; if the latter, then it was postdated, instead of being antedated.*—To W. A. BURNWELL. v, 20. FORD ED., viii, 469. (M., Sep. 1806.)

* This antedating of the treaty was one of the charges made by John Randolph against the administration of Jefferson.—EDITOR.

4867. LOUIS XVI., Character of.—He had not a wish but for the good of the nation; and for that object, no personal sacrifice would ever have cost him a moment's regret; but his mind was weakness itself, his constitution timid, his judgment null, and without sufficient firmness even to stand by the faith of his word. His Queen, too, haughty, and bearing no contradiction, had an absolute ascendancy over him; and around her were rallied the King's brother, D'Artois, the court generally, and the aristocratic part of his ministers, particularly Breteuil, Broglie, Vauguyon, Foulon, Luzerne, men whose principles of government were those of the age of Louis XIV. Against this host, the good counsels of Necker, Montmorin, St. Priest, although in unison with the wishes of the King himself, were of little avail. The resolutions of the morning, formed under their advice, would be reversed in the evening, by the influence of the Queen and Court.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 88. FORD ED., i, 121. (1821.)

4872. LOUIS XVI., Execution.—We have just received the news of the decapitation of the King of France. Should the present ferment in Europe not produce republics everywhere, it will at least soften the monarchical governments by rendering monarchs amenable to punishment like other criminals, and doing away that rage of insolence and oppression, the inviolability of the King's person.—To ———. iii, 527. (Pa., March 1793.)

4873. ———. It is certain that the ladies of this city [Philadelphia], of the first circle, are open-mouthed against the murderers of a sovereign, and they generally speak those sentiments which the more cautious husband smother.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 520. FORD ED., vi, 193. (1793.)

4874. ———. The death of the King of France has not produced as open condemnations from the monarchs as I expected.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 519. FORD ED., vi, 192. (March 1793.)

4875. ———. The deed which closed the mortal course of these sovereigns [Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette], I shall neither approve nor condemn. I am not prepared to say that the first magistrate of a nation cannot commit treason against his country, or is unamenable to its punishment; nor yet, that where ——— is no written law, no regulated tribunal, not a law in our hearts, and a power in our hands, given for righteous employment in maintaining right and redressing wrong. Of those who judged the King, many thought him wilfully criminal; many that his existence would keep the nation in perpetual conflict with the horde of kings who would war against a regeneration which might come home to themselves, and that it were better that one should die than all. I should not have voted with this portion of the legislature. I should have shut up the Queen in a convent, putting harm out of her power, and placed the King in his station, investing him with limited powers, which, I verily believe, he would have honestly exercised according to the measure of his understanding. In this way no void would have been created, courting the usurpation of a military adventurer, nor occasion given for those enormities which demoralized the nations of the world, and destroyed and are yet to destroy millions and millions of its inhabitants.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 101. FORD ED., i, 141. 4877. LOUIS XVI., Good qualities.—The King's dispositions are solidly good. He is capable of great sacrifices. All he wants to induce him to do a thing, is to be assured it will be for the good of the nation.—To MR. CUTTING. ii, 439. (P., 1788.)

4878. LOUIS XVI., Habits.—The King, long in the habit of drowning his cares in wine, plunges deeper and deeper. The Queen cries, but sins on.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 258. (P., 1787.)

4880. LOUIS XVI., Honesty.—The King is the honestest man in his kingdom, and the most regular and economical. He has no foible which will enlist him against the good of his people; and whatever constitution will promote this, he will befriend. But he will not befriend it obstinately: he has given repeated proofs of a readiness to sacrifice his opinion to the wish of the nation. I believe he will consider the opinion of the States General, as the best evidence of what will please and profit the nation, and will conform to it.—To MR. CUTTING. ii, 470. (P., Aug. 1788.)

4881. ———. He is an honest, unambitious man, who desires neither money nor power for himself.—To JOHN JAY. iii, 28. (P., 1789.)

4882. ———. The King is honest, and wishes the good of his people; but the expediency of an hereditary aristocracy is too difficult a question for him. On the contrary, his prejudices, his habits and his connections, decide him in his heart to support it.—To JOHN JAY. iii, 51. (P., 1789.)

4883. ———. The King has an honest heart.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 39. (P., 1785.)

4884. LOUIS XVI., Revenues.—[It is urged principally against the King that his revenue is one hundred and thirty millions more than that of his predecessor was, and yet he demands one hundred and twenty millions further.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 258. (P., 1787.)]

4885. LOUIS XVI., Sincerity.—I have not a single doubt of the sincerity of the King.—To MR. MASON. iii, 72. (P., July 1789.) See MARIE ANTOINETTE and REVOLUTION (FRENCH).

4886. LOUIS XVIII., Restoration of.—I have received some information from an eyewitness of what passed on the occasion of the second return of Louis XVIII. The Emperor Alexander, it seems, was solidly opposed to this. In the consultation of the allied sovereigns and their representatives with the executive council at Paris, he insisted that the Bourbons were too incapable and unworthy of being placed at the head of the nation; declared he would support any other choice they should freely make, and continued to urge most strenuously that some other choice should be made. The debates ran high and warm, and broke off after midnight, every one retaining his own opinion. He lodged * * * at Talleyrand's. When they returned into council the next day, his host had overcome his firmness. Louis XVIII. was accepted, and through the management of Talleyrand, accepted without any capitulation, although the sovereigns would have consented that he should be first required to subscribe and swear to the constitution prepared, before permission to enter the kingdom. It would seem as if Talleyrand had been afraid to admit the smallest interval of time, lest a change of mind would bring back Bonaparte on them. But I observe that the friends of a limited monarchy there consider the popular representation as much improved by the late alteration, and confident it will in the end produce a fixed government in which an elective body, fairly representative of the people, will be an efficient element.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 82. (P.F., 1817.)

4887. LUXURIES, The Republic and.—I own it to be my opinion, that good will arise from the destruction of our credit [in Europe]. 4888. LUXURIES, Taxation of.—The * * * revenue, on the consumption of foreign articles, is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 41. FORD ED., viii, 343. (1805.)

4890. ——The government which steps out of the ranks of the ordinary articles of consumption to select and lay under disproportionate burthens a particular one, because it is a comfort, pleasing to the taste, or necessary to health, and will therefore be bought, is, in that particular, a tyranny.—To SAMUEL SMITH. vii, 285. FORD ED., x, 252. 4891. LUZERNE (Marquis de la), Disappointments.—We have, for some time, expected that the Chevalier de la Luzerne would obtain a promotion in the diplomatic line by being appointed to some of the courts where this country keeps an ambassador. But none of the vacancies taking place, I think the present disposition is to require his return to his station in America. He told me himself lately that he should return in the Spring. I have never pressed this matter on the court, though I knew it to be desirable and desired on our part; because, if the compulsion on him to return had been the work of Congress, he would have returned in such ill temper with them, as to disappoint them in the good they expected from it. He would forever have laid at their door his failure of promotion. I did not press it for another reason, which is, that I have great reason to believe that the character of the Count de Moustier, who would go, were the Chevalier to be otherwise provided for, would give the most perfect satisfaction in America.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 106. FORD ED., iv, 364. (P., 1787.)

4892. LUZERNE (Marquis de la), Secret marriage.—The Marquis de la Luzerne had been for many years married to his brother's wife's sister, secretly. She was ugly and deformed, but sensible, amiable, and rather rich. When he was named ambassador to London, with ten thousand guineas a year, the marriage was avowed, and he relinquished his cross of Malta, from which he derived a handsome revenue for life, and which was very open to advancement. She stayed here [Paris] and not long after died. His real affection for her, which was great and unfeigned, and perhaps the loss of his order for so short-lived a satisfaction, has thrown him almost into a state of despondency.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v, 44. (P., 1788.)

4893. LUZERNE (Marquis de la), Tribute to.—This government is now formed, organized, and in action; and it considers among its earliest duties, and assuredly among its most cordial, to testify to you the regret which the people and government of the United States felt at your removal from among them; a very general and sincere regret, and tempered only by the consolation of your personal advancement, which accompanied it. You will receive, Sir, by order of the President of the United States, as soon as they can be prepared, a medal and chain of gold, of which he desires your acceptance in token of their esteem, and of the sensibility with which they will ever recall your recollection of their memory. But as this compliment may, hereafter, be rendered to other missions, from which yours was distinguished by eminent circumstances, the President of the United States wishes to pay you the distinct tribute of an express acknowledgment of your services, and our sense of them. You came to us, Sir, through all the perils which encompassed us on all sides. You found us struggling and suffering under difficulties, as singular and trying as our situation was new and unprecedented. Your magnanimous nation had taken side with us in the conflict, and yourself became the centre of our common councils, the link which connected our common operations. In that position you labored without ceasing, until all our labors were crowned with glory to your nation, freedom to ours, and benefit to both. During the whole, we are constant evidence of your zeal, your abilities and your good faith. We desire to convey this testimony of it home to your breast, and to that of your sovereign, our best and greatest friend, and this I do, Sir, in the name, and by the express instruction of the President of the United States.—To MARQUIS DE LA LUZERNE. iii, 141. (N.Y., April 30, 1790.)

4894. LYON (Matthew), Prosecution of.—You will have seen the disgusting proceedings in the case of Lyon. If they would have accepted even of a commitment to the serjeant, it might have been had. But to get rid of his vote was the most material object. These proceedings must degrade the General Government, and lead the people to lean more on their State governments, which have been sunk under the early popularity of the former.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 211. FORD ED., vii, 202. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

4896. ——. I congratulate you on the destruction of a second hostile fleet on the Lakes by Macdonough. * * * While our enemies cannot but feel shame for their barbarous achievements at Washington, they will be stung to the soul by these repeated victories over them on that element on which they wish the world to think them invincible. We have dissipated that error. They must now feel a conviction themselves that we can beat them gun to gun, ship to ship, and fleet to fleet, and that their early successes on the land have been either purchased from traitors, or obtained from raw men entrusted of necessity with commands for which no experience had qualified them, and that every day is adding that experience to unquestioned bravery.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 386. (M., 1814.)

4897. MACE, Design for.—I send you a design for a Mace by Dr. Thornton, whose taste and inspiration are both good. But I am not satisfied with the introduction of the rattlesnake into the design. There is in man as well as brutes, an antipathy to the snake, which renders it a disgusting object wherever it is presented. I would myself rather adopt the Roman staves and axe, trite as it is; or perhaps a sword, sheathed in a roll of parchment (that is to say an imitation in metal of a roll of parchment), written over, in the raised Gothic letters of the law, with that part of the Constitution which establishes the House of Representatives, for that house, or the Senate. For the Senate, however, if you have that same disgust for the snake, I am sure you will yourself imagine some better substitute; or perhaps you will find that disgust overbalanced by stronger considerations in favor of the emblem.—To GOVERNOR HENRY LEE. FORD ED., vi, 320. (Pa., 1793.)

4898. MACON (Nathaniel) Confidence in.—Some enemy whom we know not, is sowing tares among us. Between you and myself nothing but opportunities of explanation can be necessary to defeat those endeavors. At least on my part my confidence in you is so unqualified that nothing further is necessary for my satisfaction. I must, therefore, ask a conversation with you.—To NATHANIEL MACON. FORD ED., viii, 439. (W., 1806.)

4899. ——. While such men as yourself and your worthy colleagues of the legislature, and such characters as compose the executive administration, are watching for us all,

I slumber without fear, and review in my dreams the visions of antiquity.*—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 111. FORD ED., x, 120. (M., 1819.)

— MADEIRA, Climate of.—See CLIMATE.

4900. MADISON (James), Ability of.—Mr. Madison came into the House [Legislature of Virginia] in 1776, a new member and young; which circumstances, concurring with his extreme modesty, prevented his venturing himself in debate before his removal to the Council of State, in November, '77. From thence he went to Congress, then consisting of few members. Trained in these successive schools, he acquired a habit of self-possession, which placed at ready command the rich resources of his luminous and discriminating mind, and of his extensive information, and rendered him the first of every assembly afterwards, of which he became a member. Never wandering from his subject into vain declamation, but pursuing it closely, in language pure, classical and copious, soothing always the feelings of his adversaries by civilities and softness of expression, he rose to the eminent station which he held in the great National Convention of 1787; and in that of Virginia which followed, he sustained the new Constitution in all its parts, bearing off the palm against the logic of George Mason, and the fervid declamation of Mr. [Patrick] Henry. With these consummate powers, were united a pure and spotless virtue, which no calumny has ever attempted to sully. Of the powers and polish of his pen, and of the wisdom of his administration in the highest office of the nation, I need say nothing. They have spoken, and will forever speak for themselves.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 41. FORD ED., i, 56. (1821.)

4901. MADISON (James), Administration of.—I leave everything in the hands of men so able to take care of them, that if we are destined to meet misfortunes, it will be because no human wisdom could avert them.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 433. (W., 1809.)

4902. ——. If peace can be preserved, I hope and trust you will have a smooth administration. I know no government which would be so embarrassing in war as ours. This would proceed very much from the lying and licentious character of our papers; but much, also, from the wonderful credulity of the members of Congress in the floating lies of the day. And in this no experience seems to correct them. I have never seen a Congress during the last eight years, a majority of which I would not implicitly have relied on in any question, could their minds have been purged of all errors of fact. The evil, too, increases greatly with the protraction of the session, and I apprehend, in case of war, their session would have a tendency to become permanent.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 437. (W., March 1809.)

4903. ——. Any services which I could have rendered will be more than supplied by the wisdom and virtues of my successor.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. v, 473. (M., 1809.)

* Nathaniel Macon was Speaker of the House of Representatives from 1801 to 1806, and subsequently United States Senator from North Carolina. John Randolph of Roanoke made him one of the legatees of his estate, and said of him in his will, "he is the best, the purest, and wisest man I ever knew".—EDITOR.

4904. — —. Mr. Madison is my successor. This ensures to us a wise and honest administration.—To BARON HUMSBOLDT. v, 435. (W., 1809.)

4905. — —. I do not take the trouble of forming opinions on what is passing among [my successors], because I have such entire confidence in their integrity and wisdom as to be satisfied all is going right, and that every one is best in the station confided to him.—To DAVID HOWELL. v, 555. (M., 1810.)

4906. — —. Anxious, in my retirement, to enjoy undisturbed repose, my knowledge of my successor and late coadjutors, and my entire confidence in their wisdom and integrity, were assurances to me that I might sleep in security with such watchmen at the helm, and that whatever difficulties and dangers should assail our course, they would do what could be done to avoid or surmount them. In this confidence I envelop myself, and hope to slumber on to my last sleep. And should difficulties occur which they cannot avert, if we follow them in phalanx, we shall surmount them without danger.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 533. (M., 1810.)

4907. — —. If you will except the bringing into power and importance those who were enemies to himself as well as to the principles of republican government, I do not recollect a single measure of the President which I have not approved. Of those under him, and of some very near him, there have been many acts of which we have all disapproved, and he more than we.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 465. FORD ED., ix, 521. (M., 1815.)

4908. MADISON (James), Confidence in.—In all cases I am satisfied you are doing what is for the best, as far as the means put into your hands will enable you, and this thought quiets me under every occurrence.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 114. FORD ED., ix, 384. (M., May 1813.)

— MADISON (James), Election contest.—See HENRY (PATRICK).

4909. MADISON (James), Federal Convention debates.—In a society of members, between whom and yourself are great mutual esteem and respect, a most anxious desire is expressed that you would publish your debates of the [Federal] Convention. That these measures of the army, navy and direct tax will bring about a revolution of public sentiment is thought certain, and that the Constitution will then receive a different explanation. Could those debates be ready to appear critically, their effect would be decisive. I beg of you to turn this subject in your mind. The arguments against it will be personal; those in favor of it moral; and something is required from you as a set off against the sin of your retirement.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 263. FORD ED., vii, 318. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

4910. MADISON (James), Hamilton and.—Hamilton is really a Colossus to the anti-republican party. * * * When he comes forward, there is nobody but yourself who can meet him.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 121. FORD ED., vii, 32. (M., 1795.)

4911. — —. You will see in Fenno two numbers of a paper signed "Marcellus". They promise much mischief, and are ascribed, without any difference of opinion, to [Alexander] Hamilton. You must take your pen against this champion. You know the ingenuity of his talents; and there is not a person but yourself who can foil him. For heaven's sake, then, take up your pen, and do not desert the public cause altogether.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 231. FORD ED., vii, 231. (Pa., April 1798.)

4912. — —. Let me pray and beseech you to set apart a certain portion of every post day to write what may be proper for the public. Send it to me while here [Philadelphia], and when I go away I will let you know to whom you may send, so that your name will be sacredly secret. You can render such incalculable services in this way, as to lessen the effect of our loss of your presence here.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 281. FORD ED., vii, 344. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

4913. MADISON (James), Jefferson and administration of.—The unwarrantable ideas often expressed in the newspapers, and by persons who ought to know better, that I intermeddle in the Executive councils, and the indecent expressions, sometimes, of a hope that Mr. Madison will pursue the principles of my administration, expressions so disrespectful to his known abilities and dispositions, have rendered it improper in me to hazard suggestions to him, on occasions even where ideas might occur to me, that might accidentally escape him.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 123. (M., 1813.)

— MADISON (James), Jefferson, Presidency and.—See PRESIDENT.

4914. MADISON (James), Jefferson's bequest to.—I give to my friend, James Madison, of Montpelier, my gold-mounted walking-staff of animal horn, as a token of the cordial and affectionate friendship, which, for nearly now an half-century, has united us in the same principles and pursuits of what we have deemed for the greatest good of our country.—JEFFERSON'S WILL. ix, 514. FORD ED., x, 395. (March 1826.)

4915. MADISON (James), Jefferson's friendship for.—My friendship for Mr. Madison, my confidence in his wisdom and virtue, and my approbation of all his measures, and especially of his taking up at length the gauntlet against England, is known to all with whom I have ever conversed or corresponded on these measures.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 465. FORD ED., ix, 521. (M., 1815.)

4916. — —. The friendship which has subsisted between us, now half a century, and the harmony of our political principles and pursuits, have been sources of constant happiness to me through that long period. And if I remove beyond the reach of attentions to the University, or beyond the bourne of life itself, as I soon must, it is a comfort to leave that institution under your care, and an assurance that it will not be wanting. It has also been a great solace to me, to believe that you are engaged in vindicating to posterity the course we have pursued for preserving to them, in all their purity, the blessings of self-government, which we had assisted, too, in acquiring for them. If ever the earth has beheld a system of administration conducted with a single and steadfast eye to the general interest and happiness of those committed to it, one which, protected by truth, can never know reproach, it is that to which our lives have been devoted. To myself you have been a pillar of support through life. Take care of me when dead, and be assured that I shall leave with you my last affections.*—To JAMES MADISON. vii, 434. FORD ED., x, 377. (M., February 1826.)

4917. MADISON (James), John Adams and.—Charles Lee consulted a member from Virginia to know whether [John] Marshall would be agreeable [as Minister to France]. He named you, as more likely to give satisfaction. The answer was, "nobody of Mr. Madison's way of thinking will be appointed".—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 179. FORD ED., vii, 132. (Pa., June 1797.)

4918. MADISON (James), Judgment of.—There is no sounder judgment than his. To J. W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 484. (M., 1814.)

— MADISON (James), Monroe and.—See MONROE.

4919. MADISON (James), Opinions of.—No man weighs more maturely than Mr. Madison before he takes a side on any question.—To PEREGRINE FITZHUGH. iv, 170. (M., 1797.)

4920. MADISON (James), Opposition to.—With respect to the opposition threatened, although it may give some pain, no injury of consequence is to be apprehended. Duane flying off from the government, may, for a little while, throw confusion into our ranks as John Randolph did. But, after a moment of time to reflect and rally, and to see where he is, we shall stand our ground with firmness. A few malcontents will follow him, as they did John Randolph, and perhaps he may carry off some well-meaning Anti-Snyderites of Pennsylvania. The federalists will sing hosannas, and the world will thus know of a truth what they are. This new minority will perhaps bring forward their new favorite, who seems already to have betrayed symptoms of consent. They will blast him in the bud, which will be no misfortune. They will sound the tocsin against the ancient dominion, and anti-dominionism may become their rallying point. And it is better that all this should happen two than six years hence.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 321. (M., April 1811.)

4921. MADISON (James), Pure principles of.—I know them both [Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe] to be of principles as truly republican as any men living.—To THOMAS RITCHIE. vii, 191. FORD ED., x, 170. (M., 1820.)

4922. MADISON (James), Reelection as President.—I have known Mr. Madison from 1779, when he first came into the public councils, and from three and thirty years' trial, I can say conscientiously that I do not know in the world a man of purer integrity, more dispassionate, disinterested, and devoted to genuine republicanism; nor could I, in the whole scope of America and Europe, point out an abler head. He may be illy seconded by others, betrayed by the Hulls and Arnolds of our country, for such there are in every country, and with sorrow and suffering we know it. But what man can do will be done by Mr. Madison. I hope, therefore, there will be no difference among republicans as to his reelection; we shall know his value when we have to give him up, and to look at large for his successor.—To THOMAS C. FLOURNEY. vi, 82. (M., Oct. 1812.)

4923. MADISON (James), Removal of Armstrong.—If our operations have suffered or languished from any want of injury in the present head [of the War Department] which directs them, I have so much confidence in the wisdom and conscientious integrity of Mr. Madison, as to be satisfied, that however torturing to his feelings, he will fulfil his duty to the public and to his own reputation, by making the necessary change.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 81. FORD ED., ix, 369. (M., Oct. 1812.)

4924. MADISON (James), Republicanism of.—Our enemies may try their cajoleries with my successor. They will find him as immovable in his republican principles as him whom they have honored with their peculiar enmity.—To Dr. E. GRIFFITH. v, 451. (M., 1809.)

4925. MADISON (James), Services to Jefferson.—Mr. Madison is entitled to his full share of all the measures of my administration. Our principles were the same, and we never differed sensibly in the application of them.—To W. C. NICHOLAS. FORD ED., ix, 252. (M., 1809.)

4926. MADISON (James), Statesmanship.—Our ship is sound, the crew alert at their posts, and our ablest steersman at its helm.—To JOHN MELISH. v, 573. (M., 1811.)

4927. MADISON (James), University of Virginia and.—I do not entertain your apprehensions for the happiness of our brother Madison in a state of retirement. Such a mind as his, fraught with information and with matter for reflection, can never know ennui. Besides, there will always be work enough cut out for him to continue his active usefulness to his country. For example, he and Monroe (the President) are now here (Monticello) on the work of a collegiate institution to be established in our neighborhood, of which they and myself are three of six visitors. This, if it succeeds, will raise up children for Mr. Madison to employ his attention through life.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 62. (M., 1817.)

4928. MADISON (James), Wisdom of.—My successor, to the purest principles of republican patriotism, adds a wisdom and foresight second to no man on earth.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 508. (M., 1810.)

— MAGNETIC NEEDLE.—See LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE.

4929. MAINT, Expediting.—The President has desired me to confer with you on the proposition I made the other day, of endeavoring to move the posts at the rate of one hundred miles a day. It is believed to be practicable here, because it is practiced in every other country. * * * I am anxious that the thing should be begun by way of experiment, for a short distance, because I believe it will so increase the income of the post-office as to show we may go through with it.—To COLONEL PICKERING. iii, 344. (Pa., 1792.)

4930. MAINE, English encroachments.—The English encroachments on the province of Maine become serious. They have seized vessels, too, on our coast of Passamaquoddy, thereby displaying a pretension to the exclusive jurisdiction to the Bay of Fundy, which separates Nova Scotia and Maine, and belongs as much to us as them.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. ii, 21. (P., 1786.)

4932. MAJORITY, Abuses by.—The majority, oppressing an individual, is guilty of a crime; abuses its strength, and, by acting on the law of the strongest, breaks up the foundations of society.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 591. FORD ED., x, 24. (P.F., 1816.)

4933. MAJORITY, Dissent from.—It is true that dissentients have a right to go over to the minority, and to act with them. But I do not believe your mind has contemplated that course; that it has deliberately viewed the strange company into which it may be led, step by step, unintended and unperceived by itself. The example of John Randolph is a caution to all honest and prudent men, to sacrifice a little of self-confidence, and to go with their friends, although they may sometimes think they are going wrong. * * * As far as my good will may go (for I can no longer act), I shall adhere to my government, Executive and Legislative, and, as long as they are republican, I shall go with their measures whether I think them right or wrong; because I know they are honest, and are wiser and better informed than I am. In doing this, however, I shall not give up the friendship of those who differ from me, and who have equal right with myself to shape their own course.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 592. FORD ED., ix, 316. (M., 1811.)

4935. MAJORITY, Generations and.—This corporeal globe, and everything upon it, belong to its present corporeal inhabitants, during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction; and this declaration can only be made by their majority.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 16. FORD ED., x, 44. (M., 1816.)

4936. — — — A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, holds all the rights and powers their predecessors once held, and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 359. M., 1824.) See GENERATIONS.

4937. MAJORITY, Law of.—Where the law of the majority ceases to be acknowledged, there government ends; the law of the strongest takes its place, and life and property are his who can take them.—R. to A. ANNAPOLIS CITIZENS. viii, 150. (1809.)

4938. — — — The lex majoris partis [is] founded in common law as well as common right.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 367. FORD ED., iii, 229. (1782.)

4939. MAJORITY, Natural law.—The lex majoris partis is the natural law of every assembly of men, whose numbers are not fixed by any other law.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 367. FORD ED., iii, 230. (1782.)

4940. — — — The law of the majority is the natural law of every society of men.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 496. FORD ED., v, 206. 1790.)

4941. — — — The lex majoris partis is a fundamental law of nature, by which alone self-government can be exercised by a society.—To JOHN BRECKENRIDGE. FORD ED., vii, 417. (Pa., 1800.)

4942. MAJORITY, Oppressive.—I have seen with deep concern the afflicting oppression under which the republican citizens of Connecticut suffer from an unjust majority. The truths expressed in your letter have been long exposed to the nation through the channel of the public papers, and are the more readily believed because most of the States during the momentary ascendancy of kindred majorities in them, have seen the same spirit of oppression prevail.—To THOMAS SEYMOUR. v, 43. FORD ED., ix, 29. (W., 1807.)

4943. MAJORITY, Reasonable.—Bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will, to be rightful, must be reasonable; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate would be oppression.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 2. FORD ED., viii, 2. (March 1801.)

4944. MAJORITY, Representatives of.—Our Executive and Legislative authorities are the choice of the nation, and possess the nation's confidence. They are chosen because they possess it, and the recent elections prove it has not been abated by the attacks which have for some time been kept up against them. If the measures which have been pursued are approved by the majority, it is the duty of the minority to acquiesce and conform.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 592. FORD ED., ix, 315. (M., 1811.)

4945. MAJORITY, Respect for.—The measures of the fair majority * * * ought always to be respected.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 461. FORD ED., vi, 103. (M., 1792.)

4946. MAJORITY, Slender.—After another election our majority will be two to one in the Senate, and it would not be for the public good to have it greater.—To JOEL BARLOW. iv, 437. FORD ED., viii, 149. (W., May 1802.)

4947. — — — The first principle of republicanism is that the lex majoris partis is the fundamental law of every society of individuals of equal rights; to consider the will of the society enounced by the majority of a single vote as sacred as if unanimous, is the first of all lessons in importance, yet the last which is thoroughly learnt. This law once disregarded, no other remains but that of force, which ends necessarily in military despotism. This has been the history of the French Revolution.—To F. H. ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. vii, 75. FORD ED., x, 89. (M., 1817.)

4948. MAJORITY, Submission to.—If we are faithful to our country, if we acquiesce, with good will, in the decisions of the majority, and the nation moves in mass in the same direction, although it may not be that which every individual thinks best, we have nothing to fear from any quarter.—R. to A. VIRGINIA BAPTISTS. viii, 139. (1808.)

4949. — — — I readily suppose my opinion wrong, when opposed by the majority.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 447. FORD ED., v, 48. (P., 1788.)

4950. — — — The fundamental law of every society is the lex majoris partis, to which we are bound to submit.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 90. (P., 1789.)

4951. MAJORITY, Will of.—The will of the majority honestly expressed should give law.—ANAS. ix, 131. FORD ED., i, 215. (1793.)

4952. — — — It is my principle that the will of the majority should always prevail.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 332. FORD ED., iv, 479. (P., 1787.)

4955. — — — The fundamental principle of the government is that the will of the majority is to prevail.—To DR. WILLIAM EUSTIS. v, 411. FORD ED., ix, 236. (W., Jan. 1809.)

4956. MALESHERBES (C. G. de la M.), Eminence.—He is unquestionably the first character in the kingdom for integrity, patriotism—knowledge and experience in business.—v JAY. ii, 157. (P., 1787.)

4958. — — — No man's recommendation merits more reliance than that of M. de Malesherbes.—To — — — v, 381. (W., 1808.)

4961. MALICE, Virtue and.—There is no act, however virtuous, for which ingenuity may not find some bad motive.—To EDWARD DOWSE. iv, 477. (W., 1803.)

4963. MAN, A curious animal.—Man is in all his shapes a curious animal.—To MR. VOLNEY. iv, 159. (M., 1797.)

4964. MAN, Destructive.—In the whole animal kingdom I recollect no family but man, steadily and systematically employed in the destruction of itself. Nor does what is called civilization produce any other effect, than to teach him to pursue the principle of the bellum omnium in omnia on a greater scale, and instead of the little contest between tribe and tribe, to comprehend all the quarters of the earth in the same work of destruction. If to this we add, that as to other animals, the lions and tigers are mere lambs compared with man as a destroyer, we must conclude that nature has been able to find in man alone a sufficient barrier against the too great multiplication of other animals and of man himself, an equilibrating power against the fecundity of generation. While in making these observations, my situation points my attention to the warfare of man in the physical world, yours may present him as equally warring in the moral one.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 156. FORD ED., vii, 99. (1797.)

4965. — — — The greatest honor of a man is in doing good to his fellow men, not in destroying them.—ADDRESS TO INDIANS. viii, 208. (1807.)

4967. MAN, Freedom and happiness of.—The freedom and happiness of man * * * are the sole objects of all legitimate government.—TO GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 509. (M., 1810.)

— MAN, Future generations and.—See GENERATIONS.

4971. MAN, Madness of.—What a Bedlamite is man!—TO JOHN ADAMS. vii, 200. FORD ED., x, 186. (M., 1821.)

4972. MAN, Political equality of.—All men are created equal.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4973. MAN, A rational animal.—Man is a rational animal, endowed by nature with rights, and with an innate sense of justice.—TO WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 291. FORD ED., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

— MAN, Rights of.—See RIGHTS OF MAN.

4974. MAN, Schoolboy through life.—The bulk of mankind are schoolboys through life.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 163. (1784.)

4975. MANKIND, Government of.—Men, enjoying in ease and security, the full fruits of their own industry, enlisted by all their interests on the side of law and order, habituated to think for themselves, and to follow their reason as their guide, * * * [are] more easily and safely governed than with minds nourished in error, and vitiated and debased, as in Europe, by ignorance, indigence, and oppression.—TO WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 292. FORD ED., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

4976. MANKIND, Improvement of.—The energies of the nation, as depends on me, shall be reserved for the improvement of the condition of man, not wasted in his destruction.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv, 388. (W., 1801.)

4977. — —. Although a soldier yourself, I am sure you contemplate the peaceable employment of man in the improvement of his condition, with more pleasure than his murders, raperies and devastations.—TO GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. vi, 69. FORD ED., ix, 363. (M., June 1812.)

4978. — —. That every man shall be made virtuous, by any process whatever, is, indeed, no more to be expected, than that every tree shall be made to bear fruit, and every plant nourishment. The brier and bramble can never become the vine and olive; but their asperities may be softened by culture, and their properties improved to usefulness in the order and economy of the world. And I do hope that, in the present spirit of extending to the great mass of mankind the blessings of instruction, I see a prospect of great advancement in the happiness of the human race; and that this may proceed to an indefinite, although not to an infinite degree.—TO C. C. BLATCHLY. vii, 263. (M., 1822.)

4981. — —. We must endeavor to forget our former love for them, and hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in War, in Peace friends.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4982. MANNERS, American vs. French.—I am much pleased with the people of this country. The roughness of the human mind is so thoroughly rubbed off with tuem that it seems as if one might glide through a whole life among them without a jostle. Perhaps, too, their manners may be the best calculated for happiness to a people in their situation, but I am convinced they fall far short of effecting a happiness so temperate, so uniform and so lasting as is generally enjoyed with us.—TO MRS. TRIST. i, 394. (F., 1785.)

4983. — —. Nourish peace with their [the French] persons, but war against their manners. Every step we take towards the adoption of their manners is a step to perfect misery.—TO MRS. TRIST. i, 395. (P., 1785.)

— MANUFACTURES, ContraBation and.—See 1159.

1793. MANUFACTURES, The Colonies and.—I think nothing can bring the security of our continent and its cause into danger. We can support the credit of our paper. To that, I apprehend, one of two steps must be taken. Either to procure free trade by alliance with some naval power able to protect us; or, if we find there is no prospect of that, to shut our ports totally, to ail the world, and turn our Colonies into manufactures. The former would be most eligible to our most conformable to the habits and wishes of our people.—To BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, 1793. FORD ED. ii, 132. (1777.)

1794. — — — During the present contest we have manufactured within our families the most necessary articles of clothing. Cotton will bear some comparison with the same kinds of manufacture in Europe, but those of wool, flax and hemp are coarser, unsightly, and unpleasant; and they are our attachment to agriculture, and our preference for foreign manufactures. Wise or unwise, our people will certainly return as soon as they can, to the raising of raw materials, and exchanging them for manufactures than they are able to export themselves.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, viii. FORD ED. iii, 268. (1782.)

1794. MANUFACTURES, Cotton—Our forces are making in the establishment of manufactures. Those of cotton will, we are so far proceeded on, that we shall not have to recur to the importation of cotton for our own use.—To WILLIAM WILSON, v, 280. (W., 1808.)

1794. — — — I am much pleased to see the progress in manufactures to be so great. Cotton is peculiarly interesting to us, because we raise the raw material in such abundance, and because it may, to a great degree, supply our deficiencies both in wool and in flax.—JAMES, v, 235. (W., 1808.)

1807. MANUFACTURES, The Embargo and.—The Embargo * * * promoting the good by promoting among ourselves the establishment of manufactures, and by sending abroad, at the risk of collision, no longer regulated by the laws of reason or equity.—R. to A. PHILADELPHIA DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICANS, viii, 128. (1808.)

1808. — — — The suspension of our foreign commerce, produced by the injustice of the belligerent powers, and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have thus been forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the

By the 1st of April, 1793, the year of King George II. the first time we are forbidden to manufacture articles of husbandry, besides flax, we are to pay at Britain, and freight the purpose of sup-

4999. — —. As a countervail to our short-lived sacrifices [by the Embargo], when these shall no longer be felt, we shall permanently retain the benefit they have prompted, of fabricating for our own use the materials of our own growth, heretofore carried to the work-houses of Europe, to be wrought and returned to us.—R. TO A. BALTIMORE TAMMANY SOCIETY. viii, 170. (1809.)

5000. — —. It is true that the Embargo laws have not had all the effect in bringing the powers of Europe to a sense of justice which a more faithful observance of them might have produced. Yet they have had the important effects of saving our seamen and property, of giving time to prepare for defence; and they will produce the further inestimable advantage of turning the attention and enterprise of our fellow citizens, and the patronage of our State Legislatures to the establishment of useful manufactures in our country. They will have hastened the day when an equilibrium between the occupations of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, shall simplify our foreign concerns to the exchange only of that surplus which we cannot consume for those articles of reasonable comfort or convenience which we cannot produce.—R. TO A. PENNA. DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICANS. viii, 163. (1809.)

5001. — —. Amidst the pressure of evils with which the belligerent edicts [Berlin decrees, Orders of Council, &c.], have afflicted us, some permanent good will arise; the spring given to manufactures will have durable effects. Knowing most of my own State, I can affirm with confidence that were free intercourse opened again to-morrow, she would never again import one-half of the coarse goods which she has done down to the date of the edicts. These will be made in our families. For finer goods we must resort to the larger manufactories established in the towns.—TO DAVID HUMPHREYS. v, 415. FORD ED., ix, 226. (W., 1809.)

5002. — —. The interruption of our commerce with England, produced by our Embargo and Non-Intercourse law, and the general indignation excited by her bare-faced attempts to make us accessories and tributaries to her usurpation on the high seas, have generated in this country an universal spirit for manufacturing for ourselves, and of reducing to a minimum the number of articles for which we are dependent on her. The advantages, too, of lessening the occasions of risking our peace on the ocean, and of planting the consumer in our own soil by the side of the grower of produce, are so palpable, that no temporary suspension of injuries on her part, or agreements founded on that, will now prevent our continuing in what we have begun. The spirit of manufacturing has taken deep root among us, and its foundations are laid in too great expense to be abandoned.—TO DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 456. (M., June 1809.)

5003. — —. Nothing more salutary for us has ever happened than the British obstructions to our demands for their manufactures. Restore free intercourse when they will, their commerce with us will have totally changed its form, and the articles we shall in future want from them will not exceed their own consumption of our produce.—TO JOHN ADAMS. vi, 36. FORD ED., ix, 333. (M., Jan. 1812.)

5004. MANUFACTURES, Encouragement of.—The present aspect of our foreign relations has encouraged here a general spirit of encouragement to domestic manufactures. The Merino breed of sheep is well established with us, and fine samples of cloth are sent to us from the North. Considerable manufactures of cotton are also commencing. Philadelphia, particularly, is becoming more manufacturing than commercial.—TO MR. MAURY. v, 214. (W., Nov. 1807.)

5005. — —. My idea is that we should encourage home manufactures to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw material.—TO DAVID HUMPHREYS. v, 416. FORD ED., ix, 226. (W., 1809.)

5006. — —. Every syllable uttered in my name becomes a text for the federalists to torment the public mind on by their paraphrases and perversions. I have lately inculcated the encouragement of manufactures to the extent of our own consumption at least, in all articles of which we raise the raw material. On this the federal papers and meetings have sounded the alarm of Chinese policy, destruction of commerce, &c.; that is to say, the iron which we make must not be wrought here into plows, axes, hoes, &c., in order that the ship-owner may have the profit of carrying it to Europe, and bringing it back in a manufactured form, as if after manufacturing our own raw materials for our own use, there would not be a surplus produce sufficient to employ a due proportion of navigation in carrying it to market and exchanging it for those articles of which we have not the raw material. Yet this absurd hue and cry has contributed much to federalize New England. Their doctrine goes to the sacrificing agriculture and manufactures to commerce; to the calling off our people from the interior country to the sea shore to turn merchants, and to convert this great agricultural country into a city of Amsterdam. But I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures and commerce, and not in this protuberant navigation which has kept us in hot water from the commencement of our government, and is now engaging us in war.—To THOMAS LEIPER. v, 417. FORD ED., ix, 239. (W., Jan. 1809.)

5007. ——. The government of the United States, at a very early period, when establishing its tariff on foreign importations, were very much guided in their selection of objects by a desire to encourage manufactures within themselves.—To ——. vii, 220. (M., 1821.)

5008. MANUFACTURES, Fear of British competition.—I much fear the effect on our infant establishments of the policy avowed by Mr. Brougham. Individual British merchants may lose by their late immense importations; but British commerce and manufactures, in the mass, will gain by beating down the competition of ours, in our own markets. Against this policy, our protecting duties are as nothing, our patriotism less.—To WILLIAM SAMPSON. FORD ED., x, 74. (M., 1817.)

5009. MANUFACTURES, Fostering.—Enough of the non-importation law should be reserved * * * to support those manufacturing establishments which the British Orders [of Council] and our interests forced us to make.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 442. FORD ED., ix, 251. (M., April 1809.)

5010. MANUFACTURES, Great Britain and American.—Radically hostile to our navigation and commerce, and fearing its rivalry, Great Britain will completely crush it, and force us to resort to agriculture, not aware that we shall resort to manufactures also, and render her conquests over our navigation and commerce useless, at least, if not injurious, to herself in the end, and perhaps salutary to us, as removing out of our way the chief causes and provocations to war.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 530. FORD ED., ix, 278. (M., 1810.)

5011. MANUFACTURES, Home.—There can be no question, in a mind truly American, whether it is best to send our citizens and property into certain captivity, and then wage war for their recovery, or to keep them at home, and to turn seriously to that policy which plants the manufacturer and the husbandman side by side, and establishes at the door of every one that exchange of mutual labors and comforts, which we have hitherto sought in distant regions, and under perpetual risk of broils with them.—R. to A. OF NEW YORK TAMMANY SOCIETY. viii, 127. (Feb. 1808.)

5012. ——. I see with satisfaction * * * that our citizens * * * are preparing to provide for themselves those comforts and conveniences of life, for which it would be unwise evermore to recur to distant countries.—R. to A. NEW HAMPSHIRE LEGISLATURE. viii, 131. (1808.)

5013. ——. I have not formerly been an advocate for great manufactories. I doubted whether our labor, employed in agriculture, and aided by the spontaneous energies of the earth, would not procure us more than we could make ourselves of other necessities. But other considerations entering into the question, have settled my doubts.—To JOHN MELISH. vi, 94. FORD ED., ix, 373. (M., Jan. 1813.)

5014. ——. If the piracies of France and England are to be adopted as the law of nations, or should become their practice, it will oblige us to manufacture at home all the material comforts. This may furnish a reason to check imports until necessary manufactures are established among us. This offers the advantage, too, of placing the consumer of our produce near the producer.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 128. (M., 1813.)

5015. ——. We are become manufacturers to a degree incredible to those who do not see it, and who only consider the short period of time during which we have been driven to them by the suicidal policy of England.—To JEAN BAPTISTE SAY. vi, 431. (M., March 1815.)

5016. ——. The prohibiting duties we lay on all articles of foreign manufacture which prudence requires us to establish at home, with the patriotic determination of every good citizen to use no foreign article which can be made within ourselves, without regard to difference of price, secures us against a relapse into foreign dependency.—To JEAN BAPTISTE SAY. vi, 431. (M., March 1815.)

5017. ——. It is our business to manufacture for ourselves whatever we can, to keep our markets open for what we can spare or want.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 465. FORD ED., ix, 520. (M., 1815.) See MARKETS.

5018. ——. No one has been more sensible than myself of the advantages of placing the consumer by the side of the producer, nor more disposed to promote it by example.—To MRS. K. D. MORGAN. FORD ED., viii, 473. (M., 1822.) See PROTECTION and TARIFF.

5019. MANUFACTURES, Homespun.—Homespun is become the spirit of the times. I think it an useful one, and, therefore, that it is a duty to encourage it by example. The best fine cloth made in the United States is, I am told, at the manufacture of Colonel Humphreys in your neighborhood [New Haven]. Could I get the favor of you to procure me there as much of his best as would make me a coat? I should prefer a deep blue, but, if not to be had, then a black.—To ABRAHAM BISHOP. FORD ED., ix, 225. (W., 1808.)

5020. MANUFACTURES, Household.—There is no manufacture of wire or of cotton cards, or if any, it is not worth notice. No manufacture of stocking-weaving, consequently none for making the machine; none of cotton cloths of any kind for sale; though in almost every family some is manufactured for the use of the family, which is always good in quality, and often tolerably fine. In the same way, they make excellent stockings of cotton, weaving it in like manner, carried on principally in the family way. Among the poor, the wife weaves generally, and the rich either have a weaver among their servants, or employ their poor neighbors.—To THOMAS DIGGES. ii, 412. FORD ED., v, 28. (P., 1788.)

5021. — —. The checks which the commercial regulations of Europe have given to the sale of our produce, has produced a very considerable degree of domestic manufacture, which, so far as it is in the household way, will doubtless continue; and so far as it is more public, will depend on the continuance or discontinuance of this policy of Europe.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. FORD ED., vi, 70. (Pa., 1792.)

5022. — —. I shall be glad to hear * * * any improvements in the arts applicable to * * * household manufacture.—To TENCH COXE. iv, 105. FORD ED., vi, 509. (M., May 1794.)

5023. — —. The mass of household manufacture, unseen by the public eye, and so much greater than what is seen, is such at present, that let our intercourse with England be opened when it may, not one-half the amount of what we have heretofore taken from her will ever again be demanded. The great call from the country has hitherto been of coarse goods. These are now made in our families, and the advantage is too sensible ever to be relinquished. It is one of those obvious improvements in our condition which needed only to be forced on our attention, never again to be abandoned.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 456. (M., June 1809.)

5024. — —. We are going greatly into manufactures; but the mass of them are household manufactures of the coarse articles worn by the laborers and farmers of the family. These I verily believe we shall succeed in making to the whole extent of our necessities. But the attempts at fine goods will probably be abortive. They are undertaken by company establishments, and chiefly in the towns; will have but little success and short continuance in a country where the charms of agriculture attract every being who can engage in it. Our revenue will be less than it would be were we to continue to import instead of manufacturing our coarse goods. But the increase of population and production will keep pace with that of manufactures, and maintain the quantum of exports at the present level at least; and the imports need be equivalent to them, and consequently the revenue on them be undiminished.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 583. FORD ED., ix, 317. (M., 1811.)

5025. — —. The economy and thriftiness resulting from our household manufactures are such that they will never again be laid aside.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 36. FORD ED., ix, 333. (M., Jan. 1812.)

5026. — —. Our manufacturers are now very nearly on a footing with those of England. She has not a single improvement which we do not possess, and many of them better adapted by ourselves to our ordinary use. We have reduced the large and expensive machinery for most things to the compass of a private family, and every family of any size is now getting machines on a small scale for their household purposes. Quoting myself as an example, and I am much behind many others in this business, my household manufactures are just getting into operation on the scale of a carding machine costing $60 only, which may be worked by a girl of twelve years old, a spinning machine, which may be had for $10, carrying six spindles for wool, to be worked by a girl also, another which can be made for $25, carrying twelve spindles for cotton, and a loom, with a flying shuttle, weaving its twenty yards a day. I need 2,000 yards of linen, cotton, and woollen yearly, to clothe my family, which this machinery, costing $150 only, and worked by two women and two girls, will more than furnish.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. vi, 68. FORD ED., ix, 362. (M., June 1812.)

5027. — —. I have hitherto myself depended entirely on foreign manufactures; but I have now thirty-five spindles agoing, a hand carding machine, and looms with the flying shuttle, for the supply of my own farms, which will never be relinquished in my time. The continuance of the war will fix the habit generally, and out of the evils of impressment and of the Orders of Council, a great blessing for us will grow.—To JOHN MELISH. vi, 94. FORD ED., ix, 373. (M., Jan. 1813.)

5028. — —. Small spinning jennies of from half a dozen to twenty spindles, will soon make their way into the humblest cottages, as well as the richest houses [in the South]; and nothing is more certain, than that the coarse and middling clothing for our families, will forever hereafter continue to be made within ourselves.—To JOHN MELISH. vi, 94. FORD ED., ix, 373. (M., Jan. 1813.)

5029. — —. Household manufacture is taking deep root with us. I have a carding machine, two spinning machines, and looms with the flying shuttle in full operation for clothing my own family; and I verily believe that by the next winter this State will not need a yard of imported coarse or middling cloth. I think we have already a sheep for every inhabitant, which will suffice for clothing; and one-third more, which a single year will add, will furnish blanketing.—To JAMES RONALDSON. vi, 92. FORD ED., ix, 371. (M., Jan. 1813.)

5030. — —. The specimens of Mrs. Mason's skill in manufactures excite the admiration of all. They prove she is really a more dangerous adversary to our British foes than all our generals. These attack the hostile armies only; she the source of their subsistence. What these do counts nothing, because they take one day and lose another: what she does counts double, because what she takes from the enemy is added to us. I hope, too, she will have more followers than our generals, but few rivals, I fear. These specimens exceed anything I saw during the Revolutionary war; although our ladies of that day turned their whole efforts to these objects, and with great praise and success.—To JOHN T. MASON. FORD ED., ix, 473. (M., 1814.)

5031. ——. I presume, like the rest of us in the country, you are in the habit of household manufacture, and that you will not, like too many, abandon it on the return of peace, to enrich our late enemy, and to nourish foreign agents in our bosom, whose baneful influence and intrigues cost us so much embarrassment and dissension.—To GEORGE FLEMING. vi, 506. (M., Dec. 1815.)

5032. ——. The interruption of our intercourse with England has rendered us one essential service in planting, radically and firmly, coarse manufactures among us. I make in my family two thousand yards of cloth a year, which I formerly bought from England, and it only employs a few women, children and invalids, who could do little on the farm. The State generally does the same, and allowing ten yards to a person, this amounts to ten millions of yards; and if we are about the medium degree of manufacturers in the whole Union, as I believe we are, the whole will amount to one hundred millions of yards a year, which will soon reimburse us the expenses of the war.—To MR. MAURY. vi, 471. (M., 1815.)

5033. MANUFACTURES, Independence, prosperity and.—The risk of hanging our prosperity on the fluctuating counsels and caprices of others renders it wise in us to turn seriously to manufactures, and if Europe will not let us carry our provisions to their manufactures, we must endeavor to bring their manufactures to our provisions.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 344. (Pa., 1791.)

5034. MANUFACTURES, Jefferson's views in 1782.—The political economists of Europe have established it as a principle, that every State should endeavor to manufacture for itself; and this principle, like many others, we transfer to America, without calculating the difference of circumstance which should often produce a difference of result. In Europe, the lands are either cultivated, or locked up against the cultivator. Manufacture must, therefore, be resorted to of necessity, not of choice, to support the surplus of their people. But we have an immensity of land courting the industry of the husbandman. Is it best then that all our citizens should be employed in its improvement, or that one half of them should be called off from that to exercise manufactures and handicrafts for the other? Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God, if ever He had a chosen people, whose breasts He has made His peculiar deposit for substantial and genuine virtue.

“he focus in which He keeps alive that fire, which otherwise might escape from the face of the earth. Corruption of morals in the mass of cultivators is a phenomenon of which no age nor nation has furnished an example. It is the mark set on those, who, not looking up to heaven, to their own soil and industry, as does the husbandman, for their subsistence, depend for it on casualties and caprice of customers. Dependence begets subservience and venality, suffocates the germ of virtue, and prepares fit tools for the designs of ambition. This, the natural progress and consequence of the arts, has sometimes perhaps been retarded by accidental circumstances; but, generally speaking, the proportion which the aggregate of the other classes of citizens bears in any State to that of its husbandmen, is the proportion of its unsound to its healthy parts, and is a good barometer whereby to measure its degree of corruption. While we have land to labor, then, let us never wish to see our citizens occupied at a work bench, or twirling a distaff. Carpenters, masons, smiths, are wanting in husbandry; but, for the general operations of manufacture, let our workshops remain in Europe. It is better to carry provisions and materials to workmen there, than bring them to the provisions and materials, and with them their manners and principles. The loss by the transportation of commodities across the Atlantic will be made up in happiness and permanence of government. The mobs of great cities add just so much to the support of pure government, as sores do to the strength of the human body. It is the manners and spirit of a people which preserve a republic in vigor. A degeneracy in these is a canker which soon eats to the heart of its laws and constitution.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 405. FORD ED., iii, 268. (1782.)

5035. MANUFACTURES, Jefferson's views in 1816.—You tell me I am quoted by those who wish to continue our dependence on England for manufactures. There was a time when I might have been so quoted with more candor, but within the thirty years which have since elapsed, how are circumstances changed! We were then in peace. Our independent place among nations was acknowledged. A commerce which offered the raw material in exchange for the same material after receiving the last touch of industry, was worthy of welcome to all nations. It was expected that those especially to whom manufacturing industry was important, would cherish the friendship of such customers by every favor, by every inducement, and, particularly, cultivate their peace by every act of justice and friendship. Under this prospect the question seemed legitimate, whether, with such an immensity of unimproved land, courting the hand of husbandry, the industry of agriculture, or that of manufactures, would add most to the national wealth? And the doubt was entertained on this consideration chiefly, that to the labor of the husbandman a vast addition is made by the spontaneous energies of the earth on which it is employed; for one grain of wheat committed to the earth, she renders twenty, thirty, and even fifty-fold, whereas to the labor of the manufacturer nothing is added. Pounds of flax, in his hands, yield, on the contrary, but penny-weights of lace. This exchange, too, laborious as it might seem, what a field did it promise for the occupations of the ocean; what a nursery for that class of citizens who were to exercise and maintain our equal rights on that element? This was the state of things in 1785, when the "Notes on Virginia" were first printed; when, the ocean being open to all nations, and their common right in it acknowledged and exercised under regulations sanctioned by the assent and usage of all, it was thought that the doubt might claim some consideration. But who, in 1785, could foresee the rapid depravity which was to render the close of that century the disgrace of the history of man? Who could have imagined that the two most distinguished in the rank of nations, for science and civilization, would have suddenly descended from that honorable eminence, and setting at defiance all those moral laws established by the Author of nature between nation and nation, as between man and man, would cover earth and sea with robberies and piracies, merely because strong enough to do it with temporal impunity; and that under this disbandment of nations from social order, we should have been despoiled of a thousand ships, and have thousands of our citizens reduced to Algerine slavery? Yet all this has taken place. One of these nations [Great Britain] interdicted to our vessels all harbors of the globe without having first proceeded to some one of hers, there paid a tribute proportioned to the cargo, and obtained her license to proceed to the port of destination. The other [France] declared them to be lawful prize if they had touched at the port, or been visited by a ship of the enemy nation. Thus were we completely excluded from the ocean. Compare this state of things with that of 1785, and say whether an opinion founded in the circumstances of that day can be fairly applied to those of the present? We have experienced what we did not then believe, that there exists both profligacy and power enough to exclude us from the field of interchange with other nations; that to be independent for the comforts of life we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. The former question is suppressed, or rather assumes a new form. Shall we make our own comforts, or go without them, at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufacture, must be for reducing us either to dependence on that foreign nation, or to be clothed in skins, and to live, like wild beasts, in dens and caverns. I am not one of these; experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort; and if those who quote me as of a different opinion, will keep pace with me in purchasing nothing foreign where an equivalent of domestic fabric can be obtained, without regard to difference of price, it will not be our fault if we do not soon have a supply at home equal to our demand, and wrest that weapon of distress from the hand which has wielded it. If it shall be proposed to go beyond our own supply, the question of 1785 will then recur, Will our surplus labor be then most beneficially employed in the culture of the earth, or in the fabrications of art? We have time yet for consideration, before that question will press upon us; and the maxim to be applied will depend on the circumstances which shall then exist; for in so complicated a science as political economy, no one axiom can be laid down as wise and expedient for all times and circumstances, and for their contraries. Inattention to this is what has called for this explanation, which reflection would have rendered unnecessary with the candid, while nothing will do with those who use the former opinion only as a stalking horse to cover their disloyal propensities to keep us in eternal vassalage to a foreign and unfriendly people.*—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 521. FORD ED., x, 8. (M., Jan. 1816.)

5036. MANUFACTURES, Labor and.—

In general, it is impossible that manufactures should succeed in America from the high price of labor. This is occasioned by the great demand of labor for agriculture. A manufacturer, going from Europe, will turn to labor of other kinds if he finds more to be got by it, and he finds some employment so profitable that he can soon lay up money enough to buy fifty acres of land, to the culture of which he is irresistibly tempted by the independence in which that places him, and the desire of having a wife and family around him. If any manufactures can succeed there, it will be that of cotton.—To THOMAS DIGGES. ii, 412. FORD ED., v, 27. (P., 1788.)

5037. MANUFACTURES, Machinery and.—The endeavors which Dr. Wallace informed you we were making in the line of manufactures are very humble indeed: We have not as yet got beyond the clothing of our laborers. We hope, indeed, soon to begin finer fabrics, and for higher uses. But these will probably be confined to cotton and wool. * * * I have lately seen the improvement of the loom by Janes, the most beautiful machine I have ever seen. * * * I am endeavoring to procure this improvement. These cares are certainly more pleasant than those of the state.—To JOHN T. MASON. FORD ED., ix, 475. (M., 1814.)

5038. MANUFACTURES, National defence and.—The endeavors of five years, aided with some internal manufacturers, have

* Mr. Austin asked Jefferson's permission to publish the letter containing the foregoing extract. Jefferson wrote in reply: "I am, in general, extremely unwilling to be carried into the newspapers, no matter what the subject; the whole pack of the Essex [Junto] Kennel would open upon me. With respect, however, to so much of my letter * * * as relates to manufactures, I have less repugnance, because there is, perhaps, a degree of duty to avow a change of opinion called for by a change of circumstance, and especially on a point now becoming peculiarly interesting."—EDITOR.

not yet found a tolerable supply of arms. To make these within ourselves, then, as well as the other implements of war, is as necessary as to make our bread within ourselves.—To SPEAKER HOUSE OF DELEGATES. FORD ED., ii, 267. (Wg., 1779.)

5040. MANUFACTURES, Navigation vs.—Some jealousy of this spirit of manufacture seems excited among commercial men. It would have been as just when we first began to make our own plows and hoes. They have certainly lost the profit of bringing these from a foreign country. * * * I do not think it fair in the shipowners to say we ought not to make our own axes, nails, &c., here, that they may have the benefit of carrying the iron to Europe, and bringing back the axes, nails, &c. Our agriculture will still afford surplus produce enough to employ a due proportion of navigation.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. v, 415. FORD ED., ix, 226. (W., 1800.)

5042. MANUFACTURES, Rivalry in foreign markets.—We hope to remove the British fully and finally from our continent. And what they will feel more, for they value their colonies only for the bales of cloth they take from them, we have established manufactures, not only sufficient to supersede our demand from them, but to rivalize them in foreign markets.—To MADAME DE TESSE. vi, 273. FORD ED., ix, 440. (Dec. 1813.)

5043. MANUFACTURES, Rooted.—Our domestic manufactures * * * have taken such deep root * * * [that they] never again can be shaken.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vi, 427. FORD ED., ix, 511. (M., 1815.)

5044. ——. We owe to the past follies and wrongs of the British the incalculable advantage of being made independent of them for every material manufacture. These have taken such root in our private families especially, that nothing now can ever extirpate them.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 420. FORD ED., ix, 504. (M., Feb. 1815.)

5045. MANUFACTURES, State aid to.—The House of Delegates of Virginia seemed disposed to adventure £2,500 for the establishing a woollen manufactory in Virginia, but the Senate did not concur. By their returning to the subject, however, at a subsequent session, and wishing more specific propositions, it is probable they might be induced to concur, if they saw a certain provision that their money would not be paid for nothing. Some unsuccessful experiments heretofore may have suggested this caution. Suppose the propositions brought into some such shape as this: The undertaker is to contribute £1,000, the State £2,500, viz.: the undertaker having laid out his £1,000 in the necessary implements to be brought from Europe, and these being landed in Virginia as a security that he will proceed, let the State pay for the first necessary purpose then to occur £1,000.

|---|-----------------|
| Let it pay him a stipend of £100 a year for the first three years..... | £300 |
| Let it give him a bounty (suppose one-third) on every yard of woollen cloth equal to good plains, which he shall weave for five years, not exceeding £250 a year (30,000 yards) the four first years, and £300 the fifth..... | 1,200
£1,500 |

To every workman whom he shall import, let them give, after he shall have worked in the manufactory five years, warrants for — acres of land, and pay the expenses of survey, patents, &c. (This last article is to meet the proposition of the undertaker. I do not like it, because it tends to draw off the manufacturer from his trade. I should better like a premium to him on his continuance in it; as, for instance, that he should be free from State taxes as long as he should carry on his trade.)

The President's intervention seems necessary till the contracts shall be concluded. It is presumed he would not like to be embarrassed afterwards with the details of superintendence. Suppose, in his answer to the Governor of Virginia, he should say that the undertaker being in Europe, more specific propositions cannot be obtained from him in time to be laid before this assembly; that in order to secure to the State the benefits of the establishment, and yet guard them against an unproductive grant of money, he thinks some plan like the preceding one might be proposed to the undertaker. That as it is not known whether he would accept it exactly in that form, it might disappoint the views of the State were they to prescribe that or any other form rigorously, consequently that a discretionary power must be given to a certain extent. That he would willingly cooperate with their Executive in effecting the contract, and certainly would not conclude it on any terms worse for the State than those before explained, and that the contracts being once concluded, his distance and other occupations would oblige him to leave the execution open to the Executive of the State.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 460. (1790.)

5046. MANUFACTURES, Tariff on foreign.—Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs; first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here. in competition with our own of the same kind; selecting next, such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity, and which, at the same time, we could the soonest furnish to ourselves, or obtain from other countries; imposing on them duties lighter at first, but heavier and heavier, afterwards, as other channels of supply open. Such duties, having the effect of indirect encouragement to domestic manufactures of the same kind,

4946. MAJORITY, Slender.—After another election our majority will be two to one in the Senate, and it would not be for the public good to have it greater.—To JOEL BARLOW. iv, 437. FORD ED., viii, 149. (W., May 1802.)

4947. — — — The first principle of republicanism is that the lex majoris partis is the fundamental law of every society of individuals of equal rights; to consider the will of the society enounced by the majority of a single vote as sacred as if unanimous, is the first of all lessons in importance, yet the last which is thoroughly learnt. This law once disregarded, no other remains but that of force, which ends necessarily in military despotism. This has been the history of the French Revolution.—To F. H. ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. vii, 75. FORD ED., x, 89. (M., 1817.)

4948. MAJORITY, Submission to.—If we are faithful to our country, if we acquiesce, with good will, in the decisions of the majority, and the nation moves in mass in the same direction, although it may not be that which every individual thinks best, we have nothing to fear from any quarter.—R. to A. VIRGINIA BAPTISTS. viii, 139. (1808.)

4949. — — — I readily suppose my opinion wrong, when opposed by the majority.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 447. FORD ED., v, 48. (P., 1788.)

4950. — — — The fundamental law of every society is the lex majoris partis, to which we are bound to submit.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 90. (P., 1789.)

4951. MAJORITY, Will of.—The will of the majority honestly expressed should give law.—ANAS. ix, 131. FORD ED., i, 215. (1793.)

4952. — — — It is my principle that the will of the majority should always prevail.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 332. FORD ED., iv, 479. (P., 1787.)

4955. — — — The fundamental principle of the government is that the will of the majority is to prevail.—To DR. WILLIAM EUSTIS. v, 411. FORD ED., ix, 236. (W., Jan. 1809.)

4956. MALESHERBES (C. G. de la M.), Eminence.—He is unquestionably the first character in the kingdom for integrity, patriotism, knowledge and experience in business.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 157. (P., 1787.)

4958. — — — No man's recommendation merits more reliance than that of M. de Malesherbes.—To — — —. v, 381. (W., 1808.)

4960. MALICE, Political.—You certainly acted wisely in taking no notice of what the malice of Pickering could say of you. Were such things to be answered, our lives would be wasted in the filth of findings and provings, instead of being employed in promoting the happiness and prosperity of our fellow citizens. The tenor of your life is the proper and sufficient answer.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 62. (M., 1817.)

4961. MALICE, Virtue and.—There is no act, however virtuous, for which ingenuity may not find some bad motive.—To EDWARD DOWSE. iv, 477. (W., 1803.)

4963. MAN, A curious animal.—Man is in all his shapes a curious animal.—To MR. VOLNEY. iv, 159. (M., 1797.)

4964. MAN, Destructive.—In the whole animal kingdom I recollect no family but man, steadily and systematically employed in the destruction of itself. Nor does what is called civilization produce any other effect, than to teach him to pursue the principle of the bellum omnium in omnia on a greater scale, and instead of the little contest between tribe and tribe, to comprehend all the quarters of the earth in the same work of destruction. If to this we add, that as to other animals, the lions and tigers are mere lambs compared with man as a destroyer, we must conclude that nature has been able to find in man alone a sufficient barrier against the too great multiplication of other animals and of man himself, an equilibrating power against the fecundity of generation. While in making these observations, my situation points my attention to the warfare of man in the physical world, yours may present him as equally warring in the moral one.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 156. FORD ED., vii, 99. (1797.)

4965. — — — The greatest honor of a man is in doing good to his fellow men, not in destroying them.—ADDRESS TO INDIANS. viii, 208. (1807.)

4967. MAN, Freedom and happiness of.—The freedom and happiness of man * * * are the sole objects of all legitimate government.—TO GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 509. (M., 1810.)

— MAN, Future generations and.—See GENERATIONS.

4971. MAN, Madness of.—What a Bedlamite is man!—TO JOHN ADAMS. vii, 200. FORD ED., x, 186. (M., 1821.)

4972. MAN, Political equality of.—All men are created equal.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4973. MAN, A rational animal.—Man is a rational animal, endowed by nature with rights, and with an innate sense of justice.—TO WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 291. FORD ED., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

— MAN, Rights of.—See RIGHTS OF MAN.

4974. MAN, Schoolboy through life.—The bulk of mankind are schoolboys through life.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 163. (1784.)

4975. MANKIND, Government of.—Men, enjoying in ease and security, the full fruits of their own industry, enlisted by all their interests on the side of law and order, habituated to think for themselves, and to follow their reason as their guide, * * * [are] more easily and safely governed than with minds nourished in error, and vitiated and debased, as in Europe, by ignorance, indigence, and oppression.—TO WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 292. FORD ED., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

4976. MANKIND, Improvement of.—The energies of the nation, as depends on me, shall be reserved for the improvement of the condition of man, not wasted in his destruction.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv, 388. (W., 1801.)

4977. — —. Although a soldier yourself, I am sure you contemplate the peaceable

employment of man in the improvement of his condition, with more pleasure than his murders, raperies and devastations.—TO GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. vi, 69. FORD ED., ix, 363. (M., June 1812.)

4978. — —. That every man shall be made virtuous, by any process whatever, is, indeed, no more to be expected, than that every tree shall be made to bear fruit, and every plant nourishment. The brier and bramble can never become the vine and olive; but their asperities may be softened by culture, and their properties improved to usefulness in the order and economy of the world. And I do hope that, in the present spirit of extending to the great mass of mankind the blessings of instruction, I see a prospect of great advancement in the happiness of the human race; and that this may proceed to an indefinite, although not to an infinite degree.—TO C. C. BLATCHLY. vii, 263. (M., 1822.)

4979. MANKIND, Love for.—Loving mankind in my individual relations with them, I pray to be permitted to depart in their peace.—TO SPENCER ROANE. vii, 136. FORD ED., x, 142. (P.F., 1819.)

4980. MANKIND, Relations with.—During a long life, as much devoted to study as a faithful transaction of the trusts committed to me would permit, no subject has occupied more of my consideration than our relations with all the beings around us, our duties to them, and our future prospects. After reading and hearing everything which probably can be suggested respecting them, I have formed the best judgment I could as to the course they prescribe, and in the due observance of that course, I have no recollections which give me uneasiness.—TO WILLIAM CANBY. vi, 210. (M., 1813.)

4981. — —. We must endeavor to forget our former love for them, and hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in War, in Peace friends.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

4982. MANNERS, American vs. French.—I am much pleased with the people of this country. The roughness of the human mind is so thoroughly rubbed off with tuem that it seems as if one might glide through a whole life among them without a jostle. Perhaps, too, their manners may be the best calculated for happiness to a people in their situation, but I am convinced they fall far short of effecting a happiness so temperate, so uniform and so lasting as is generally enjoyed with us.—TO MRS. TRIST. i, 394. (P., 1785.)

4983. — —. Nourish peace with their [the French] persons, but war against their manners. Every step we take towards the adoption of their manners is a step to perfect misery.—TO MRS. TRIST. i, 395. (P., 1785.)

4984. MANNERS, Institutions and.—Time indeed changes manners and notions and so far we must expect institutions to bend to them.—TO SPENCER ROANE. vii, 211. FORD ED., x, 188. (M., 1821.)

4985. MANNERS, National.—The manners of every nation are the standard of orthodoxy within itself. But these standards being arbitrary, reasonable people in all allow free toleration for the manners, as for the religion of others.—To JEAN BAPTISTE SAY. vi, 433. (M., 1815.)

4986. MANSFIELD (Lord), Able and eloquent.—A man of the clearest head, and most seducing eloquence.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 115. (P., 1785.)

4987. MANSFIELD (Lord), Decisions of.—I hold it essential, in America, to forbid that any English decision which has happened since the accession of Lord Mansfield to the bench, should ever be cited in a court; because, though there have come many good ones from him, yet there is so much poison instilled into a great part of them, that it is better to proscribe the whole.—To MR. CUTTING. ii, 487. (P., 1788.)

4988. — — —. The object of former judges has been to render the law more and more certain; that of this personage to render it more uncertain under pretence of rendering it more reasonable.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 115. (P., 1785.)

4989. MANUFACTURES, Agriculture, commerce and.—I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures and commerce.—To THOMAS LEIPER. v, 417. FORD ED., ix, 239. (W., 1809.)

4990. — — —. An equilibrium of agriculture, manufactures and commerce, is certainly become essential to our independence. Manufactures sufficient for our own consumption, of what we raise the raw material (and no more). Commerce sufficient to carry the surplus produce of agriculture, beyond our own consumption, to a market for exchanging it for articles we cannot raise (and no more). These are the true limits of manufactures and commerce. To go beyond them is to increase our dependence on foreign nations, and our liability to war. These three important branches of human industry will then grow together, and be really handmaids to each other.—To JAMES JAY. v, 440. (M., April 1809.) See AGRICULTURE and COMMERCE.

4991. MANUFACTURES, British prohibition of.—By an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty, King George II., an American subject is forbidden to make a hat for himself, of the fur which he has taken perhaps on his own soil; an instance of despotism to which no parallel can be produced in the most arbitrary ages of British history.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 129. FORD ED., i, 434. (1774.)

4992. — — —. By an act passed in the twenty-third year of King George II., the iron which we make, we are forbidden to manufacture; and, heavy as that article is, and necessary in every branch of husbandry, besides commission and insurance, we are to pay freight for it to Great Britain, and freight for it back again, for the purpose of supporting, not men, but machines in the island of Great Britain.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 129. FORD ED., i, 434. (1774.) See TRADE.

— MANUFACTURES, Centralization and.—See 1159.

4998. MANUFACTURES, The Colonies and.—I think nothing can bring the security of our continent and its cause into danger, if we can support the credit of our paper. To do that, I apprehend, one of two steps must be taken. Either to procure free trade by alliance with some naval power able to protect it; or, if we find there is no prospect of that, to shut our ports totally, to all the world, and turn our Colonies into manufactories. The former would be most eligible, because most conformable to the habits and wishes of our people.—To BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. i, 205. FORD ED., ii, 132. (1777.)

4996. — — —. I am much pleased to find our progress in manufactures to be so great. That of cotton is peculiarly interesting, because we raise the raw material in such abundance, and because it may, to a great degree, supply our deficiencies both in wool and linen.—To J. DORSEY. v, 235. (W., 1808.)

4997. MANUFACTURES, The Embargo and.—The Embargo * * * promises lasting good by promoting among ourselves the establishment of manufactures hitherto sought abroad, at the risk of collisions no longer regulated by the laws of reason or morality.—R. TO A. PHILADELPHIA DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICANS. viii, 128. (1808.)

4998. — — —. The suspension of our foreign commerce, produced by the injustice of the belligerent powers, and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have thus been forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the

4999. — —. As a countervail to our short-lived sacrifices [by the Embargo], when these shall no longer be felt, we shall permanently retain the benefit they have prompted, of fabricating for our own use the materials of our own growth, heretofore carried to the work-houses of Europe, to be wrought and returned to us.—R. TO A. BALTIMORE TAMMANY SOCIETY. viii, 170. (1809.)

5000. — —. It is true that the Embargo laws have not had all the effect in bringing the powers of Europe to a sense of justice which a more faithful observance of them might have produced. Yet they have had the important effects of saving our seamen and property, of giving time to prepare for defence; and they will produce the further inestimable advantage of turning the attention and enterprise of our fellow citizens, and the patronage of our State Legislatures to the establishment of useful manufactures in our country. They will have hastened the day when an equilibrium between the occupations of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, shall simplify our foreign concerns to the exchange only of that surplus which we cannot consume for those articles of reasonable comfort or convenience which we cannot produce.—R. TO A. PENNA. DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICANS. viii, 163. (1809.)

5001. — —. Amidst the pressure of evils with which the belligerent edicts [Berlin decrees, Orders of Council, &c.], have afflicted us, some permanent good will arise; the spring given to manufactures will have durable effects. Knowing most of my own State, I can affirm with confidence that were free intercourse opened again to-morrow, she would never again import one-half of the coarse goods which she has done down to the date of the edicts. These will be made in our families. For finer goods we must resort to the larger manufactories established in the towns.—TO DAVID HUMPHREYS. v, 415. FORD ED., ix, 226. (W., 1809.)

5002. — —. The interruption of our commerce with England, produced by our Embargo and Non-Intercourse law, and the general indignation excited by her bare-faced attempts to make us accessories and tributaries to her usurpation on the high seas, have generated in this country an universal spirit for manufacturing for ourselves, and of reducing to a minimum the number of articles for which we are dependent on her. The advantages, too, of lessening the occasions of risking our peace on the ocean, and of planting the consumer in our own soil by the side of the grower of produce, are so palpable, that no temporary suspension of injuries on her part, or agreements founded on that, will now prevent our continuing in what we have begun. The spirit of manufacturing has taken deep root among us, and its foundations are laid in too great expense to be abandoned.—TO DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 456. (M., June 1809.)

5003. — —. Nothing more salutary for us has ever happened than the British obstructions to our demands for their manufactures. Restore free intercourse when they will, their commerce with us will have totally changed its form, and the articles we shall in future want from them will not exceed their own consumption of our produce.—TO JOHN ADAMS. vi, 36. FORD ED., ix, 333. (M., Jan. 1812.)

5005. — —. My idea is that we should encourage home manufactures to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw material.—TO DAVID HUMPHREYS. v, 416. FORD ED., ix, 226. (W., 1809.)

5006. — —. Every syllable uttered in my name becomes a text for the federalists to torment the public mind on by their paraphrases and perversions. I have lately inculcated the encouragement of manufactures to the extent of our own consumption at least, in all articles of which we raise the raw material. On this the federal papers and meetings have sounded the alarm of Chinese policy, destruction of commerce, &c.; that is to say, the iron which we make must not be wrought here into plows, axes, hoes, &c., in order that the ship-owner may have the profit of carrying it to Europe, and bringing it back in a manufactured form, as if after manufacturing our own raw materials for our own use, there would not be a surplus produce sufficient to employ a due proportion of navigation in carrying it to market and exchanging it for those articles of which we have not the raw material. Yet this absurd hue and cry has contributed much to federalize New England. Their doctrine goes to the sacrificing agriculture and manufactures to commerce; to the calling off our people from the interior country to the sea shore to turn merchants, and to convert this great agricultural country into a city of Amsterdam. But I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures and commerce, and not in this protuberant navigation which has kept us in hot water from the commencement of our

the acre (and such sales were many then), would not now sell for more than from ten to twenty dollars, or one-quarter or one-fifth of its former price.—To JAMES MADISON. vii, 434. FORD ED., x, 377. (M., February 1826.)

5087. MARKETS, Monopolized.—It is contrary to the spirit of trade, and to the dispositions of merchants, to carry a commodity to any market where but one person is allowed to buy it, and where, of course, that person fixes its price, which the seller must receive, or reexport his commodity, at the loss of his voyage thither. Experience accordingly shows, that they carry it to other markets, and that they take in exchange the merchandise of the place where they deliver it.—To COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 386. (P., 1785.)

5088. MARKETS, Necessity and.—We must accept bread from our enemies if our friends cannot furnish it.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 523. (P., 1788.)

5089. MARKETS, Neutrality and.—If the new government wears the front which I hope it will. I see no impossibility in the availing ourselves of the wars of others to open up the other parts [West India Islands] of America to our commerce as the price of our neutrality.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

5090. MARKETS, Reciprocity and.—It were to be wished that some positively favorable stipulations respecting our grain, flour and fish, could be obtained, even on our giving reciprocal advantages to some other commodities of Spain, say her wines and brandies. But if we quit the ground of the most favored nation, as to certain articles for our convenience, Spain may insist on doing the same for other articles for her convenience. * * * If we grant favor to the wines and brandies of Spain, then Portugal and France will demand the same; and in order to create an equivalent, Portugal may lay a duty on our fish and grain, and France, a prohibition on our whale oils, the removal of which will be proposed as an equivalent. This much, however, as to grain and flour, may be attempted. There has, not long since, been a considerable duty laid on them in Spain. This was while a treaty on the subject of commerce was pending between us and Spain, as that Court considers the matter. It is not generally thought right to change the state of things pending a treaty concerning them. On this consideration, and on the motive of cultivating our friendship, perhaps the Commissioners may induce them to restore this commodity to the footing on which it was on opening the conferences with Mr. Gardoqui, on the 26th day of July, 1785. If Spain says, "do the same by your tonnage on our vessels", the answer may be, that our tonnage affects Spain very little, and other nations very much; whereas the duty on flour in Spain affects us very much, and other nations very little. Consequently, there would be no equality in reciprocal relinquishment, as there had been none in the reciprocal innovation; and Spain, by insisting on this, would, in fact, only be aiding the interests of her rival nations, to whom we should be forced to extend the same indulgence. At the time of opening the conferences, too, we had as yet not erected any system; our government itself being not yet erected. Innovation then was unavoidable on our part, if it be innovation to establish a system. We did it on fair and general ground, on ground favorable to Spain. But they had a system and, therefore, innovation was avoidable on their part.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 590. FORD ED., v, 479. (March 1792.)

5091. MARKETS, Salted provisions.—I wish that you could obtain the free introduction of our salted provisions into France. Nothing would be so generally pleasing from the Chesapeake to New Hampshire.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 168. (N.Y., 1790.)

5092. — —. It gives great satisfaction that the Arret du Conseil of December, 1787, stands a chance of being saved. It is, in truth, the sheet-anchor of our connection with France, which will be much loosened when that is lost. This Arret saved, a free importation of salted meats into France, and of provisions of all kinds into her colonies, will bind our interests to that country more than to all the world besides.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 225. (Pa., 1791.)

5093. MARKETS, Speculation and.—I think the best rule is, never to sell on a rising market. Wait till it begins to fall. Then, indeed, one will lose a penny or two, but with a rising market you never know what you are to lose.—To FRANCIS EFFES. FORD ED., vi, 163. (Pa., 1793.)

5094. MARKETS, Steady.—Sudden vicissitudes of opening and shutting ports do little injury to merchants settled on the opposite [British] coast, watching for the opening, like the return of a tide, and ready to enter with it. But they ruin the adventurer whose distance requires six months' notice.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 525. (P., 1788.)

5095. — —. A regular course of trade is not quitted in an instant, nor constant customers deserted for accidental ones.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 68. (P., 1789.)

5096. MARKETS, Sugar.—Evidence grows upon us that the United States may not only supply themselves with sugar for their own consumption, but be great exporters.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 325. (Pa., 1791.)

5097. MARKETS, Tobacco.—While the navigating and provision States, who are the majority, can keep open all the markets, or at least sufficient ones for their objects, the cries of the tobacco makers, who are the minority, and not at all in favor, will hardly be listened to. It is truly the fable of the monkey pulling the nuts out of the fire with the cat's paw; and it shows that George Mason's proposition in the [Federal] Convention was wise, that on laws regulating commerce, two-thirds of the votes should be required to pass them.—To JAMES MADISON. iv. 323. FORD ED., vii, 432. (Pa., March 1800.) See TOBACCO.

5098. MARKETS, Wheat and flour.—

We can sell them [the Portuguese] the flour ready manufactured for much less than the wheat of which it is made. In carrying to them wheat, we carry also the bran, which does not pay its own freight. In attempting to save and transport wheat to them, much is lost by the weevil, and much spoiled by heat in the hold of the vessel. This loss must be laid on the wheat which gets safe to market, where it is paid for by the consumer. Now this is much more than the cost of manufacturing it with us, which would prevent that loss. * * * Let them buy of us as much wheat as will make a hundred weight of flour. They will find that they have paid more for the wheat than we should have asked for the flour, besides having lost the labor of their mills in grinding it. The obliging us, therefore, to carry it to them in the form of wheat, is a useless loss to both parties.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 492. (P., 1785.)

5099. ——. It seems that so far from giving new liberties to our corn trade, Portugal contemplates the prohibition of it, by giving that trade exclusively to Naples. What would she say should we give her wine trade exclusive to France and Spain? * * * Can a wise statesman seriously think of risking such a prospect as this?—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 488. (Pa., 1792.)

5100. ——. I must forever repeat that, instead of excluding our wheat, Portugal will open her ports to our flour.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., vi, 205. (Pa., 1793.)

5101. MARQUE, Letters of.—The Administrator shall not possess the prerogative * * * of issuing letters of marque, or reprisal.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii 19. (June 1776.)

5103. ——. I have to-day consulted the other gentlemen [of the Cabinet] on the question whether letters of marque were to be considered as written within our interdict. We are unanimously of opinion they are not. We consider them as essentially merchant vessels; that commerce is their main object, and arms merely incidental and defensive.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 123. FORD ED., ix, 104. (W., July 1807.)

5104. MARRIAGE, Congratulations on.

—It is customary in America to "wish joy" to a new married couple, and this is generally done by those present in the moment after the ceremony. A friend of mine, however, always delayed the wish of joy till one year after the ceremony, because he observed they had by that time need of it. I am entitled fully then to express the wish to you as you must now have been married at least three years. I have no doubt, however, that you have found real joy in the possession of a good wife, and the endearments of a child.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., viii, 15. (W., 1801.)

5105. MARRIAGE, Happiness in.—I * * * give you my sincere congratulations on your marriage. Your own dispositions, and the inherent comforts of that state, will insure you a great addition of happiness.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 590. FORD ED., iv, 250. (P., 1786.)

5106. ——. The happiness of your life now depends on the continuing to please a single person. To this all other objects must be secondary, even your love for me, were it possible that could ever be an obstacle. But this it never can be. Neither of you can ever have a more faithful friend than myself, nor one on whom you can count for more sacrifices. My own is become a secondary object to the happiness of you both. Cherish, then, for me, my dear child, the affection of your husband, and continue to love me as you have done, and to render my life a blessing by the prospect it may hold up to me of seeing you happy.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J., 180. (N. Y., 1790.)

5107. ——. I have one daughter married to a man of science, sense, virtue, and competence; in whom indeed I have nothing more to wish. * * * If the other shall be as fortunate, * * * I shall imagine myself as blessed as the most blessed of the patriarchs.—To MRS. CHURCH. FORD ED., vi, 455. (G., 1793.)

5108. MARRIAGE, Harmony in.—Harmony in the married state is the very first object to be aimed at. Nothing can preserve affections uninterrupted but a firm resolution never to differ in will, and a determination in each to consider the love of the other as of more value than any object whatever on which a wish had been fixed. How light in fact is the sacrifice of any other wish when weighed against the affections of one with whom we are to pass our whole life! And though opposition in a single instance will hardly of itself produce alienation, yet every one has their pouch into which all these little oppositions are put; while that is filling the alienation is insensibly going on, and when filled it is complete.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. D. L. J., 246. (Pa., 1798.)

5109. MARRIAGE, Motherhood and.—It [motherhood] is undoubtedly the keystone of the arch of matrimonial happiness.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J., 192. (Pa., 1791.)

5110. MARRIAGE, Youthful.—I sincerely sympathize with you on the step which your brother has taken without consulting you, and wonder indeed how it could be done, with any attention in the agents, to the laws of the land. I fear he will hardly persevere in the second plan of life adopted for him, as matrimony illy agrees with study, especially in the first stages of both. However, you will readily perceive that, the thing being done, there is now but one question, that is what is to be done to make the best of it, in respect both to his and your happiness? A step of this kind indicates no vice, nor other foible than of following too hastily the movements of a warm heart. It admits, therefore, of the continuance of cordial affection, and calls perhaps more indispensably for your care and protection. To conciliate the affection of all parties, and to banish all suspicion of discontent, will conduce most to your own happiness also.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., v, 317. (Pa., 1791.)

5111. MARRIAGE WITH ROYALTY.—Our young Republic * * * should prevent its citizens from becoming so established in wealth and power, as to be thought worthy of alliance by marriage with the nieces, sisters, &c., of kings.—To COLONEL HUMPHREYS. ii, 253. (P., 1787.)

5112. MARSHALL (John), Crafty.—A crafty chief judge, who sophisticates the law to his mind, by the turn of his own reasoning.—To THOMAS RITCHIE. vii, 192. FORD ED., x, 171. (M., 1820.)

5113. MARSHALL (John), Hamilton and.—I learn that [Alexander] Hamilton has expressed the strongest desire that Marshall shall come into Congress from Richmond, declaring that there is no man in Virginia whom he wishes so much to see there; and I am told that Marshall has expressed half a mind to come. Hence I conclude that Hamilton has plied him well with flattery and solicitation, and I think nothing better could be done than to make him a judge.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 95. (Pa., 1792.)

5114. MARSHALL (John), Marbury vs. Madison Case.—His twistifications in the case of Marbury, in that of Burr, and the Yazoo case show how dexterously he can reconcile law to his personal biases.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 276. (M., 1810.)

5115. MARSHALL (John), Mischief-maker.—Though Marshall will be able to embarrass the republican party in the Assembly a good deal, yet upon the whole, his having gone into it will be of service. He has been hitherto able to do more mischief acting under the mask of republicanism than he will be able to do throwing it plainly off. His lax lounging manners have made him popular with the bulk of the people of Richmond, and a profound hypocrisy with many thinking men of our country. But having come forth in the full plenitude of his English principles, the latter will see that it is high time to make him known.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 37. (Nov. 1795.)

5116. MARSHALL (John), Moot cases and.—The practice of Judge Marshall, of travelling out of his case to prescribe what the law would be in a moot case not before the court, is very irregular and very censurable.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 295. FORD ED., x, 230. (M., 1823.)

5117. MARSHALL (John), Sophistry of.—The rancorous hatred which Marshall bears to the government of his country, and * * * the cunning and sophistry within which he is able to enshroud himself.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 275. (M., 1810.) See HISTORY. JUDICIARY, MAZZEI, and SUPREME COURT.

5118. MARTIAL LAW, Recourse to.—There are extreme cases where the laws become inadequate even to their own preservation, and where the universal resource is a dictator, or martial law.—To DR. JAMES BROWN. v, 379. FORD ED., ix, 211. (W., 1808.)

5119. MARTIN (Luther), Burr and.—Shall we move to commit Luther Martin as particeps criminis with Burr? Graybell will fix upon him misprision of treason at least. And at any rate, his evidence will put down this unprincipled and impudent federal bull-dog, and add another proof that the most clamorous defenders of Burr are all his accomplices. It will explain why Luther Martin flew so hastily to the "aid of his honorable friend", abandoning his clients and their property during a session of a principal court in Maryland, now filled, as I am told, with the clamors and ruin of his clients.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 99. FORD ED., ix, 58. (W., June 1807.) See LOGAN.

5120. MASON (George), Ability of.—George Mason [was] a man of the first order of wisdom among those who acted on the theatre of the Revolution, of expansive mind, profound judgment, cogent in argument, learned in the lore of our former constitution, and earnest for the republican change on democratic principles.* His elocution was neither flowing or smooth; but his language was strong, his manner most impressive, and strengthened by a dash of biting cynicism when provocation made it seasonable.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 40. FORD ED., i, 56. (1821.)

5121. MASON (George), Virginia Constitution and.—What are George Mason's sentiments as to the amendment of our Constitution? What amendment would he approve? Is he determined to sleep on, or will he rouse and be active?—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 347. (A., Dec. 1783.)

5122. ———. That George Mason was the author of the Bill of Rights and of the Constitution founded on it, the evidence of the day established fully in my mind.—To HENRY LEE. vii, 407. FORD ED., x, 342. (M., 1825.)

5123. ———. The fact is unquestionable, that the Bill of Rights and the Constitution of Virginia were drawn originally by George Mason, one of our really great men, and of the first order of greatness.—To A. B. WOODWARD. vii, 405. FORD ED., x, 341. (M., 1825.)

5124. MASON (J. M.), Red-hot Federalist.—I do not know Dr. [John M.] Mason

* George Mason was one of the signers of the Declaration. "Mason," said James Madison, "possessed the greatest talents for debate of any man I have ever seen or heard speak."—EDITOR.

personally, but by character well. He is the most red-hot federalist, famous, or rather infamous for the lying and slandering which he vomited from the pulpit in the political harangues with which he polluted the place. I was honored with much of it. He is a man who can prove everything if you will take his word for proof. Such evidence of Hamilton's being a republican he may bring; but Mr. Adams, Edmund Randolph, and myself, could repeat an explicit declaration of Hamilton's against which Dr. Mason's proofs would weigh nothing.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 495. FORD ED., ix, 269. (M., 1810.)

5125. MASON (J. T.), Meteoric.—John Thompson Mason is a meteor whose path cannot be calculated. All the powers of his mind seem at present to be concentrated in one single object, the producing a convention to new model the [State] Constitution.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 318. (T., May 1783.)

5126. MASSACHUSETTS, Apostasy.—Oh Massachusetts! how have I lamented the degradation of your apostasy! Massachusetts, with whom I went in pride in 1776, whose vote was my vote on every public question, and whose principles were then the standard of whatever was free or fearless. But she was then under the counsels of the two Adamses; while Strong, her present leader, was promoting petitions for submission to British power and British usurpation. While under her present counsels, she must be contented to be nothing; as having a vote, indeed, to be counted, but not respected. But should the State, once more, buckle on her republican harness, we shall receive her again as a sister, and recollect her wanderings among the crimes only of the parricide party, which would have basely sold what their fathers so bravely won from the same enemy. Let us look forward, then, to the act of repentance, which, by dismissing her venal traitors, shall be the signal of return to the bosom, and to the principles of her brethren; and, if her late humiliation can just give her modesty enough to suppose that her southern brethren are somewhat on a par with her in wisdom, in information, in patriotism, in bravery, and even in honesty, although not in psalm-singing, she will more justly estimate her own relative momentum in the Union. With her ancient principles, she would really be great, if she did not think herself the whole.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. vi, 451. (M., March 1815.)

5127. MASSACHUSETTS, Defection of.—Some apprehend danger from the defection of Massachusetts. It is a disagreeable circumstance but not a dangerous one. If they become neutral, we are sufficient for one enemy without them, and in fact we get no aid from them now. If their administration determines to join the enemy, their force will be annihilated by equality of division among themselves. Their federalists will then call in the English army, the republicans ours, and it will only be a transfer of the scene of war from Canada to Massachusetts; and we can get ten men to go to Massachusetts for one who will go to Canada. Every one, too, must know that we can at any moment make peace with England at the expense of the navigation and fisheries of Massachusetts. But it will not come to this. Their own people will put down these factionists as soon as they see the real object of their opposition; and of this Vermont, New Hampshire, and even Connecticut itself, furnish proofs.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 402. (M., Nov. 1814.)

— MASSACHUSETTS, Federal Constitution and.—See CONSTITUTION (FEDERAL).

5128. MASSACHUSETTS, Federalism in.—Massachusetts still lags; because most deeply involved in the parricide crimes and treasons of the war. But her gangrene is contracting, the sound flesh advancing on it, and all there will be well.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 66. FORD ED., x, 83. (M., 1817.)

5129. MASSACHUSETTS, Justice to.—So far as either facts or opinions have been truly quoted from me, they have never been meant to intercept the just fame of Massachusetts for the promptitude and perseverance of her early resistance. We willingly cede to her the laud of having been (although not exclusively) "the cradle of sound principles", and, if some of us believe she has deflected from them in her course, we retain full confidence in her ultimate return to them.—To SAMUEL A. WELLS. i, 117. FORD ED., x, 129. (M., 1819.)

5130. MASSACHUSETTS, Patriotism of People.—The progression of sentiment in the great body of our fellow citizens of Massachusetts, and the increasing support of their opinion, I have seen with satisfaction, and was ever confident I should see; persuaded that an enlightened people, whenever they should view impartially the course we have pursued, could never wish that our measures should have been reversed; could never desire that the expenses of the government should have been increased, taxes multiplied, debt accumulated, wars undertaken, and the tomahawk and scalping knife left in the hands of our neighbors, rather than the hoe and plough. In whatever tended to strengthen the republican features of our Constitution, we could not fail to expect from Massachusetts, the cradle of our Revolutionary principles, an ultimate concurrence; and cultivating the peace of nations, with justice and prudence, we yet were always confident that, whenever our rights would have to be vindicated against the aggression of foreign foes, or the machinations of internal conspirators, the people of Massachusetts, so prominent in the military achievements which placed our country in the right of self-government, would never be found wanting in their duty to the calls of their country, or the requisitions of their government.—R. TO A. MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE. viii, 116. (Feb. 1807.)

5131. MASSACHUSETTS, Republicanism in.—I sincerely congratulate you on the triumph of republicanism in Massachusetts. The hydra of federalism has now lost all its heads but two [Connecticut and Delaware].—To MR. BIDWELL. v, 14. (W., 1806.)

5132. ——. I tender to yourself, to Mr. Lincoln, and to your State, my sincere congratulations on the happy event of the election of a republican Executive to preside over its councils. The * * * just respect with which all the States have ever looked to Massachusetts, could leave none of them without anxiety, while she was in a state of alienation from her family and friends.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 100. FORD ED., ix, 75. (W., June 1807.)

5133. ——. Of the return of Massachusetts to sound principles I never had a doubt. The body of her citizens has never been otherwise than republican. Her would-be dukes and lords, indeed, have been itching for coronets; her lawyers for robes of ermine, her

not yet found a tolerable supply of arms. To make these within ourselves, then, as well as the other implements of war, is as necessary as to make our bread within ourselves.—To SPEAKER HOUSE OF DELEGATES. FORD ED., ii, 267. (Wg., 1779.)

5040. MANUFACTURES, Navigation vs.—Some jealousy of this spirit of manufacture seems excited among commercial men. It would have been as just when we first began to make our own plows and hoes. They have certainly lost the profit of bringing these from a foreign country. * * * I do not think it fair in the shipowners to say we ought not to make our own axes, nails, &c., here, that they may have the benefit of carrying the iron to Europe, and bringing back the axes, nails, &c. Our agriculture will still afford surplus produce enough to employ a due proportion of navigation.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. v, 415. FORD ED., ix, 226. (W., 1800.)

5042. MANUFACTURES, Rivalry in foreign markets.—We hope to remove the British fully and finally from our continent. And what they will feel more, for they value their colonies only for the bales of cloth they take from them, we have established manufactures, not only sufficient to supersede our demand from them, but to rivalize them in foreign markets.—To MADAME DE TESSE. vi, 273. FORD ED., ix, 440. (Dec. 1813.)

5043. MANUFACTURES, Rooted.—Our domestic manufactures * * * have taken such deep root * * * [that they] never again can be shaken.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vi, 427. FORD ED., ix, 511. (M., 1815.)

5044. ——. We owe to the past follies and wrongs of the British the incalculable advantage of being made independent of them for every material manufacture. These have taken such root in our private families especially, that nothing now can ever extirpate them.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 420. FORD ED., ix, 504. (M., Feb. 1815.)

5045. MANUFACTURES, State aid to.—The House of Delegates of Virginia seemed disposed to adventure £2,500 for the establishing a woollen manufactory in Virginia, but the Senate did not concur. By their returning to the subject, however, at a subsequent session, and wishing more specific propositions, it is probable they might be induced to concur, if they saw a certain provision that their money would not be paid for nothing. Some unsuccessful experiments heretofore may have suggested this caution. Suppose the propositions brought into some such shape as this: The undertaker is to contribute £1,000, the State £2,500, viz.: the undertaker having laid out his £1,000 in the necessary implements to be brought from Europe, and these being landed in Virginia as a security that he will proceed, let the State pay for the first necessary purpose then to occur £1,000.

|---|--------|
| Let it pay him a stipend of £100 a year for the first three years..... | £300 |
| Let it give him a bounty (suppose one-third) on every yard of woollen cloth equal to good plains, which he shall weave for five years, not exceeding £250 a year (20,000 yards) the four first years, and £200 the fifth..... | 1,800 |
| | £2,100 |

To every workman whom he shall import, let them give, after he shall have worked in the manufactory five years, warrants for — acres of land, and pay the expenses of survey, patents, &c. (This last article is to meet the proposition of the undertaker. I do not like it, because it tends to draw off the manufacturer from his trade. I should better like a premium to him on his continuance in it; as, for instance, that he should be free from State taxes as long as he should carry on his trade.)

The President's intervention seems necessary till the contracts shall be concluded. It is presumed he would not like to be embarrassed afterwards with the details of superintendence. Suppose, in his answer to the Governor of Virginia, he should say that the undertaker being in Europe, more specific propositions cannot be obtained from him in time to be laid before this assembly; that in order to secure to the State the benefits of the establishment, and yet guard them against an unproductive grant of money, he thinks some plan like the preceding one might be proposed to the undertaker. That as it is not known whether he would accept it exactly in that form, it might disappoint the views of the State were they to prescribe that or any other form rigorously, consequently that a discretionary power must be given to a certain extent. That he would willingly cooperate with their Executive in effecting the contract, and certainly would not conclude it on any terms worse for the State than those before explained, and that the contracts being once concluded, his distance and other occupations would oblige him to leave the execution open to the Executive of the State.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 460. (1790.)

5046. MANUFACTURES, Tariff on foreign.—Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs; first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here. in competition with our own of the same kind; selecting next, such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity, and which, at the same time, we could the soonest furnish to ourselves, or obtain from other countries; imposing on them duties lighter at first, but heavier and heavier, afterwards, as other channels of supply open. Such duties, having the effect of indirect encouragement to domestic manufactures of the same kind.

may induce the manufacturer to come himself into these States, where cheaper subsistence, equal laws, and a vent of his wares, free of duty, may ensure him the highest profits from his skill and industry. And here, it would be in the power of the State governments to cooperate essentially, by opening the resources of encouragement which are under their control, extending them liberally to artists in those particular branches of manufacture for which their soil, climate, population and other circumstances have matured them, and fostering the precious efforts and progress of household manufacture, by some patronage suited to the nature of its objects, guided by the local informations they possess, and guarded against abuse by their presence and attentions. The oppressions on our agriculture, in foreign ports, would thus be made the occasion of relieving it from a dependence on the councils and conduct of others, and of promoting arts, manufactures and population at home.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii. 648. FORD ED., vi, 481. (Dec. 1793.) See DUTIES, PROTECTION and TARIFF.

5047. MANUFACTURES, Virginia.—In Virginia we do little in the fine way, but in coarse and middling goods a great deal. Every family in the country is a manufactory within itself, and is very generally able to make within itself all the stouter and middling stuffs for its own clothing and household use. We consider a sheep for every person in the family as sufficient to clothe it, in addition to the cotton, hemp and flax which we raise ourselves. For fine stuff we shall depend on your northern manufactories. Of these, that is to say, of company establishments we have none. We use little machinery. The spinning jenny, and loom with the flying shuttle, can be managed in a family; but nothing more complicated.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 36. FORD ED., ix, 332. (M., Jan. 1812.)

5048. — — — For fine goods there are numerous establishments at work in the large cities, and many more daily growing up; and of merinos we have some thousands, and these multiplying fast. We consider a sheep for every person as sufficient for their woollen clothing, and this State and all to the north have fully that, and those to the south and west will soon be up to it. In other articles we are equally advanced, so that nothing is more certain than that, come peace when it will, we shall never again go to England for a shilling where we have gone for a dollar's worth. Instead of applying to her manufacturers there, they must starve or come here to be employed.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. vi, 69. FORD ED., ix, 363. (M., June 1812.)

— MAPLE SUGAR.—See SUGAR.

5049. MARBURY vs. MADISON, Case of.—I observe that the case of Marbury vs. Madison has been cited [in the trial of Aaron Burr], and I think it material to stop at the threshold the citing that case as authority and to have it denied to be law. 1. Because the judges in the outset, disclaimed all cognizance of the case, although they then went on to say what would have been their opinion, had they had cognizance of it. This, then, was confessedly an extra-judicial opinion, and, as such of no authority. 2. Because, had it been judicially pronounced, it would have been against law; for to a commission, a deed, a bond, delivery is essential to give validity. Until, therefore, the commission is delivered out of the hands of the Executive and his agents, it is not his deed. He may withhold or cancel it at pleasure, as he might his private deed in the same situation. The Constitution intended that the three great branches of the government should be coordinate, and independent of each other. As to acts, therefore, which are to be done by either, it has given no control to another branch. A judge, I presume, cannot sit on a bench without a commission, or a record of a commission; and the Constitution having given to the Judiciary branch no means of compelling the Executive either to deliver a commission, or to make a record of it, shows that it did not intend to give the Judiciary that control over the Executive, but that it should remain in the power of the latter to do it or not. Where different branches have to act in their respective lines, finally and without appeal, under any law, they may give to it different and opposite constructions. Thus, in the case of William Smith, the House of Representatives determined he was a citizen; and in the case of William Duane (precisely the same in every material circumstance), the judges determined he was no citizen. In the cases of Callender and some others, the judges determined the Sedition Act was valid under the Constitution, and exercised their regular powers of sentencing them to fine and imprisonment. But the Executive determined that the Sedition Act was a nullity under the Constitution, and exercised his regular power of prohibiting the execution of the sentence, or rather of executing the real law, which protected the acts of the defendants. From these different constructions of the same act by different branches, less mischief arises than from giving to any one of them a control over the others. The Executive and Senate act on the construction, that until delivery from the Executive department, a commission is in their possession, and within their rightful power; and in cases of commissions not revocable at will, where, after the Senate's approbation and the President's signing and sealing, new information of the unfitness of the person has come to hand before the delivery of the commission, new nominations have been made and approved, and new commissions have issued. On this construction I have hitherto acted; on this I shall ever act, and maintain it with the powers of the government, against any control which may be attempted by the judges, in subversion of the independence of the Executive and Senate within their peculiar department. I presume, therefore, that in a case where our decision is by the Constitution the supreme one, and that which can be carried into effect, it is the constitutionally authoritative one, and that that by the judges was coram non judge, and unauthorized, because it cannot be carried into effect. I have long wished for a proper occasion to have the gratuitous opinion in Marbury vs. Madison brought before the public, and denounced as not law; and I think the present a fortunate one, because it occupies such a place in the public attention. I should be glad, therefore, if, in noticing that case, you could take occasion to express the determination of the Executive, that the doctrines of that case were given extra-judicially and against law, and that their reverse will be the rule of action with the Executive.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 84. FORD ED., ix, 53. (W., June 1807.)

5050. MARIE ANTOINETTE, Character.—This angel, as gaudily painted in the rhapsodies of the Rhetor Burke, with some smartness of fancy, but no good sense, was proud, disdainful of restraint, indignant at all obstacles to her will, eager in the pursuit of pleasure, and firm enough to hold to her desires, or perish in their wreck.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 101. FORD ED., i, 140. (1821.)

5051. ———. She is capricious like her brother, and governed by him; devoted to pleasure and expense; and not remarkable for any other vices or virtues.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 154. FORD ED., iv, 393. (P., 1787.)

5052. ———. It may be asked what is the Queen disposed to do in the present situation of things? Whatever rage, pride and fear can dictate in a breast which never knew the presence of one moral restraint.—To JOHN JAY. iii, 118. (P., Sep. 1789.)

5053. MARIE ANTOINETTE, Extravagance.—Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review * * * the enormous expenses of the Queen, the princes and the Court.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

5054. MARIE ANTOINETTE, Gambling.—Her inordinate gambling and dissipations, with those of the Count d'Artois and others of her clique, had been a sensible item in the exhaustion of the treasury.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 101. FORD ED., i, 140. (1821.)

5055. MARIE ANTOINETTE, Reform.—The exhaustion of the treasury called into action the reforming hand of the nation; and her opposition to it, her inflexible perverseness and dauntless spirit, led herself to the guillotine, drew the King on with her, and plunged the world into crimes and calamities which will forever stain the pages of modern history.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 101. FORD ED., i, 140. (1821.)

5056. MARIE ANTOINETTE, The Revolution and.—I have ever believed, that had there been no Queen, there would have been no Revolution. No force would have been provoked, nor exercised. The King would have gone hand in hand with the wisdom of his sounder counsellors, who, guided by the increased lights of the age, wished only, with the same pace, to advance the principles of their social constitution.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 101. FORD ED., i, 140. (1821.)

5057. MARINE HOSPITALS, Establishment of.—With respect to marine hospitals, I presume you know that such establishments have been made by the General Government in the several States, that a portion of seamen's wages is drawn for their support, and the Government furnishes what is deficient. Mr. Gallatin is attentive to them, and they will grow with our growth.—To JAMES RONALDSON. vi, 92. FORD ED., ix, 371. (M., Jan. 1813.)

— MARINE LEAGUE.—See 1335.

5058. MARITIME LAW, Violation of.—A statement of the conduct of Great Britain towards this country, so far as respects the violations of the Maritime Law of nations [must be laid before Congress]. Here it would be necessary to state each distinct principle violated, and to quote the cases of violation, and to conclude with a view of her vice-admiralty courts, their venality and rascality, in order to show that however for conveniences (and not of right) the court of the captor is admitted to exercise the jurisdiction, yet that in so palpable an abuse of that trust, some remedy must be applied.—To CAESAR A. RODNEY. v, 200. FORD ED., ix, 144. (W., Oct. 1807.)

5059. MARKETS, Access to.—It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions, or for our due share in the transportation of them; but to our own means of independence, and the firm will to use them.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 650. FORD ED., vi, 483. (Dec. 1793.)

5060. MARKETS, British.—It is but too true, that Great Britain furnishes markets for three-fourths of the exports of the eight northernmost States,—a truth not proper to be spoken of, but which should influence our proceedings with them.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 406. FORD ED., iv, 85. (P., 1785.)

5061. MARKETS, Exclusion from.—Let them [the British] not think to exclude us from going to other markets to dispose of those commodities which they cannot use, nor to supply those wants which they cannot supply.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 142. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

5062. ———. Besides the duties * * * [the acts of Parliament] impose on our articles of export and import they prohibit our going to any markets northward of Cape Finisterre, in the Kingdom of Spain, for the sale of commodities which great Britain will not take from us, and for the purchase of others, with which she cannot supply us; and that, for no other than the arbitrary purpose of purchasing for themselves, by a sacrifice of our rights and interests, certain privileges in their commerce with an allied State, who, in confidence, that their exclusive trade with America will be continued, while the principles and power of the British Parliament be the same, have indulged themselves in every exorbitance which their avarice could dictate or our necessity extort; have raised their commodities called for in America, to the double and treble of what they sold for, before such exclusive privileges were given them, and of what better commodities of the same kind would cost us elsewhere; and, at the same time, give us much less for what we carry thither, than might be had at more convenient ports.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 128. FORD ED., i, 433. (1774.)

5063. — —. These acts [of Parliament] prohibit us from carrying, in quest of other purchasers, the surplus of our tobaccos, remaining after the consumption of Great Britain is supplied; so that we must leave them with the British merchant for whatever he will please to allow us, to be by him re-shipped to foreign markets, where he will reap the benefits of making sale of them for full value.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 129. FORD ED., i, 433. (1774.)

5064. MARKETS, Extension of.—The mass of our countrymen being interested in agriculture, I hope I do not err in supposing that in a time of profound peace, as the present, to enable them to adopt their productions to the market, to point out markets for them, and endeavor to obtain favorable terms of reception, is within the line of my duty.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 139. FORD ED., iv, 378. (1787.)

5065. MARKETS, Fish oil.—The duty on whale oil [in the British markets] amounts to a prohibition. This duty was originally laid on all foreign fish oil with a view to favor the British and American fisheries. When we became independent, and of course foreign to Great Britain, we became subject to the foreign duty. No duty, therefore, which France may think proper to lay on this article, can drive it to the English market. It could only oblige the inhabitants of Nantucket to abandon their fishery. But the poverty of their soil, offering them no other resource, they must quit their country, and either establish themselves in Nova Scotia, where, as British fishermen, they may participate of the British premium in addition to the ordinary price of their whale oil, or they must accept the conditions which this government offers for the establishment they have proposed at Dunkirk. Your Excellency will judge what conditions may counterbalance in their minds the circumstances of the vicinity of Nova Scotia, sameness of language, laws, religion, customs and kindred. Remaining in their native country, to which they are most singularly attached, excluded from commerce with England, taught to look to France as the only country from which they can derive sustenance, they will in case of war become useful rovers against its enemies. Their position, their poverty, their courage, their address, and their hatred will render them formidable scourges on the British commerce.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 312. (P., 1787.)

5066. — —. You have heard of the Arret of September 28th [1788] excluding foreign whale oils from the ports of this country [France]. I have obtained the promise of an explanatory Arret to declare that that of September 28th was not meant to extend to us. Orders are accordingly given in the ports to receive ours, and the Arret will soon be published. This places us on a better footing than ever, as it gives us a monopoly of this market in conjunction with the French fishermen.—To THOMAS PAINE. ii, 549. (P., 1788.)

5067. — —. You recollect well the Arret of December 29th, 1787, in favor of our commerce, and which, among other things, gave free admission to our whale oil, under a duty of about two louis a ton. In consequence of the English treaty, their oils flowed in and overstocked the market. The light duty they were liable to under the treaty, still lessened by false estimates and aided by the high premiums of the British government, enabled them to undersell the French and American oils. This produced an outcry of the Dunkirk fishery. It was proposed to exclude all European oils, which would not infringe the British treaty. I could not but encourage this idea, because it would give to the French and American fisheries a monopoly of the French market. The Arret was so drawn up; but, in the very moment of passing it, they struck out the word European, so that our oils became involved.

* * * As soon as it was known to me I wrote to Monsieur de Montmorin, and had conferences with him and the other ministers. * * * An immediate order was given for the present admission of our oils. * * * It was observed that if our States would prohibit all foreign oils from being imported into them, it would be a great safeguard, and an encouragement to them to continue the admission.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 538. (P., 1788.)

5068. — —. The Arret of September 28th [1788], to comprehend us with the English, in the exclusion of whale oil from their ports * * * would be a sentence of banishment to the inhabitants of Nantucket, and there is no doubt they would have removed to Nova Scotia or England, in preference to any other part of the world.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 551. (P., 1788.)

5069. — —. This branch of commerce [whale oils] * * * will be on a better footing than ever as enjoying jointly with the French oil, a monopoly of the French markets.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 513. (P., 1788.)

5070. — —. The English began [in 1787] to deluge the markets of France with their whale oils; and they were enabled, by the great premiums given by their government, to undersell the French fisherman, aided by feebler premiums, and the American, aided by his poverty alone. Nor is it certain that these speculations were not made at the risk of the British government, to suppress the French and American fishermen in their only market. Some remedy seemed necessary. Perhaps it would not have been a bad one to subject, by a general law, the merchandise of every nation, and of every nature, to pay additional duties in the ports of France, exactly equal to the premiums and drawbacks given on the same merchandise by their own government. This might not only counteract the effect of premiums in the instance of whale oils, but attack the whole British system of bounties and drawbacks, five-eighths of our whale oil, and two-thirds of our salted fish, they take from us one-fourth of our tobacco, three-fourths of our live stock, * * * a considerable and growing portion of our rice, great supplies, occasionally, of other grain; in 1789, which, indeed, was extraordinary, four millions of bushels of wheat, and upwards of a million of bushels of rye and barley * * * and nearly the whole carried in our own vessels. They are a free market now, and will, in time, be a valuable one for ships and ship timber, potash and peltry.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 551. (1791.)

5071. ——. France is the only country which can take our surplus, and they take principally of the common oil; as the habit is but commencing with them of a just value to spermaceti whale. Some of this, however, finds its vent there. There was, indeed, a particular interest perpetually soliciting the exclusion of our oils from their markets. The late government there saw well that what we should lose thereby would be gained by others, not by themselves. And we are to hope that the present government, as wise and friendly, will also view us, not as rivals, but as cooperators against a common rival (England). Friendly arrangements with them, and accommodation to mutual interest, rendered easier by friendly dispositions existing on both sides, may long secure to us this important resource for our seamen. Nor is it the interest of the fisherman alone which calls for the cultivation of friendly arrangements with that nation; besides by the aid of which they make London the centre of commerce for the earth. A less general remedy, but an effectual one, was to prohibit the oils of all European nations; the treaty with England requiring only that she should be treated as well as the most favored European nation. But the remedy adopted was to prohibit all oils, without exception.—TO COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 520. (P., 1788.)

5072. ——. England is the market for the greatest part of our spermaceti oil. They impose on all our oils a duty of eighteen pounds five shillings sterling the ton, which, as to the common kind, is a prohibition, * * * and as to the spermaceti, gives a preference of theirs over ours to that amount, so as to leave, in the end, but a scanty benefit to the fishermen; and, not long since, by a change of construction, without any change of law, it was made to exclude our oils from their ports, when carried in our vessels. On some change of circumstance, it was construed back again to the reception of our oils, on paying always, however, the same duty of eighteen pounds five shillings. This serves to show that the tenure by which we hold the admission of this commodity in their markets, is as precarious as it is hard. Nor can it be announced that there is any disposition on their part to arrange this or any other commercial matter to mutual convenience.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 552. (1791.)

5074. MARKETS, Foreign.—We have hitherto respected the indecision of Spain [with respect to the navigation of the Mississippi], * * * because our western citizens have had vent at home for their productions. A surplus of production begins now to demand foreign markets. Whenever they shall say, "We cannot, we will not, be longer shut up", the United States will be reduced to the following dilemma: 1. To force them to acquiescence. 2. To separate from them rather than take part in a war against Spain. 3. Or to preserve them in our Union, by joining them in the war. * * * The third is the alternative we must adopt.—INSTRUCTIONS TO WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ix, 412. FORD ED., v, 226. (1790.)

5075. ——. Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are either necessities of life, or materials for manufacture, or convenient subjects of revenue; and we take in exchange, either manufactures, when they have received the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market. Customers, too, whose demands, increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 646. FORD ED., vi, 479. (Dec. 1793.)

5076. MARKETS, Fostering.—The way to encourage purchasers is to multiply their means of payment.—TO COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 529. (P., 1788.)

5077. MARKETS, French.—No two countries are better calculated for the exchanges of commerce. France wants rice, tobacco, potash, furs, and ship-timber. We want wines, brandies, oils, and manufactures.—TO COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 390. (P., 1785.)

5078. ——. If American produce can be brought into the ports of France, the articles of exchange for it will be taken in those ports; and the only means of drawing it hither is to let the merchant see that he can dispose of it on better terms here than anywhere else. If the market price of this country does not in itself offer this superiority, it may be worthy of consideration.

whether it should be obtained by such abatements of duties, and even by such other encouragements as the importance of the article may justify. Should some loss attend this in the beginning, it can be discontinued when the trade shall be well established in this channel.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. i, 597. FORD ED., iv, 256. (P., 1786.)

5079. ——. I have laid my shoulder to the opening the markets of France to our produce, and rendering its transportation a nursery for our seamen.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 536. FORD ED., v, 58. (P., 1788.)

5080. ——. I very much fear that France will experience a famine this summer. The effects of this admit of no calculation. Grain is the thing for us now to cultivate. The demand will be immense, and the price high. I think cases were shown us that to sell it before the spring is an immense sacrifice. I fear we shall experience a want of vessels to carry our produce to Europe. In this case the tobacco will be left, because bread is more essential to them.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi, 241. (Pa., May 1793.)

5081. MARKETS, French Asiatic.—Article 13 of the Arret gives us the privileges and advantages of native subjects in all the French possessions in Asia, and in the scales leading thereto. This expression means at present the Isles of France and Bourbon, and will include the Cape of Good Hope, should any future event put it into the hands of France. It was with a view to this that I proposed the expression, because we were then in hourly expectation of a war, and it was suspected that France would take possession of that place. It will, in no case, be considered as including anything westward of the Cape of Good Hope. I must observe further, on this article, that it will only become valuable on the suppression of their East India Company; because as long as their monopoly continues, even native subjects cannot enter their Asiatic ports for the purposes of commerce. It is considered, however, as certain that this company will be immediately suppressed.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 343. (P., 1787.)

5082. MARKETS, Fur.—The fur trade is an object of desire in this country [France]. London is at present their market for furs. They pay for them there in ready money. Could they draw their furs into their own ports from the United States they would pay us for them in productions. Nor should we lose by the change of market, since, though the French pay the London merchants in cash, those merchants pay us with manufactures. A very wealthy and well connected company is proposing here to associate themselves with an American company, each to possess half the interest, and to carry on the fur trade between the two countries. The company here expect to make the principal part of the advances; they also are soliciting considerable indulgences from this government from which the part of the company on our side of the water will reap half the advantage. As no exclusive idea enters into this scheme, it appears to me worthy of encouragement. It is hoped the government here will interest themselves for its success. If they do, one of two things may happen: either the English will be afraid to stop the vessels of a company consisting partly of French subjects, and patronized by the Court; in which case the commerce will be laid open generally; or if they stop the vessels, the French company, which is strongly connected with men in power, will complain in form to their government, who may thus be interested as principals in the rectification of this abuse. As yet, however, the proposition has not taken such a form as to assure us that it will be prosecuted to this length.—To JOHN JAY. FORD ED., iv, 231. (P., 1786.)

5083. MARKETS, Home.—There can be no question, in a mind truly American, whether it is best to send our citizens and property into certain captivity, and then wage war for their recovery, or to keep them at home, and to turn seriously to that policy which plants the manufacturer and the husbandman side by side, and establishes at the door of every one that exchange of mutual labors and comforts, which we have hitherto sought in distant regions, and under perpetual risk of broils with them.—R. to A. N. Y. TAMMANY SOCIETY. viii, 127. (Feb. 1808.)

5084. ——. The advantages * * * of planting the consumer in our own soil by the side of the grower of produce, are so palpable, that no temporary suspension of injuries on England's part, or agreements founded on that, will now prevent our continuing in what we have begun [manufacturing].—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 456. (M., June 1809.)

5085. ——. The bringing our countrymen to a sound comparative estimate of the vast value of internal commerce, and the disproportionate importance of what is foreign, is the most salutary effort which can be made for the prosperity of these States, which are entirely misled from their true interests by the infection of English prejudices, and illicit attachments to English interests and connections.—To DR. THOMAS COOPER. vi, 294. (M., 1814.)

5086. MARKETS, Land.—The long succession of years of stunted crops, of reduced prices, the general prostration of the farming business, under levies for the support of manufacturers, &c., with the calamitous fluctuations of value in our proper medium, have kept agriculture in a state of abject depression, which has peopled the Western States by silently breaking up those on the Atlantic, and glutted the land market, while it drew off its bidders. In such a state of things, property has lost its character of being a resource for debts. Highland in Bedford, which, in the days of our plethory, sold readily for from fifty to one hundred dollars

&c., are as yet very imperfectly understood. I am myself an empiric in natural philosophy, suffering my faith to go no further than my facts. I am pleased, however, to see the efforts of hypothetical speculation, because by the collisions of different hypotheses, truth may be elicited and science advanced in the end. This skeptical disposition does not permit me to say whether your hypothesis for looming and floating volumes of warm air occasionally perceived, may or may not be confirmed by future observations. More facts are yet wanting to furnish a solution on which we may rest with confidence. I even doubt as yet whether the looming at sea and on land is governed by the same laws.—To GEORGE F. HOPKINS. vii, 259. (M., 1822.) See CLIMATE.

— MICHIGANIA, Proposed State of.—See WESTERN TERRITORY.

5178. — — — Our militia are heroes when they have heroes to lead them on.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 420. FORD ED., ix, 504. (M., 1815.)

5179. MILITIA, Classification.—You will consider whether it would not be expedient, for a state of peace as well as of war, so to organize or class the militia, as would enable us, on any sudden emergency, to call for the services of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families. Upwards of three hundred thousand able bodied men, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-six years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offence or defence in any point where they may be wanted, and give time for raising regular forces after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active service, cannot but be desirable to our younger citizens, of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I cannot, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as, by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so, we may draw from it, when necessary, an efficient corps, fit for real and active service, and to be called to it in regular rotation.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 49. FORD ED., viii, 392. (Dec. 1805.)

5180. — — — A militia of young men will hold on until regulars can be raised, and will be the nursery which will furnish them.—To WILLIAM A. BURWELL. FORD ED., viii, 416. (W., 1806.)

5181. — — — A militia can never be used for distant service on any other plan; and Bonaparte will conquer the world, if they do not learn his secret of composing armies of young men only, whose enthusiasm and health enable them to surmount all obstacles.—To MR. BIDWELL. v, 16. (W., 1806.)

5182. — — — Convinced that a militia of all ages promiscuously are entirely useless for distant service, and that we never shall be safe until we have a selected corps for a year's distant service at least, the classification of our militia is now the most essential thing the United States have to do. Whether, on Bonaparte's plan of making a class for every year between certain periods, or that recommended in my message, I do not know, but I rather incline to his. The idea is not new, as you may remember we adopted it once in Virginia during the Revolution, but abandoned it too soon. It is the real secret of Bonaparte's success.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 76. FORD ED., ix, 49. (M., May 1807.)

5183. — — — The session before the last I proposed to the Legislature the classification of the militia, so that those in the prime of life only, and unburthened with families, should ever be called into distant service; and that every man should receive a stand of arms the first year he entered the militia. * * * It will prevail in time.—To MR. COXE. v, 58. (W., 1807.)

5184. — — — Against great land armies we cannot attempt defence but by equal armies. For these we must depend on a classified militia, which will give us the service of the class from twenty to twenty-six, in the nature of conscripts, comprising a body of about 250,000, to be specially trained. This measure, attempted at a former session, was pressed at the last, and might, I think, have been carried by a small majority. But considering that great innovations should not be forced on a slender majority, and seeing that the general opinion is sensibly rallying to it, it was thought better to let it lie over to the next session, when, I trust, it will be passed.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. v, 281. FORD ED., ix, 194. (W., May 1808.)

5185. — — — In the beginning of our government we were willing to introduce the least coercion possible on the will of the citizen. Hence a system of military duty was established too indulgent to his indolence. This [war] is the first opportunity we have had of trying it, and it has completely failed; an issue foreseen by many, and for which remedies have been proposed. That of classing the militia according to age, and allotting each age to the particular kind of service to which it was competent, was proposed to Congress in 1805, and subsequently; and, on the last trial, was lost, I believe, by a single vote. Had it prevailed, what has now happened would not have happened. Instead of burning our Capitol, we should have possessed theirs in Montreal and Quebec. We must now adopt it, and all will be safe.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 379. (M., 1814.)

5186. MILITIA, Comfort of.—The soldiers themselves will thank you, when separated from domestic accommodation, they find themselves, through your attention to their comfort, provided with conveniences which will administer to their first wants.—LETTER TO COUNTY LIEUTENANTS. FORD ED., ii, 428. (R., 1781.)

5187. MILITIA, Commissions in.—The Executive, apprehending they have no authority to grant brevet commissions, refer to the General Assembly the expedience of authorizing them to give to this gentleman* a Lieutenant Colonel's commission by way of brevet.—To SPEAKER OF HOUSE OF DELEGATES. FORD ED., ii, 266. (Wg., 1779.)

5188. MILITIA, Compulsory service in.—We must train and classify the whole of our male citizens, and make military instruction a regular part of collegiate education. We can never be safe till this is done.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 131. (M., 1813.)

5189. — — — I think the truth must now be obvious that our people are too happy at home to enter into regular service, and that we cannot be defended but by making every citizen a soldier, as the Greeks and Romans who had no standing armies; and that in doing this all must be marshalled, classed by their ages, and every service ascribed to its competent class.—To J. W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 484. (M., 1814.)

5190. MILITIA, Crimes and punishments.—Any officer or soldier, guilty of mutiny, desertion, disobedience of command, absence from duty or quarters, neglect of guard, or cowardice, shall be punished at the discretion of a courtmartial by degrading, cashiering, drumming out of the army, whipping not exceeding twenty lashes, fine not exceeding two months, or imprisonment not exceeding one month.—INVASION BILL. FORD ED., ii, 127. (1777.)

5191. MILITIA, Defects in organization.—Congress have had too much experience of the radical defects and inconveniences of militia service to need my enumerating them.—To THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 277. (Wg., 1779.)

be relied on for lengthy service, and out of their own country.—To NORTH CAROLINA ASSEMBLY. FORD ED., ii, 480. (R., 1781.)

5193. — — — We hope it will be the last time we shall have occasion to require our militia to go out of their own country, as we think it most advisable to put that distant, disagreeable service on our regulars, * * * and to employ our militia on service in our own country.—To COLONEL ABRAHAM PENN. FORD ED., iii, 29. (R., 1781.)

5194. — — — I am sensible it is much more practicable to carry on a war with militia within our own country [State] than out of it.—To MAJOR GENERAL GREENE. FORD ED., iii, 2. (R., 1781.)

5195. — — — The law of a former session of Congress, for keeping a body of 100,000 militia in readiness for service at a moment's warning, is still in force. * * * When called into action, it will not be for a lounging, but for an active, and perhaps distant, service.*—To THE GOVERNOR OF OHIO. v, 51. FORD ED., ix, 34. (W., March 1807.)

5196. — — — If the marching of the militia into an enemy's country be once ceded as unconstitutional (which I hope it never will be), then will [the British] force [in Canada], as now strengthened, bid us permanent defiance.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 131. (M., June 1813.)

5197. — — — Abolish, by a declaratory law, the doubts which abstract scruples in some, and cowardice and treachery in others, have conjured up about passing imaginary lines, and limiting, at the same time, the services of the militia to the contiguous provinces of the enemy.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 391. FORD ED., ix, 489. (M., Oct. 1814.)

— MILITIA, Draft law.—See DRAFT.

5198. MILITIA, Employment of.—I must desire that, so far as the agency of the militia be employed, it may be with the utmost discretion, and with no act of force beyond what shall be necessary to maintain obedience to the laws, using neither deeds nor words unnecessarily offensive.—To CHARLES SIMMS. v, 418. (W., Jan. 1809.)

5199. MILITIA, Enrolment.—For making provision against invasions and insurrections, and laying the burthen equally upon all * * * the commanding officer of every county * * * shall enroll under some captain such persons * * * as ought to make a part of the militia, who together with those before enrolled, and not yet formed into tenths * * * shall by such captain * * * be divided into equal parts, as nearly as may be, each part to be distinguished by fair and equal lot by numbers from one to ten, and when so distinguished, to be added to and make part of the militia of the county. Where any person * * * shall not attend,

* The Governors of Kentucky, Tennessee and Mississippi Territory were also urged to furnish volunteers.—EDITOR.

or shall refuse to draw for himself, the captain shall cause his lot to be drawn for him.—INVASION BILL. FORD ED., ii, 123. (1777.)

5200. MILITIA, Equalization of duty.—As militia duty becomes heavy, it becomes our duty to divide it equally.—To GENERAL NELSON. FORD ED., ii, 464. (R., 1781.)

5201. — —. Where any county shall have sent but half the quota called for, they have performed but half their tour, and ought to be called on again. Where any county has furnished their full complement, they have performed their full tour, and it would be unjust to call on them again till we have gone through the counties. Militia becoming burthensome, it is our duty to divide it as equally as we can.—To COLONEL JAMES INNES. FORD ED., ii, 465. (R., 1781.)

5202. — —. The spirit of disobedience * * * in your county must be subdued. Laws made by common consent must not be trampled on by individuals. It is very much [to] the [public] good to force the unworthy into their due share of contributions to the public support, otherwise the burthen on [the worthy] will become oppressive indeed.—To COLONEL VANMETER. FORD ED., iii, 24. (R., 1781.)

5203. MILITIA, Expensive.—Whether it be practicable to raise and maintain a sufficient number of regulars to carry on the war, is a question. That it would be burthensome is undoubted, yet perhaps it is as certain that no possible mode of carrying it on can be so expensive to the public, so distressing and disgusting to individuals, as the militia.—To THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES. FORD ED., ii, 474. (R., 1781.)

5204. MILITIA, Improving.—We should at every session [of Congress] continue to amend the defects * * * in the laws for regulating the militia, until they are sufficiently perfect. Nor should we now or at any time separate, until we can say we have done everything for the militia which we could do were an enemy at our door.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 12. FORD ED., viii, 121. (Dec. 1801.)

5205. — —. Uncertain as we must ever be of the particular point in our circumference where an enemy may choose to invade us, the only force which can be ready at every point and competent to oppose them, is the body of neighboring citizens as formed into a militia. On these, collected from the parts most convenient, in numbers proportioned to the invading foe, it is best to rely, not only to meet the first attack, but if it threatens to be permanent, to maintain the defence until regulars may be engaged to relieve them.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 11. FORD ED., viii, 121. (Dec. 1801.)

5206. — —. Considering that our regular troops are employed for local purposes, and that the militia is our general reliance for great and sudden emergencies, you doubtless think this institution worthy of a review, and give it those improvements of which you find it susceptible.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 19. FORD ED., viii, 185. (Dec. 1802.)

5207. — —. In compliance with a request of the House of Representatives, as well as with a sense of what is necessary, I take the liberty of urging on you the importance and indispensable necessity of vigorous exertions, on the part of the State governments, to carry into effect the militia system adopted by the national Legislature, agreeable to the powers reserved to the States respectively, by the Constitution of the United States, and in a manner the best calculated to ensure such a degree of military discipline, and knowledge of tactics, as will under the auspices of a benign Providence, render the militia a sure and permanent bulwark of national defence.—To ——. iv, 469. (W., Feb. 1803.)

5208. — —. It is incumbent on us at every meeting, to revise the condition of the militia, and to ask ourselves if it is prepared to repel a powerful enemy at every point of our territories exposed to invasion. Some of the States have paid a laudable attention to this object; but every degree of neglect is to be found among others. Congress alone have power to produce a uniform state of preparation in this great organ of defence; the interests which they so deeply feel in their own and their country's security will present this as among the most important objects of their deliberation.—ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 108. FORD ED., ix, 223. (1808.)

5209. MILITIA, Maintenance of.—[The maintenance of] a well-disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1803.)

5210. MILITIA, Menial labor.—A militia of freemen cannot easily be induced to labor in works of that kind [building forts].—To THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES. FORD ED., iii, 36. (R., 1781.)

5211. MILITIA, Mutiny.—The precedent of a * * * mutiny would be so mischievous as to induce us to believe that an accommodation to their present temper [would be] most prudent.—To MAJOR-GENERAL STEUBEN. FORD ED., ii, 466. (R., Feb. 1781.)

5212. — —. The best way, perhaps, is not to go against the mutineers [militiamen] when embodied, which would bring on, perhaps, an open rebellion, or bloodshed most certainly; but, when they shall have dispersed, to go and take them out of their beds, singly and without noise; or, if they be not found, the first time, to go again and again, so that they may never be able to remain in quiet at home. This is what I must recommend to you and, therefore, furnish the 'bearers with the commissions as you desire.—To COLONEL VANMETER. FORD ED., iii, 25. (R., 1781.)

5213. MILITIA, Naval.—I send you a copy of the marine regulations of France. There are things in it which may become interesting to us; particularly, what relates to the establishment of a marine militia, and their classification.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 91. (P., 1787.)

5214. ———. I wish to consult you on a plan of a regular naval militia, to be composed of all our sea-faring citizens, to enable us to man a fleet speedily by supplying voluntary enlistments by calls on that militia.—To ROBERT SMITH. FORD ED., viii, 381. (W., Oct. 1805.)

5215. ———. I think it will be necessary to erect our sea-faring men into a naval militia, and subject them to tours of duty in whatever port they may be.—To GENERAL SMITH. v, 147. (W., July 1807.)

5216. ———. It is * * * material that the seaport towns should have artillery-militia duly trained * * *.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 191. (M., 1807.)

5217. ———. I think our naval militia plan, both as to name and structure, better for us than the English plan of Sea-fencibles.—To ROBERT SMITH. v, 234. (1808.)

5219. ———. Much will depend on the proper choice of officers.—INVASION CIRCULAR-LETTER. FORD ED., ii, 398. (R., 1781.)

5220. ———. The good of the service requires that the field officers at least be experienced in the service. For this reason, these will be provided for at the rendezvous. I beg that this may not be considered by the militia field officers [as arising] from want of respect to them. We know and confide in their zeal; but it cannot be disreputable to them to be less knowing in the art of war than those who have greater experience in it; and being less knowing, I am quite sure the spirit of patriotism, with which they are animated, will lead them to wish that measure to be adopted which will most promote the public safety, however it may tend to keep them from the post in which they would wish to appear in defence of their country.*—To COUNTY LIEUTENANTS. FORD ED., ii, 398. (R., 1781.)

5221. ———. I enclose you a charge against * * * [three militia officers], as having become members of an organized company, calling themselves the Tar Company, avowing their object to be the tarring and feathering citizens of some description. Although in some cases the animadversions of the law may be properly relied on to prevent what is unlawful, yet with those clothed with authority from the Executive, and being a part of the Executive, other preventives are expedient. These officers should be warned that the Executive cannot tamely look on and see its officers threaten to become the violators instead of the protectors of the rights of our citizens.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 383. (1808.)

5222. MILITIA, Payment of Ohio.—If we suffer the question of paying the [Ohio] militia embodied to be thrown on their Legislature, it will excite acrimonious debate in that body, and they will spread the same dissatisfaction among their constituents, and finally it will be forced back on us through Congress. Would it not, therefore, be better to say to Mr. Kirker, that the General Government is fully aware that emergencies which appertain to them will sometimes arise so suddenly as not to give time for consulting them, before the State must get into action; that the expenses in such cases, incurred on reasonable grounds, will be met by the General Government; and that in the present case [Burr's Conspiracy], although it appears there was no real ground for embodying the militia, and that more certain measures for ascertaining the truth should have been taken before embodying them yet an unwillingness to damp the public spirit of our countrymen, and the justice due to the individuals who came forward in defence of their country, and could not know the grounds on which they were called, have determined us to consider the call as justifiable, and to defray the expenses.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. v, 206. FORD ED., ix, 22. (W., Oct. 1807.)

5223. MILITIA, Public property and.—Be pleased to give the same notice to the militia as formerly, that no man will be ever discharged till he shall have returned whatever public arms or accoutrements he shall have received.—To BRIGADIER-GENERAL NELSON. FORD ED., ii, 396. (R., 1781.)

5224. MILITIA, Regular army and.—I am for relying for internal defence on our militia solely, till actual invasion.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

5225. ———. None but an armed nation can dispense with a standing army. To keep ours armed and disciplined, is therefore at all times important.—To ———. iv, 469. (W., 1803.)

5226. MILITIA, Security in.—For a people who are free, and who mean to remain so, a well organized and armed militia is their best security.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 108. FORD ED., ix, 223. (Nov. 1808.)

5227. MILITIA, Slaves and.—Slaves are by the law excluded from the militia, and wisely as to that part of a soldier's duty which consists in exercise of arms. But whether male slaves might not under proper regulations be subjected to the routine of duty as pioneers, and to other military labors, can only be determined by the wisdom of the Legislature.—To THE VA. HOUSE OF DELEGATES. FORD ED., iii, 36. (R., 1781.)

5228. MILITIA, Standing fire.—The scene of military operations has been hitherto so distant from these States that their militia are strangers to the actual presence of danger. Habit alone will enable them to view this with familiarity, to face it without dismay; a habit which must be purchased by calamity, but cannot be purchased too dear.—To THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 335. (R., 1780.)

5229. MILITIA, Subsistence of.—The present [British] invasion [of Virginia] having rendered it necessary to call into the field a large body of militia, the providing them with subsistence, and the means of transportation becomes an arduous task in the unorganized state of our military system. To effect this we are obliged to vest the heads of the Commissary's and Quartermaster's departments with such powers as, if abused, will be most afflictive to the people. Major General Steuben, taught by experience on similar occasions, has pressed on us the necessity of calling to the superintendence of these officers some gentleman of distinguished character and abilities, who, while he prescribes to them such rules as will effectually produce the object of their appointment, will yet stand between them and the people as a guard from oppression. * * * Under the exigency we have taken the liberty of casting our eyes on yourself as most likely to fulfill our wishes and, therefore, solicit your undertaking this charge.—To COLONEL RICHARD MEADE. FORD ED., ii, 400. (R., 1781.)

5230. MILITIA, Washington on use of.—In conversation with the President, and speaking about General [Nathaniel] Greene, he said that he and General Greene had always differed in opinion about the manner of using militia. Greene always placed them in his front; himself was of opinion they should always be used as a reserve to improve any advantage, for which purpose they were the finest fellows in the world. He said he was on the ground of the battle of Guilford, with a person who was in the action, and who explained the whole of it to him. That General Greene's front was behind a fence at the edge of a large field, through which the enemy were obliged to pass to get at them; and that in their passage through this, they must have been torn all to pieces, if troops had been posted there who would have stood their ground; and that the retreat from that position was through a thicket, perfectly secure. Instead of this, he posted the North Carolina militia there, who only gave one fire and fell back, so that the whole benefit of their position was lost. He thinks that the regulars, with their field pieces, would have hardly let a single man get through that field.—THE ANAS. ix, 146. FORD ED., i, 232. (1793.) See ARMY and WAR.

5231. MILITIA FOR LOUISIANA.—The spirit of this country is totally adverse to a large military force. I have tried for two sessions to prevail on the Legislature to let me plant thirty thousand well chosen volunteers on donation lands on the west side of the Mississippi, as a militia always at hand for the defence of New Orleans; but I have not yet succeeded.—To MR. CHANDLER PRICE. v, 47. (W., 1807.)

5232. ——. The defence of Orleans against a land army can never be provided for, according to the principles of the Constitution, till we can get a sufficient militia there.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 215. FORD ED., ix, 167. (Nov. 1807.)

5233. ——. A measure has now twice failed, which I have warmly urged, the immediate settlement by donation lands, of such a body of militia in the Territories of Orleans and Mississippi, as will be adequate to the defence of New Orleans.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. v, 281. (W., May 1808.)

5234. MIND, Body and.—If this period [youth] be suffered to pass in idleness, the mind becomes lethargic and impotent, as would the body it inhabits if unexercised during the same time. The sympathy between body and mind during their rise, progress and decline, is too strict and obvious to endanger our being misled while we reason from the one to the other.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 390. FORD ED., iii, 253. (1782.)

5235. MIND, Freedom of.—Almighty God hath created the mind free, and manifested His supreme will that free it shall remain by making it altogether insusceptible of restraint.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. viii, 454. FORD ED., ii, 227. (1779.)

5236. MIND, Influencing.—All attempts to influence [the mind] by temporal punishments, or burthens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet choose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his Almighty power to do, but to exalt it by its influence on reason alone.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. viii, 454. FORD ED., ii, 238. (1779.)

5237. MIND, Qualities of.—I estimate the qualities of the mind; 1, good humor; 2, integrity; 3, industry; 4, science. The preference of the first to the second quality may not at first be acquiesced in; but certainly we had all rather associate with a good-humored, light-principled man, than with an ill-tempered rigorist in morality.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 225. (W., 1808.)

5238. MINERALOGISTS IN AMERICA.—I have never known in the United States but one eminent mineralogist, who could have been engaged on hire. This was a Mr. Goudon from France, who came over to Philadelphia six or seven years ago.—To GOVERNOR NICHOLAS. vi, 588. (P.F., 1816.)

5239. MINERALOGY, Utility.—To learn * * * the ordinary arrangement of the different strata of minerals in the earth, to know from their habitual collocations and proximities, where we find one mineral; whether another, for which we are seeking, may be expected to be in its neighborhood, is useful. But the dreams about the modes of creation, enquiries whether our globe has been formed by the agency of fire or water, how many millions of years it has cost Vulcan or Neptune to produce what the fiat of the Creator would effect by a single act of will, is too idle to be worth a single hour of any man's life.—To DR. JOHN P. EMMETT. vii, 443. (M., 1826.)

5240. MINES, Federal Government and.—I am afraid we know too little as yet of the lead mines to establish a permanent system. I verily believe that of leasing will be far the best for the United States. But it will take time to find out what rent may be reserved, so as to enable the lessee to compete with those who work mines in their own right, and yet have an encouraging profit for themselves. Having on the spot two such men as Lewis and Bates, in whose integrity and prudence unlimited confidence may be placed, would it not be best to confide to them the whole business of leasing and regulating the management of our interests, recommending to them short leases, at first, till themselves shall become thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and shall be able to reduce the management to a system, which the government may then approve and adhere to? I think one article of it should be that the rent shall be paid in metal, not in mineral, so that we may have nothing to do with works which will always be mismanaged, and reduce our concern to a simple rent. We shall lose more by ill-managed smelting works than the digging the ore is worth. Then, it would be better that our ore remained in the earth than in a storehouse, and consequently we give nine-tenths of the ore for nothing. These thoughts are merely for your consideration.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 210. (Nov. 1807.)

5241. — — — It is not merely a question about the terms we have to consider, but the expediency of working them.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 290. (M., 1808.)

5242. — — — I received your favor covering an offer * * * of an iron mine to the public, and I thank you for * * * making the communication * * *. But having always observed that public works are much less advantageously managed than they are by private hands, I have thought it better for the public to go to market for whatever it wants which is to be found there; for there competition brings it down to the minimum of value. I have no doubt we can buy brass cannon at market cheaper than we could make iron ones. I think it material, too, not to abstract the high executive officers from those functions which nobody else is charged to carry on, and to employ them in superintending works which are going on abundantly in private hands. Our predecessors went on different principles; they bought iron mines, and sought for copper ones. We own a mine at Harper's Ferry of the finest iron ever put into a cannon, which we are afraid to attempt to work. We have rented it heretofore, but it is now without a tenant.—To Mr. BIBB. v, 326. (M., July 1808.)

5243. MINES, Silver.—I enclose for your information the account of a silver mine to fill your treasury.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 245. (1808.)

5244. — — — With respect to the silver mine on the Platte, 1700 miles from St. Louis, I will observe that in the present state of things between us and Spain, we could not propose to make an establishment at that distance from all support. It is interesting, however, that the knowledge of its position should be preserved, which can be done either by confiding it to the government, who will certainly never make use of it without an honorable compensation for the discovery to yourself or your representatives, or by placing it wherever you think safest.—To ANTHONY G. BETTAY. v, 246. (W., 1808.)

5245. MINES, Virginia lead.—We take the liberty of recommending the lead mines to you as an object of vast importance. We great an extent. Considered as, perhaps, the think it impossible they can be worked to too sole means of supporting the American cause, they are inestimable. As an article of commerce to our Colony, too, they will be valuable; and even the wagonage, if done either by the Colony or individuals belonging to it, will carry to it no trifling sum of money.*—To GOVERNOR PATRICK HENRY. FORD ED., ii, 67. (July 1776.)

5246. MINISTERS (Foreign), Appointment and grade.—The Constitution having declared that the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, the President desired my opinion whether the Senate has a right to negative the grade he may think it expedient to use in a foreign mission as well as the person to be appointed. I think the Senate has no right to negative the grade. The Constitution has divided the powers of government into three branches, Legislative, Executive and Judiciary, lodging each with a distinct magistracy. The Legislative it has given completely to the Senate and House of Representatives. It has declared that the Executive powers shall be vested in the President, submitting only special articles of it to a negative by the Senate, and it has vested the Judiciary power in the courts of justice, with certain exceptions also in favor of the Senate. The transaction of business with foreign nations is Executive altogether. It belongs, then, to the head of that department, except as to such portions of it as are specially submitted to the Senate. Exceptions are to be construed strictly. The Constitution itself indeed has taken care to circumscribe this one within very strict limits; for it gives the nomination of the foreign agents to the President, the appointments to him and the Senate jointly, and the commissioning to the President. This analysis calls our attention to the strict import of each term. To nominate must be to propose. Appointment seems that act of the will which constitutes or makes the agent, and the commission is the public evidence of it. But there are still other acts previous to these not specially enumerated in the Constitution, to wit: 1st. The destination of a mission to the particular country where the public service calls for it, and 2nd.

* A note in the FORD EDITION says this paper was evidently intended to be signed by the whole Virginia delegation.—EDITOR.

the character or grade to be employed in it. The natural order of all these is first, destination; second, grade; third, nomination; fourth, appointment; fifth, commission. If appointment does not comprehend the neighboring acts nomination or commission (and the Constitution says it shall not, by giving them exclusively to the President), still less can it pretend to comprehend those previous and more remote, of destination and grade. The Constitution, analyzing the three last, shows they do not comprehend the two first. The fourth is the only one it submits to the Senate. Shaping it into a right to say that "A or B is unfit to be appointed". Now, this cannot comprehend a right to say that A or B is indeed fit to be appointed, but the grade fixed on is not the fit one to employ, or, "our connections with the country of his destination are not such as to call for any mission". The Senate is not supposed by the Constitution to be acquainted with the concerns of the Executive Department. It was not* intended that these should be communicated to them, nor can they, therefore, be qualified to judge of the necessity which calls for a mission to any particular place, or of the particular grade, more or less marked, which special and secret circumstances may call for. All this is left to the President. They are only to see that no unfit person be employed. It may be objected that the Senate may by continual negatives on the person, do what amounts to a negative on the grade, and so, indirectly, defeat this right of the President. But this would be a breach of trust; an abuse of the power confided to the Senate, of which that body cannot be supposed capable. So the President has power to convoke the Legislature, and the Senate might defeat that power by refusing to come. This equally amounts to a negative on the power of convoking. Yet nobody will say they possess such a negative, or would be capable of usurping it by such oblique means. If the Constitution had meant to give the Senate a negative on the grade, or destination, as well as on the person, it would have said so in direct terms, and not left it to be effected by a sidewind. It could never mean to give them the use of one power through the abuse of another.—OPINION ON POWERS OF THE SENATE. vii, 465. FORD ED., v, 161. (1790.)

5247. ——. The Secretary of State recapitulated [to a committee of the Senate] the circumstances which justified the President's having continued the grade of Minister Plenipotentiary [at The Hague]; but added, that whenever the biennial bill should come on, each House would have a constitutional right to review the establishment again, and whenever it should appear that either House thought any part of it might be reduced, on giving to the Executive time to avail themselves of the first convenient occasion to reduce it, the Executive could not but do it; but that it would be extremely injurious * * * to do it so abruptly as to occasion the recall of ministers, or unfriendly sensations in any of those countries with which our commerce is interesting.—THE ANAS. ix, 422. FORD ED., i, 172. (January 1792.)

5248. ——. After mature consideration and consultation, I am of opinion that the Constitution has made the President the sole competent judge to what places circumstances render it expedient that ambassadors, or other public ministers, should be sent, and of what grade they should be; and that it has ascribed to the Senate no executive act but the single one of giving or withholding their consent to the person nominated. I think it my duty, therefore, to protest, and do protest against the validity of any resolutions of the Senate asserting or implying any right in that House to exercise any executive authority, but the single one before mentioned.—PARAGRAPH FOR PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE. FORD ED., v, 415. (1792.)

5249. MINISTERS (Foreign), Exchange of.—I doubt whether it be honorable for us to keep anybody at London unless they keep some person at New York.—TO W. S. SMITH. ii, 284. (P., 1787.)

5250. ——. The President * * * authorized Mr. Gouverneur Morris to enter into conference with the British ministers in order to discover their sentiments on the exchange of a minister. The letters of Mr. Morris * * * [to the President] state the communications, oral and written, which have passed between him and the ministers; and from these the Secretary of State draws the following inference: That * * * their Secretary for Foreign Affairs is disposed to exchange a minister, but meets with opposition in his Cabinet, so as to render the issue uncertain. The Secretary of State is of opinion that Mr. Morris's letters remove any doubts which might have been entertained as to the intentions and dispositions of the British Cabinet; that it would be dishonorable to the United States, useless and even injurious, to renew the propositions for * * * the exchange of a minister, and that this subject should now remain dormant, till it shall be brought forward earnestly by them.—OFFICIAL REPORT. vii, 517. FORD ED., v, 261. (December 1790.)

5251. ——. You have placed the British proposition of exchanging a minister on proper ground. It must certainly come from them, and come in unequivocal form. With those who respect their own dignity so much, ours must not be counted at naught. On their own proposal formally, to exchange a minister we sent them one. They have taken no notice of that, and talk of agreeing to exchange one now, as if the idea were new. Besides, what they are saying to you, they are talking to us through Quebec; but so informally, that they may disavow it when they please.—TO GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 182. FORD ED., v, 224. (N. Y., Aug. 1790.)

5252. MINISTERS (Foreign). Extraordinary expenses.—With respect to the extraordinary expenses which you may be under the necessity of incurring at the coronation, I am not authorized to give any advice. * * * I should certainly suppose that the representative of the United States at Madrid, was to do as the representatives of other sovereignties do, and that it would be viewed as the compliment of our nation and not of its minister. If this be the true point of view, it proves at whose expense it should be.—TO WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. FORD ED., v, 125. (P., 1789.)

5253. MINISTERS (Foreign), Outfit of.—When Congress made their first appointments of ministers to be resident in Europe, I have understood (for I was not then in Congress) that they allowed them all their expenses, and a fixed sum over and above for their time. Among their expenses was necessarily understood their outfit. Afterwards they thought proper to give them fixed salaries of eleven thousand one hundred and eleven dollars and one-ninth a year; and again by a resolution of May the 6th and 8th, 1784, the "salaries" of their ministers at foreign courts were reduced to nine thousand dollars, to take place on the 1st of August ensuing. On the 7th of May, I was appointed in addition to Mr. Adams and Dr. Franklin, for the negotiation of treaties of commerce; but this appointment being temporary, for two years only, and not as of a resident minister, the article of outfit did not come into question. I asked an advance of six months' salary, that I might be in cash to meet the first expenses, which was ordered. The year following I was appointed to succeed Dr. Franklin at this court [France]. This was the first appointment of a minister resident, since the original ones, under which all expenses were to be paid. So much of the ancient regulation as respected annual expenses had been altered to a sum certain; so much of it as respected first expenses, or outfit, remained unaltered; and I might, therefore, expect that the actual expenses for outfit were to be paid. When I prepared my account for settlement with Mr. Barclay, I began a detail of the articles of clothing, carriage, horses, and household furniture. I found they were numerous, minute, and incapable from their nature of being vouched; and often entered in my memorandum book under a general head only, so that I could not specify them. I found they would exceed a year's salary. Supposing, therefore, that mine being the first case, Congress would make a precedent of it, and prefer a sum fixed for the outfit as well as the salary, I have charged it in my account at a year's salary; presuming that there can be no question that an outfit is a reasonable charge. It is the usage here (and I suppose at all courts), that a minister resident shall establish his house in the first instant. If this is to be done out of his salary, he will be a twelvemonth, at least, without a copper to live on. It is the universal practice, therefore, of all nations to allow the outfit as a separate article from the salary. I have enquired here into the usual amount of it. I find that sometimes the sovereign pays the actual cost. This is particularly the case of the Sardinian ambassador now coming here, who is to provide a service of plate, and every article of furniture and other matters of first expense, to be paid for by his court. In other instances, they give a service of plate, and a fixed sum for all other articles, which fixed sum is in no case lower than a year's salary. I desire no service of plate, having no ambition for splendor. My furniture, carriage and apparel are all plain, yet they have cost me more than a year's salary. I suppose that in every country, and in every condition of life, a year's expense would be found a moderate measure for the furniture of a man's house. It is not more certain to me that the sun will rise tomorrow, than that our government must allow the outfit on their future appointment of foreign ministers; and it would be hard on me so to stand between the discontinuance of a former rule, and institution of a future one, as to have the benefit of neither.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 401. (P., 1788.)

5254. — —. The outfit given to ministers resident to enable them to furnish their house, but given by no nation to a temporary minister, who is never expected to take a house or to entertain, but considered on the footing of a voyageur, our predecessors gave to their extraordinary ministers by the wholesale. In the beginning of our administration, among other articles of reformation in expense, it was determined not to give an outfit to ministers extraordinary, and not to incur the expense with any minister of sending a frigate to carry or bring him. The Boston happened to be going to the Mediterranean, and was permitted, therefore, to take up Mr. Livingston, and touch in a port of France. A frigate was denied to Charles Pinckney, and has been refused to Mr. King for his return. Mr. Madison's friendship and mine to you being so well known, the public will have eagle eyes to watch if we grant you any indulgences out of the general rule; and on the other hand, the example set in your case [as Minister Extraordinary to France] will be more cogent on future ones, and produce greater approbation to our conduct. The allowance, therefore, will be in this, and all similar cases, all the expenses of your journey and voyage, taking a ship's cabin to yourself, nine thousand dollars a year from your leaving home till the proceedings of your mission are terminated, and then the quarter's salary for the expenses of your return, as prescribed by law.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 455. FORD ED., viii, 191. (W., 1803.)

5255. MINISTERS (Foreign), Privileges.—Legal provision should be made for protecting and vindicating those privileges and immunities to which foreign ministers, and others attending on Congress are entitled by the law of nations.—CONGRESS RESOLUTION. FORD ED., iii, 463. (April 1784.)

5256. — —. Foreign ministers are not bound to an acquaintance with the laws of the land. They are privileged by their ignorance of them. They are bound by the laws of natural justice only.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 246. (M., 1790.)

5257. — —. Every person, diplomatic in his own right, is entitled to the privileges of the law of nations, in his own right. Among these is the receipt of all packages unopened and unexamined by the country which receives him. The usage of nations has established that this shall liberate whatever is imported bonâ fide for his own use, from paying duty. A government may control the number of diplomatic characters it will receive; but if it receives them it cannot control their rights while bonâ fide exercised. Thus Dr. Franklin, Mr. Adams, Colonel Humphreys and myself, all residing at Paris at the same time, had all of us our importation duty free. Great Britain had an ambassador and a minister plenipotentiary there, and an ambassador extra for several years; all three had their entries free. In most countries this privilege is permanent. Great Britain is niggardly, and allows it only on the first arrival. But in this, as she treats us only as she does the most favored nations, so we should treat her as we do the most favored nations. If these principles are correct, Mr. Foster is duty free.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 588. (W., 1805.)

5258. MINISTERS (Foreign), Reception of.—The Secretary of State has the honor to inform the Minister of France that the President will receive his letters of credence to-day at half after two: that this will be done in a room of private audience, without any ceremony whatever, or other person present than the Secretary of State, this being the usage which will be observed. As the Secretary of State will be with the President before that hour on business, the Minister will find him there.—To JEAN BAPTISTE TERNANT. FORD ED., v, 370. (Pa., 1791.)

5259. ——. The reception of the minister at all * * * (in favor of which Colonel Hamilton has given his opinion, though reluctantly, as he confessed), is an acknowledgment of the legitimacy of their [the French] government.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 616. FORD ED., vi, 223. (1793.)

5260. ——. It has been said without contradiction, and the people have been made to believe, that the refusal of the French to receive our Envoys was contrary to the law of nations, and a sufficient cause of war; whereas, every one who has ever read a book on the law of nations knows, that it is an unquestionable right in every power to refuse any minister who is personally disagreeable.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 289. FORD ED., vii, 359. (Pa., 1799.)

5261. ——. The Constitution has made the Executive the organ for managing our intercourse with foreign nations. It authorizes him to appoint and receive ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls. The term minister being applicable to other agents as well as diplomatic, the constant practice of the government, considered as a commentary, established this broad meaning; and the public interest approves it; because it would be extravagant to employ a diplomatic minister for a business which a mere rider would execute. The Executive being thus charged with the foreign intercourse, no law has undertaken to prescribe its specific duties.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 529. (1804.)

5262. MINISTERS (Foreign), Rejection.—The public interest certainly made the rejection of Chevalier de Onis expedient, and as that is a motive which it is not pleasant always to avow, I think it fortunate that the contending claims of Charles and Ferdinand furnished such plausible embarrassment to the question of right; for, on our principles, I presume, the right of the Junta to send a minister could not be denied.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 480. (M., Nov. 1809.)

5263. MINISTERS (Foreign), Revolutions and.—Whenever the scene [Paris during Revolution] became personally dangerous to you, it was proper you should leave it, as well from personal as public motives. But what degree of danger should be awaited, to what distance or place you should retire, are circumstances which must rest with your own discretion, it being impossible to prescribe them from hence.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 489. FORD ED., vi, 131. (Pa., Nov. 1792.)

5264. MINISTERS (Foreign), Rotation in.—I think it possible that it will be established into a maxim of the new government to discontinue its foreign servants after a certain time of absence from their own country, because they lose in time that sufficient degree of intimacy with its circumstances which alone can enable them to know and pursue its interests. Seven years have been talked of.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 244. (M., 1790.)

5265. MINISTERS (Foreign), Salaries.—You have doubtless heard of the complaints ministers as to the incompetency
I believe it would be better were they somewhat enlarged. Yet a moment's reflection will satisfy you that a man may live in any country on any scale he pleases, and more easily in that [France] than this, because there the grades are more distinctly marked. From the ambassador there a certain degree of representation is expected. But the lower grades of Envoy, Minister, Resident, Chargé, have been introduced to accommodate both the sovereign and missionary as to the scale of expense. I can assure you from my own knowledge of the ground, that these latter grades are left free in the opinion of the place to adopt any style they please, and that it does not lessen their estimation or their usefulness. When I was at Paris, two-thirds of the diplomatic men of the second and third orders entertained nobody. Yet they were as much invited out and honored as those of the same grades who entertained. * * * This procures one some sunshine friends who like to eat of your good things, but has no effect on the men of real business, the only men of real use to you, in a place where every man is estimated at what he really is.—To GENERAL JOHN ARMSTRONG. FORD ED., viii, 302. (W., 1804.)

— MINISTERS (Foreign), Secretaries of Legation and.—See SUMTER.

5266. MINISTERS (Foreign), Verbal communications.—Verbal communications are very insecure; for it is only necessary to deny them or to change their terms, in order to do away their effect at any time. Those in writing have many and obvious advantages, and ought to be preferred.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 63. FORD ED., vi, 416. (Pa., 1793.) See DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENT.

5267. MINISTERS (Imperial).—What are their [Kings] ministers but a committee, badly chosen?—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. ii, 221. FORD ED., iv, 426. (P., 1787.)

5268. MINISTERS (Imperial), Politic.—Ministers and merchants love nobody. The merchants here [France] are endeavoring to exclude us from their [West India] islands. The ministers will be governed in it by political motives, and will do it, or not do it, as these shall appear to dictate, without love or hatred to anybody.—To JOHN LANGDON. i, 429. (P., 1785.)

5269. MINISTERS (Religious), Fearless of.—You judge truly that I am not afraid of the priests. They have tried upon me all their various batteries, of pious whining, hypocritical canting, lying and slandering, without being able to give me one moment of pain.—To HORATIO GATES SPAFFORD. FORD ED., x, 13. (M., 1816.)

5270. MINISTERS (Religious), French.—The Curés throughout the [French] Kingdom form the mass of the clergy. They are the only part favorably known to the people, because solely charged with the duties of baptism, burial, confession, visitation of the sick, instruction of the children, and aiding the poor. They are themselves of the people, and united with them. The carriages and equipage only of the higher clergy, not their persons, are known to the people, and are in detestation with them.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 58. (P., 1789.)

5271. ——. Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * the

[French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review * * * the riches, luxury, indolence and immorality of the clergy.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

5272. MINISTERS (Religious), Hostility to Jefferson.—The delusion into which the X. Y. Z. plot shows it possible to push the people; the successful experiment made under the prevalence of that delusion on the clause of the Constitution, which, while it secured the freedom of the press, covered also the freedom of religion, had given to the clergy a very favorite hope of obtaining an establishment of a particular form of Christianity through the United States; and as every sect believes its own form the true one, every one, perhaps hoped for his own, but especially the Episcopalians and Congregationalists. The returning good sense of our country threatens abortion to their hopes, and they believe that any portion of power confided to me, will be exercised in opposition to their schemes. And they believe rightly; for I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man. But this is all they have to fear from me; and enough, too, in their opinion. And this is the cause of their printing lying pamphlets against me, forging conversations for me with Mazzei, Bishop Madison, &c., which are absolute falsehoods without a circumstance of truth to rest on; falsehoods, too, of which I acquiet Mazzei and Bishop Madison for they are men of truth. But enough of this. It is more than I have before committed to paper on the subject of all the lies that have been preached and printed against me.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 336. FORD ED., vii, 460. (M., Sep. 1800.)

5273. MINISTERS (Religious), Liberty and.—In every country and in every age, the priest has been hostile to liberty. He is always in alliance with the despot, abetting his abuses in return for protection to his own.—To HORATIO G. SPAFFORD. vi, 334. (M., 1814.)

5274. MINISTERS (Religious), New England.—The sway of the clergy in New England is indeed formidable. No mind beyond mediocrity dares there to develop itself. If it does, they excite against it the public opinion which they command, and by little, but incessant and tearing persecutions, drive it from among them. Their present emigrations to the Western country are real flights from persecution, religious and political, but the abandonment of the country by those who wish to enjoy freedom of opinion leaves the despotism over the residue more intense, more oppressive.—To HORATIO GATES SPAFFORD. FORD ED., x, 13. (M., 1816.)

5275. — — — The advocate of religious freedom is to expect neither peace nor forgiveness from the New England clergy.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 427. FORD ED., viii, 129. (1802.) See CHURCH, CHURCH AND STATE, CLERGY, and RELIGION.

5276. MINORITY, Censorship by.—A respectable minority [in Congress] is useful as censors. The present one is not respectable, being the bitterest remains of the cup of federalism, rendered desperate and furious by despair.—To JOEL BARLOW. iv, 437. FORD ED., viii, 149. (W., May 1802.)

5277. MINORITY, Equal rights of.—Bear in mind this sacred principle that * * * the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate which would be oppression.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 2. FORD ED., viii, 2. (1801.)

5278. MINORITY, Sacrifices to.—The minorities [against the new Constitution] in most of the accepting States have been very respectable; so much so as to render it prudent, were it not otherwise reasonable, to make some sacrifice to them.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 56. (P., 1788.)

5279. — — — The minorities [against the new Constitution] are too respectable, not to be entitled to some sacrifice of opinion; especially when a great proportion of them would be contented with a bill of rights.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 506. FORD ED., v, 53. (P., Nov. 1788.)

5280. MINT, Establishment of.—The propositions* under consideration [by Congress] suppose that the coinage is to be carried on in a foreign country, and that the implements are to remain the property of the undertaker; which conditions, in the opinion [of the Secretary of State] render them inadmissible, for these reasons: Coinage is peculiarly an attribute of sovereignty. To transfer its exercise into another country, is to submit it to another sovereign. Its transportation across the ocean, besides the ordinary dangers of the sea, would expose it to acts of piracy, by the crews to whom it would be confided, as well as by others apprized of its passage. In time of war, it would offer to the enterprises of an enemy what have been emphatically called the sinews of war. If the war were with the nation within whose territory the coinage is, the first act of war, or reprisal, might be to arrest this operation, with the implements and materials coined and uncoined, to be used at their discretion. The reputation and principles of the present undertaker are safeguards against the abuses of a coinage, carried on in a foreign country, where no checks could be provided by the proper sovereign, no regulations established, no police, no guard exercised; in short, none of the numerous cautions hitherto thought essential at every mint; but in hands less entitled to confidence, these will become dangers. We may be secured, indeed, by proper experiments as to the purity of the coin delivered us according to contract, but we cannot be secured against that which, though less pure, shall be struck in the general die, and protected against the vigilance of Government, till it shall have entered into circulation. We lose the opportunity of calling in and recoining the clipped money in circulation, or we double our risk by a double transportation. We lose, in like manner, the resource of coining up our household plate in the instant of great distress. We lose the means of forming artists to continue the works, when the common accidents of mortality shall have deprived us of those who began them. In fine, the carrying on a coinage in a foreign country, as far as the Secretary knows, is without example; and general example is weighty authority. He is, therefore, of opinion, on the whole, that a mint, whenever established, should be established at home.—COINAGE REPORT. vii, 463. (April 1790.)

5281. MIRAGE AT MONTICELLO.—

The elevation and particular situation at Monticello afford an opportunity of seeing a phenomenon which is rare at land, though frequent at sea. The seamen call it looming. Philosophy is as yet in the rear of the seamen, for so far from having accounted for it, she has not given it a name. Its principal effect is to make distant objects appear larger, in opposition to the general law of vision, by which they are diminished. I know an instance, at Yorktown, from whence the water prospect eastwardly is without termination, wherein a canoe with three men, at a great distance was taken for a ship with its three masts. I am little acquainted with the phenomenon as it shows itself at sea; but at Monticello it is familiar. There is a solitary mountain about forty miles off in the South, whose natural shape, as presented to view there, is a regular cone; but by the effect of looming it sometimes subsides almost totally in the horizon: sometimes it rises more acute and more elevated; sometimes it is hemispherical; and sometimes its sides are perpendicular, its top flat, and as broad as its base. In short, it assumes at times the most whimsical shapes, and all these perhaps successively in the same morning. The Blue Ridge of mountains comes into view, in the north-east, at about one hundred miles distance, and approaching in a direct line, passes by within twenty miles, and goes off to the south-west. This phenomenon begins to show itself on these mountains at about fifty miles distance, and continues beyond that as far as they are seen. I remark no particular state, either in the weight, moisture, or heat of the atmosphere, necessary to produce this. The only constant circumstances are its appearance in the morning only, and on objects at least forty or fifty miles distant. In this latter circumstance, if not in both, it differs from the looming on the water. Refraction will not account for the metamorphosis. That only changes the proportions of length and breadth, base and altitude, preserving the general outlines. Thus it may make a circle appear elliptical, raise or depress a cone, but by none of its laws, as yet developed, will it make a circle appear a square, or a cone a sphere.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 327. FORD ED. iii, 186. (1782.)

5282. MIRANDA EXPEDITION, Jefferson's knowledge of.—That the expedition of Miranda was countenanced by me, is an absolute falsehood let it have gone from whom it might, and I am satisfied it is equally so as to Mr. Madison. To know as much of it as we could was our duty, but not to encourage it. —TO WILLIAM PLANK iv, 502. FORD ED. viii, 433. (W., 1800.)

5283. Your predecessor, sound in a question of ethics, against the administration of this court, wished to intimate wrong to the moral character, even where he did not believe it himself. In this case, he wished it to be believed that we were in unjustifiable association in Atlantic exercises, I set myself, and on my personal truth and honor, declare to you that this was entirely wrong. I did not say, and that there was no connection between the court and the subject. He is proved

us he was about to attempt the liberation of his native country from bondage, and intimated a hope of our aid, or connivance at least. He was at once informed, that although we had great cause of complaint against Spain, and even of war, yet whenever we should think proper to act as her enemy, it should be openly and above board, and that our hostility should never be exercised by such petty means. We had no suspicion that he expected to engage men here, but merely to purchase military stores. Against this there was no law, nor consequently any authority for us to interpose obstacles. On the other hand, we deemed it improper to betray his voluntary communication to the agents of Spain. Although his measures were many days in preparation at New York, we never had the least intimation or suspicion of his engaging men in his enterprise, until he was gone; and I presume, the secrecy of his proceeding kept them equally unknown to the Marquis Yrujo at Philadelphia, and the Spanish consul at New York, since neither of them gave us any information of the enlistment of men, until it was too late for any measures taken at Washington to prevent their departure. The officer in the customs, who participated in the transaction with Miranda, we immediately removed, and should have had him and others further punished, had it not been for the protection given them by private citizens at New York, in opposition to the government, who, by their impudent falsehoods and calumnies, were able to overbear the minds of the jurors.—TO DOV VALENTINE DE FORONDA. v, 474. FORD ED. ix, 250. (M., Oct. 1809.)

5284. MIRANDA EXPEDITION, Prosecutions.—On the prosecution of Ogden and Smith for participation in Miranda's expedition, the defendants and their friends have contrived to make it a government question, in which they mean to have the Administration and the judge tried as the culprits instead of themselves. Swartwout, the marshal to whom, in his duel with Clinton, Smith was second, and his bosom friend, summoned a panel of jurors, the greater part of which were of the bitterest federalists. His letter, too, covering to a friend a copy of Aristides,* and affirming that every fact in it was true as Holy Writ [was considered in Cabinet]. Determined unanimously that he be removed.—THE ANAS. FORD ED. i, 316. (May 1806.)

5285. MISFORTUNE, Pleasure and.—Pleasure is always before us; but misfortune is at our side; while running after that, this arrests us.—TO MRS. COSWAY. ii, 37. FORD ED. iv, 317. (P., 1786.)

5286. MISFORTUNE, Solace in.—I most cordially sympathize in your losses. It is a situation in which a man needs the aid of all his wisdom and philosophy. But as it is better to turn from the contemplation of our misfortunes to the resources we possess of extricating ourselves, you will, of course, have found solace in your vigor of mind, health of body, talents, habits of business, in the consideration that you have time yet to retrieve everything, and a knowledge that the very activity necessary for this is a state of greater happiness than the unoccupied one to which you had a thought of retiring.—TO DR. CURRIE. ii, 218. (P., 1787.)

countries, who may think themselves bound to extinguish by fire and fagot the heresies to which we give the name of conversions, and quote our own example for it.—To Mr. ME-GEAR. vii, 287. (M., 1823.)

5288. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Absolute cession.—The navigation of the Mississippi we must have. This is all we are as yet ready to receive.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 189. (P., Jan. 1786.)

5289. ———. A cession of the navigation of the Mississippi, with such privileges as to make it useful, and free from future chicanery, can be no longer dispensed with on our part.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 223. FORD ED., v, 299. (Pa., 1791.)

5290. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Congress and.—The affair of the Mississippi, by showing that Congress is capable of hesitating on a question, which proposes a clear sacrifice of the western to the maritime States, will with difficulty be obliterated. The proposition of my going to Madrid to try to recover there the ground which has been lost at New York, by the concession of the vote of seven States, I should think desperate.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 153. FORD ED., iv, 392. (P., 1787.)

5291. ———. I was pleased to see the vote of Congress, of September the 16th, on the subject of the Mississippi, as I had before seen, with great uneasiness, the pursuits of other principles, which I could never reconcile to my own ideas of probity or wisdom, and from which, and my knowledge of the character of our western settlers, I saw that the loss of that country was a necessary consequence. I wish this return to true policy may be in time to prevent evil.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 563. FORD ED., v, 63. (P., 1789.)

5292. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Law of nature and.—But our right is built on ground still broader and more unquestionable, to wit: On the law of nature and nations. If we appeal to this, as we feel it written in the heart of man, what sentiment is written in deeper characters than that the ocean is free to all men, and their rivers to all their inhabitants? Is there a man, savage or civilized, unbiased by habit, who does not feel and attest this truth? Accordingly, in all tracts of country united under the same political society, we find this natural right universally acknowledged and protected by laying the navigable rivers open to all their inhabitants. When their rivers enter the limits of another society, if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream is in any case obstructed, it is an act of force by a stronger society against a weaker, condemned by the judgment of mankind. The late case of Antwerp and the Scheldt was a striking proof of a general union of sentiment on this point; as it is believed that Amsterdam had scarcely an advocate out of Holland, and even there its pretensions were advocated on the ground of treaties, and not of natural right. * * * The Commissioners will be able perhaps to find, either in the practice or the pretensions of Spain as to the Douro, Tagus, and Guadiana, some acknowledgments of this principle on the part of that nation. This sentiment of right in favor of the upper inhabitants must become stronger in the proportion which their extent of country bears to the lower. The United States hold 600,000 square miles of habitable territory on the Mississippi and its branches, and this river and its branches afford many thousands of miles of navigable waters penetrating this territory in all its parts. The inhabitable grounds of Spain below our boundary, and bordering on the river, which alone can pretend any fear of being incommoded by our use of the river, are not the thousandth part of that extent. This vast portion of the territory of the United States has no other outlet for its productions, and these productions are of the bulkiest kind. And in truth, their passage down the river may not only be innocent as to the Spanish subjects on the river, but cannot fail to enrich them far beyond their present condition. The real interests then of all the inhabitants, upper and lower, concur in fact with their rights. If we appeal to the law of nature and nations, as expressed by writers on the subject, it is agreed by them, that, were the river, where it passes between Florida and Louisiana, the exclusive right of Spain, still an innocent passage along it is a natural right in those inhabiting its borders above. It would indeed be what those writers call an imperfect right, because the modification of its exercise depends in a considerable degree on the expediency of the nation through which they are to pass. But it is still a right as real as any other right, however well-defined; and were it to be refused, or to be so shackled by regulations, not necessary for the peace or safety of its inhabitants, as to render its use impracticable to us, it would then be an injury, of which we should be entitled to demand redress. The right of the upper inhabitants to use this navigation is the counterpart to that of those possessing the shore below, and founded in the same natural relations with the soil and water. And the line at which their rights meet is to be advanced or withdrawn, so as to equalize the inconveniences resulting to each party from the exercise of the right by the other. This estimate is to be fairly made, with a mutual disposition to make equal sacrifices, and the numbers on each side are to have their due weight in the estimate. Spain holds so very small a tract of habitable land on either side below our boundary, that it may in fact be considered as a strait of the sea; for though it is eighty leagues from our boundary to the mouth of the river, yet it is only here and there, in spots and slips, that the land rises above the level of the water in times of inundation. There are, then, and ever must be, so few inhabitants on her part of the river, that the freest use of its navigation may be admitted to us without their annoyance.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 577. FORD ED., v, 467. (1792.)

5293. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Sectional opposition.—It is true, there were characters whose stations entitled them to credit, and who, from geographical prejudices, did not themselves wish the navigation of the Mississippi to be restored to us, and who believe, perhaps, as is common with mankind, that their opinion was the general opinion. But the sentiments of the great mass of the Union were decidedly otherwise then, and the very persons to whom M. Gardoqui alluded, have now come over to the opinion heartily, that the navigation of the Mississippi, in full and unrestrained freedom, is indispensably necessary, and must be obtained by any means it may call for.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. iii, 246. (Pa., 1791.)

5294. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Spain and.—In the course of the

5281. MIRAGE AT MONTICELLO.—

The elevation and particular situation at Monticello afford an opportunity of seeing a phenomenon which is rare at land, though frequent at sea. The seamen call it looming. Philosophy is as yet in the rear of the seamen, for so far from having accounted for it, she has not given it a name. Its principal effect is to make distant objects appear larger, in opposition to the general law of vision, by which they are diminished. I know an instance, at Yorktown, from whence the water prospect eastwardly is without termination, wherein a canoe with three men, at a great distance was taken for a ship with its three masts. I am little acquainted with the phenomenon as it shows itself at sea; but at Monticello it is familiar. There is a solitary mountain about forty miles off in the South, whose natural shape, as presented to view there, is a regular cone; but by the effect of looming, it sometimes subsides almost totally in the horizon: sometimes it rises more acute and more elevated; sometimes it is hemispherical; and sometimes its sides are perpendicular, its top flat, and as broad as its base. In short, it assumes at times the most whimsical shapes, and all these perhaps successively in the same morning. The Blue Ridge of mountains comes into view, in the north-east, at about one hundred miles distance, and approaching in a direct line, passes by within twenty miles, and goes off to the south-west. This phenomenon begins to show itself on these mountains at about fifty miles distance, and continues beyond that as far as they are seen. I remark no particular state, either in the weight, moisture, or heat of the atmosphere, necessary to produce this. The only constant circumstances are its appearance in the morning only, and on objects at least forty or fifty miles distant. In this latter circumstance, if not in both, it differs from the looming on the water. Refraction will not account for the metamorphosis. That only changes the proportions of length and breadth, base and altitude, preserving the general outlines. Thus it may make a circle appear elliptical, raise or depress a cone, but by none of its laws, as yet developed, will it make a circle appear a square, or a cone a sphere.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 327. FORD ED., iii, 186. (1782.)

5282. MIRANDA EXPEDITION, Jefferson's knowledge of.—That the expedition of Miranda was countenanced by me, is an absolute falsehood, let it have gone from whom it might; and I am satisfied it is equally so as to Mr. Madison. To know as much of it as we could was our duty, but not to encourage it.—TO WILLIAM DUANE. iv, 592. FORD ED., viii, 433. (W., 1806.)

5283. ———. Your predecessor, soured on a question of etiquette against the administration of this country, wished to impute wrong to them in all their actions, even where he did not believe it himself. In this spirit, he wished it to be believed that we were in unjustifiable cooperation in Miranda's expedition. I solemnly, and on my personal truth and honor, declare to you, that this was entirely without foundation, and that there was neither cooperation, nor connivance on our part. He informed us he was about to attempt the liberation of his native country from bondage, and intimated a hope of our aid, or connivance at least. He was at once informed, that although we had great cause of complaint against Spain, and even of war, yet whenever we should think proper to act as her enemy, it should be openly and above board, and that our hostility should never be exercised by such petty means. We had no suspicion that he expected to engage men here, but merely to purchase military stores. Against this there was no law, nor consequently any authority for us to interpose obstacles. On the other hand, we deemed it improper to betray his voluntary communication to the agents of Spain. Although his measures were many days in preparation at New York, we never had the least intimation or suspicion of his engaging men in his enterprise, until he was gone; and I presume, the secrecy of his proceeding kept them equally unknown to the Marquis Yrujo at Philadelphia, and the Spanish consul at New York, since neither of them gave us any information of the enlistment of men, until it was too late for any measures taken at Washington to prevent their departure. (Pa., 1791.)

5294. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Spain and.—In the course of the

Revolutionary War, in which the thirteen colonies, Spain and France, were opposed to Great Britain, Spain took possession of several posts held by the British in Florida. It is unnecessary to inquire whether the possession of half a dozen posts scattered through a country of seven or eight hundred miles extent, could be considered as the possession and conquest of that country. If it was, it gave still but an inchoate right, as was before explained, which could not be perfected but by the relinquishment of the former possession at the close of the war; but certainly it could not be considered as a conquest of the river, even against Great Britain, since the possession of the shores, to wit, of the island of New Orleans on the one side, and Louisiana on the other, having undergone no change, the right in the water would remain the same, if considered in its relation to them; and if considered as a distinct right, independent of the shores, then no naval victories obtained by Spain over Great Britain, in the course of the war, gave her the color of conquest over any water which the British fleet could enter. Still less can she be considered as having conquered the river, as against the United States, with whom she was not at war. We had a common right of navigation in the part of the river between Florida, the island of New Orleans, and the western bank, and nothing which passed between Spain and Great Britain, either during the war or at its conclusion, could lessen that right. Accordingly, at the treaty of November, 1782, Great Britain confirmed the rights of the United States to the navigation of the river, from its source to its mouth, and in January, 1783, completed the right of Spain to the territory of Florida, by an absolute relinquishment of all her rights in it. This relinquishment could not include the navigation held by the United States in their own right, because this right existed in themselves only, and was not in Great Britain. If it added anything to the rights of Spain respecting the river between the eastern and western banks, it could only be that portion of right which Great Britain had retained to herself in the treaty with the United States, held seven weeks before, to wit, a right of using it in common with the United States. So that as by the treaty of 1763, the United States had obtained a common right of navigating the whole river from its source to its mouth, so by the treaty of 1782, that common right was confirmed to them by the only power who could pretend claims against them, founded on the state of war; nor has that common right been transferred to Spain by either conquest or cession.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 576. FORD ED., v. 466. (1792.)

5295. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Treaty of Paris and.—The war of 1755-1763, was carried on jointly by Great Britain and the Thirteen Colonies, now the United States of America, against France and Spain. At the peace which was negotiated by our common magistrate, a right was secured to the subjects of Great Britain (the common designation of all those under his government) to navigate the Mississippi in its whole breadth and length, from its source to the sea, and expressly that part which is between the Island of New Orleans and the right bank of the river, as well as the passage both in and out of its mouth; and that the vessels should not be stopped, visited, or subjected to the payment of any duty whatsoever. These are the words of the treaty, article VII. Florida was at the same time ceded by Spain, and its extent westwardly was fixed to the Lakes Pontchartrain and Maurepas, and the River Mississippi; and Spain received soon after from France a cession of the island of New Orleans, and all the country she held westward of the Mississippi, subject, of course, to our right of navigating between that country and the island previously granted to us by France. This right was not parcelled out to us in severalty, that is to say, to each the exclusive navigation of so much of the river as was adjacent to our several shores, in which way it would have been useless to all; but it was placed on that footing, on which alone it could be worth anything, to wit: as a right to all to navigate the whole length of the river in common. The import of the terms, and the reason of the thing, prove it was a right of common in the whole, and not a several right to each of a particular part. To which may be added the evidence of the stipulation itself, that we should navigate between New Orleans and the western bank, which, being adjacent to none of our States, could be held by us only as a right of common. Such was the nature of our right to navigate the Mississippi, as far as established by the Treaty of Paris.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 575. FORD ED., v. 466. (1792.)

5296. MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, Western people and.—The difficulty on which the negotiation with Spain hangs is a sine qua non with us. It would be to deceive them and ourselves, to suppose that an amity can be preserved while this right is withheld. Such a supposition would argue not only an ignorance of the people to whom this is most interesting, but an ignorance of the nature of man, or an inattention to it. Those who see but half way into our true interest will think that that concurs with the views of the other party. But those who see it in all its extent, will be sensible that our true interest will be best promoted, by making all the just claims of our fellow citizens, wherever situated, our own, by urging and enforcing them with the weight of our whole influence, and by exercising in this, as in every other instance, a just government in their concerns, and making common cause even where our separate interest would seem opposed to theirs. No other conduct can attach us together; and on this attachment depends our happiness.—To JAMES MONROE. i. 605. FORD ED., iv, 262. (P., 1786.)

5297. ———. If they declare themselves a separate people, we are incapable of a single effort to retain them. Our citizens can never be induced, either as militia or as soldiers, to go there to cut the throats of their own brothers and sons, or rather, to be themselves the subjects, instead of the perpetrators of the parricide. Nor would that country require the cost of being retained against the will of its inhabitants, could it be done. But it cannot be done. They are able already to rescue the navigation of the Mississippi out of the hands of Spain, and to add New Orleans to their own territory. They will be joined by the inhabitants of Louisiana. This will bring on a war between them and Spain; and that will produce the question with us, whether it will not be worth our while to become parties with them in the war, in order to reunite them with us, and thus correct our error? And were I to permit my forebodings to go one step further, I should predict that the inhabitants of the United States would force their rulers to take the affirmative of that question.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 106. FORD ED., iv, 363. (P., 1787.)

5298. ——. I never had any interest westward of the Alleghany; and I never will have any. But I have had great opportunities of knowing the character of the people who inhabit that country; and I will venture to say, that the act which abandons the navigation of the Mississippi is an act of separation between the eastern and western country. It is a relinquishment of five parts out of eight of the territory of the United States; an abandonment of the fairest subject for the payment of our public debts, and the chaining those debts on our necks, in perpetuum.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 105. FORD ED., iv, 363. (P., 1787.)

5299. ——. The navigation of the Mississippi was perhaps the strongest trial to which the justice of the Federal Government could be put. If ever they thought wrong about it, I trust they have got to rights. I should think it proper for the Western country to defer pushing their right to that navigation to extremity as long as they can do without it tolerably; but that the moment it becomes absolutely necessary for them, it will become the duty of the maritime States to push it to every extremity to which they would their own right of navigating the Chesapeake, the Delaware, the Hudson, or any other water.—To JOHN BROWN. ii, 345. FORD ED., v, 17. (P., May 1788.)

5300. ——. It is impossible to answer for the forbearance of our western citizens. We endeavor to quiet them with the expectation of an attainment of their rights by peaceable means. But should they, in a moment of impatience, hazard others, there is no saying how far we may be led; for neither themselves nor their rights will be ever abandoned by us.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. iii, 173. FORD ED., v, 217. (N.Y., 1790.)

5301. ——. The navigation of the Mississippi is necessary to us. More than half the territory of the United States is on the waters of that river. Two hundred thousand of our citizens are settled on them, of whom forty thousand bear arms. These have no other outlet for their tobacco, rice, corn, hemp, lumber, house timber, ship timber. We have hitherto respected the indecision of Spain, because we wish peace;—because our western citizens have had vent at home for their productions. A surplus of production begins now to demand foreign markets. Whenever they shall say, "We cannot, we will not, be longer shut up," the United States will be reduced to the following dilemma: 1. To force them to acquiescence. 2. To separate from them, rather than take part in a war against Spain. 3. Or to preserve them in our Union, by joining them in the war. The 1st is neither in our principles, nor in our power. 2. A multitude of reasons decide against the second. It may suffice to speak but one: were we to give up half our territory rather than engage in a just war to preserve it, we should not keep the other half long. The third is the alternative we must adopt.—INSTRUCTIONS TO WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ix, 412. FORD ED., v, 225. (1790.) See LOUISIANA and NEW ORLEANS.

5302. MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, Government of.—As to the people you are to govern, we are apprised that they are divided into two adverse parties, the one composed of the richer and better informed, attached to the first grade of government, the other of the body of the people, not a very homogeneous mass, advocates for the second grade which they possess in fact. Our love of freedom, and the value we set on self-government dispose us to prefer the principles of the second grade, and they are strengthened by knowing they are [faded in MS.] by the will of the majority. While cooperation with that plan, therefore, is essentially to be observed, your best endeavors should be exerted to bring over those opposed to it by every means soothing and conciliatory. The happiness of society depends so much on preventing party spirit from infecting the common intercourse of life, that nothing should be spared to harmonize and amalgamate the two parties in social circles.—To WILLIAM C. CLAIBORNE. FORD ED., viii, 71. (W., July 1801.) See LOUISIANA.

5303. MISSOURI, Admission of.—I rejoice that * * * Missouri is at length a member of our Union. Whether the question it excited is dead, or only sleepeth, I do not know. I see only that it has given resurrection to the Hartford Convention men. They have had the address, by playing on the honest feelings of our former friends, to seduce them from their kindred spirits, and to borrow their weight into the Federal scale. Desperate of regaining power under political distinctions, they have adroitly wriggled into its seat under the auspices of morality, and are again in the ascendancy from which their sins had hurled them. * * * I still believe that the Western extension of our Confederacy will insure its duration, by overruling local factions, which might shake a smaller association.—To HENRY DEARBORN. vii, 215. FORD ED., x, 191. (M., 1821.)

5304. MISSOURI QUESTION, A breaker.—The banks, bankrupt law, manufactures, Spanish treaty, are nothing. These are occurrences which, like waves in a storm, will pass under the ship. But the Missouri question is a breaker on which we lose the Missouri country by revolt, and what more, God only knows. From the battle of Bunker's Hill to the treaty of Paris, we never had so ominous a question. * * * I thank God that I shall not live to witness its issue.*—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 148. FORD ED., x, 151. (M., December 1819.)

5305. MISSOURI QUESTION, Federalists and.—Nothing has ever presented so threatening an aspect as what is called the Missouri question. The federalists, completely put down and despairing of ever rising again under the old divisions of Whig and Tory, devised a new one of slave-holding and non-slave-holding States, which, while it had a semblance of being moral, was at the same time geographical, and calculated to give them ascendancy by debauching their old opponents to a coalition with them. Moral the question certainly is not, because the re-

* Mr. Adams replied as follows: "The Missouri question, I hope, will follow the other waves under the ship, and do no harm. I know it is high treason to express a doubt of the perpetual duration of our vast American empire, and our free institution; and I say as devoutly as father Paul, esto perpetua, but I am sometimes Cassandra enough to dream, that another Hamilton, and another Burr, might rend this mighty fabric in twain, or perhaps into a leash; and a few more choice spirits of the same stamp, might produce as many nations in North America as there are in Europe."—EDITOR.

moval of slaves from one State to another, no more than their removal from one country to another, would never make a slave of one human being who would not be so without it. Indeed, if there were any morality in the question it is on the other side; because by spreading them over a larger surface their happiness would be increased, and the burden for their future liberation lightened by bringing a greater number of shoulders under it. However, it served to throw dust into the eyes of the people and to fanaticize them, while to the knowing ones it gave a geographical and preponderant line of the Potomac and Ohio, throwing fourteen States to the North and East, and ten to the South and West. With these, therefore, it is merely a question of power; but with this geographical minority it is a question of existence. For if Congress once goes out of the Constitution to arrogate a right of regulating the condition of the inhabitants of the States, its majority may, and probably will, next declare that the condition of all men within the United States shall be that of freedom; in which case all the whites south of the Potomac and Ohio must evacuate their States, and most fortunate those who can do it first. And so far this crisis seems to be advancing.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., x, 177. (M., Dec. 1820.)

5308. MISSOURI QUESTION, Geographical line.—I am so completely withdrawn from all attention to public matters, that nothing less could arouse me than the definition of a geographical line, which on an abstract principle is to become the line of separation of these States, and to render desperate the hope that man ever enjoys the two blessings of peace and self-government. The question sleeps for the present, but is not dead.—To H. NELSON. vii, 151. FORD ED., x, 156. (M., March 1820.)

5307. — — — I congratulate you on the sleep of the Missouri question. I wish I could say in its death, but of this I despair. The idea of a geographical line once suggested will brood in the minds of all those who prefer the gratification of their ungovernable passions to the peace and union of their country.—To MARK LANGDON HILL. vii, 155. (M., April 1820.)

5308. — — — This momentous question, like a fire bell in the night, awakened and filled me with terror. I considered it at once as the knell of the Union. It is hushed, indeed, for the moment. But this is a reprieve only, not a final sentence. A geographical line, coinciding with a marked principle, moral and political, once conceived and held up to the angry passions of men, will never be obliterated; and every new irritation will mark it deeper and deeper.—To JOHN HOLMES. vii, 159. FORD ED., x, 157. (M., April 1820.)

5309. MISSOURI QUESTION, A Party trick.—The Missouri question is a mere party trick. The leaders of federalism, defeated in their schemes of obtaining power by rallying partisans to the principle of monarchism, a principle of personal not of local division, have changed their tack, and thrown out another barrel to the whale. They are taking advantage of the virtuous feelings of the people to effect a division of parties by a geographical line: they expect that this will insure them, on local principles, the majority they could never obtain on principles of federalism; but they are still putting their shoulder to the wrong wheel; they are wasting Jeremiads on the miseries of slavery, as if we were advocates for it. Sincerity in their declamations should direct their efforts to the true point of difficulty, and unite their counsels with ours in devising some reasonable and practicable plan of getting rid of it. Some of these leaders, if they could attain the power, their ambition would rather use it to keep the Union together, but others have ever had in view its separation. If they push it to that, they will find the line of separation very different from their 36° of latitude, and as manufacturing and navigating States, they will have quarreled with their bread and butter, and I fear not that after a little trial they will think better of it and return to the embraces of their natural and best friends. But this scheme of party I leave to those who are to live under its consequences. We who have gone before have performed an honest duty, by putting in the power of successors a state of happiness which no nation ever before had within their choice. If that choice is to throw it away, the dead will have neither the power nor the right to control them.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. vii, 180. FORD ED., x, 162. (M., 1820.)

5310. MISSOURI QUESTION, Portentous.—The Missouri question is the most portentous one which ever yet threatened our Union. In the gloomiest moment of the Revolutionary war I never had any apprehensions equal to what I feel from this source.—To HUGH NELSON. FORD ED., x, 156. (M., Feb. 1820.)

5311. — — — Last and most portentous of all is the Missouri question. It is smeared over for the present; but its geographical demarcation is indelible. What it is to become I see not.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 212. FORD ED., x, 189. (M., 1821.)

5312. MISSOURI QUESTION, Presidential politics.—The boisterous sea of liberty is never without a wave, and that from Missouri is now rolling towards us, but we shall ride over it as we have over all others. It is not a moral question, but one merely of power. Its object is to raise a geographical principle for the choice of a President, and the noise will be kept up till that is effected.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 194. FORD ED., x, 180. (M., 1820.)

5313. — — — Nothing disturbs us so much as the dissension lately produced by what is called the Missouri question; a question having just enough of the semblance of morality to throw dust into the eyes of the people and to fanaticize; while with the knowing ones it is simply a question of power.—To D. B. WARDEN. FORD ED., x, 172. (M., Dec. 1820.)

5314. MISSOURI QUESTION, Separation.—The Missouri question aroused and filled me with alarm. The old schism of federal and republican threatened nothing, because it existed in every State, and united them together by the fraternism of party. But the coincidence of a marked principle, moral and political, with a geographical line, once conceived, I feared would never more be obliterated from the mind; that it would be recurring on every occasion and renewing irritations, until it would kindle such mutual and mortal hatred, as to render separation preferable to eternal discord. I have been among the most sanguine in believing that our Union would be of long duration. I now doubt it much, and see the event at no great distance, and the direct consequence of this question; not by the line which has been so confidently counted on; the laws of nature control this; but by the Potomac, Ohio and Missouri, or more probably, the Mississippi upwards to our northern boundary. My only comfort and confidence is, that I shall not live to see this; and I envy not the present generation the glory of throwing away the fruits of their fathers' sacrifices of life and fortune, and of rendering desperate the experiment which was to decide ultimately whether man is capable of self-government. This treason against human hope, will signalize their epoch in future history, as the counterpart of the medal of their predecessors.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 158. (M., April 1820.)

5315. ——. Should the schism [on the Missouri question] be pushed to separation it will be for a short term only; two or three years' trial will bring them back, like quarrelling lovers to renewed embraces, and increased affections. The experiment of separation would soon prove to both that they had mutually miscalculated their best interests. And even were the parties in Congress to secede in a passion, the soberer people would call a convention and cement again the severance attempted by the insanity of their functionaries. With this consoling view, my greatest grief would be for the fatal effect of such an event on the hopes and happiness of the world. We exist, and are quoted, as standing proofs that a government, so modelled as to rest continually on the will of the whole society, is a practicable government. Were we to break to pieces, it would damp the hopes and the efforts of the good, and give triumph to those of the bad through the whole enslaved world. As members, therefore, of the universal society of mankind, and standing in high and responsible relation with them, it is our sacred duty to suppress passion among ourselves, and not to blast the confidence we have inspired of proof that a government of reason is better than one of force.—To RICHARD RUSH. vii, 182. (M., 1820.)

5316. MISSOURI QUESTION, Slavery extension.—All know that permitting the slaves of the south to spread into the west will not add one being to that unfortunate condition, that it will increase the happiness of those existing, and by spreading them over a larger surface, will dilute the evil everywhere, and facilitate the means of getting finally rid of it, an event more anxiously wished by those on whom it presses than by the noisy pretenders to exclusive humanity. In the meantime, it is a ladder for rivals climbing to power.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 194. FORD ED., x, 180. (M., 1820.)

5317. ——. A hideous evil, the magnitude of which is seen, and at a distance only, by the one party, and more sorely felt and sincerely deplored by the other, from the difficulty of the cure, divides us at this moment too angrily. The attempt by one party to prohibit willing States from sharing the evil, is thought by the other to render desperate, by accumulation, the hope of its final eradication. If a little time, however, is given to both parties to cool, and to dispel their visionary fears, they will see that concurring in sentiment as to the evil, moral and political, the duty and interest of both is to concur also in devising a practicable process of cure. Should time not be given, and the schism be pushed to separation, it will be for a short term only; two or three years' trial will bring them back, like quarrelling lovers to renewed embraces, and increased affections. The experiment of separation would soon prove to both that they had mutually miscalculated their best interests.—To RICHARD RUSH. vii, 182. (M., October 1820.)

5318. ——. Our anxieties in this quarter [the South] are all concentrated in the question, what does the Holy Alliance in and out of Congress mean to do with us on the Missouri question? And this, by-the-bye, is but the name of the case, it is only the John Doe or Richard Roe of the ejectment. The real question, as seen in the States afflicted with this unfortunate population, is, are our slaves to be presented with freedom and a dagger? For if Congress has the power to regulate the conditions of the inhabitants of the States, within the States, it will be but another exercise of that power, to declare that all shall be free. Are we then to see again Athenian and Lacedemonian confederacies? To wage another Peloponnesian war to settle the ascendancy between them? Or is this the tocsin of merely a servile war? That remains to be seen; but not, I hope, by you or me.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 200. FORD ED., x, 186. (M., January 1821.)

5319. MOBS, Government and.—The mobs of great cities add just so much to the support of pure government, as sores do to the strength of the human body.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 406. FORD ED., iii, 269. (1782.)

5320. MOBS, Imaginary.—It is in the London newspapers only that exist those mobs and riots, which are fabricated to deter strangers from going to America. Your person will be sacredly safe and free from insult.—To MRS. SPROWLE. FORD ED., iv, 66. (P., 1785.)

5321. MOBS, Revolutionary.—For some-time mobs of ten, twenty and thirty thousand people collected daily, surrounded the Parliament House [in Paris], huzzaed the members, even entered the doors and examined into their conduct, took the horses out of the carriages of those who did well, and drew them home. The government thought it prudent to prevent these, drew some regiments into the neighborhood, multiplied the guards, had the streets constantly patrolled by strong parties, suspended privileged places, forbade all clubs, &c. The mobs have ceased; perhaps this may be partly owing to the absence of parliament.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 258. (P., Aug. 1787.) See BASTILE.

5322. MODERATION, Political.—A moderate conduct throughout, which may not revolt our new friends [the federalists], and which may give them tenets with us, must be observed.—To JOHN PAGE. iv, 378. (W., March 1801.)

5323. MODESTY, American.—There is modesty often which does itself injury. Our countrymen possess this. They do not know their own superiority.—To WILLIAM RUTLEDGE. ii, 350. FORD ED., v, 5. (P., 1788.)

5324. MONARCHY, Advocates for.—I know there are some among us who would now establish a monarchy. But they are inconsiderable in number and weight of character.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 5. FORD ED., v, 83. (P., 1789.)

5325. ———. It cannot be denied that we have among us a sect who believe that the English constitution contains whatever is perfect in human institutions; that the members of this sect have, many of them, names and offices which stand high in the estimation of our countrymen. I still rely that the great mass of our community is untainted with these heresies, as its head. On this I build my hope that we have not labored in vain, and that our experiment will still prove that men can be governed by reason.—To GEORGE MASON. iii, 209. FORD ED., v, 275. (Pa., 1791.)

5326. ———. We have some names of note here who have apostatized from the true faith; but they are few indeed, and the body of our citizens pure and insusceptible of taint in their republicanism. Mr. Paine's answer to Burke will be a refreshing shower to their minds.—To BENJAMIN VAUGHAN. FORD ED., v, 334. (Pa., 1791.)

5327. ———. There are high names* here in favor of [monarchy], but the publications in Bache's paper have drawn forth pretty generally expressions of the public sentiment on the subject, and I thank God to find they are, to a man, firm as a rock in their republicanism. I much fear that the honestest man of the party will fall a victim to his imprudence on this occasion, while another of them, from the mere caution of holding his tongue, and buttoning

* At this point a series of cipher figures is written on the margin, which, when translated, reads: "Adams, Jay, Hamilton, Knox. Many of the Cincinnati. The second says nothing. The third is open. Both are dangerous. They pant after union with England as the power which is to support their projects, and are most determined Anti-gallicans. It is prognosticated that our republic is to end with the president's life. But I believe they will find themselves all head and no body."—NOTE IN FORD EDITION.

himself up, will gain what the other loses.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 361. (Pa., 1791.)

5328. ———. The ultimate object of all this increase of public debt, establishment of a paper money system, corruption of Congress, etc., is, it is charged, to prepare the way for a change from the present republican form of government to that of a monarchy, of which the English constitution is to be the model. That this was contemplated in the [Federal] Convention is no secret, because its partisans have made none of it. To effect it then was impracticable, but they are still eager after their object, and are predisposing everything for its ultimate attainment. So many of them have got into the Legislature, that, aided by the corrupt squadron of paper dealers, who are at their devotion, they make a majority in both houses. The republican party, who wish to preserve the government in its present form, are fewer in number. They are fewer even when joined by the two, three, or half dozen anti-federalists, who, though they dare not avow it, are still opposed to any General Government; but, being less so to a republican than a monarchical one, they naturally join those whom they think pursuing the lesser evil.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 361. FORD ED., vi, 3. (Pa., May 1792.)

5329. ———. While you [in France] are exterminating the monster aristocracy, and pulling out the teeth and fangs of its associate, monarchy, a contrary tendency is discovered in some here. A sect has shown itself among us, who declare they espoused our new Constitution not as a good and sufficient thing in itself, but only as a step to an English constitution, the only thing good and sufficient in itself, in their eyes. It is happy for us that these are preachers without followers, and that our people are firm and constant in their republican purity. You will wonder to be told that it is from the Eastward chiefly that these champions for a King, lords and commons, come. They get some important associates from New York, and are puffed up by a tribe of Agioteurs which have been hatched in a bed of corruption made up after the model of their beloved England. Too many of these stock-jobbers and king-jobbers have come into our Legislature, or rather too many of our Legislature have become stock-jobbers and king-jobbers. However, the voice of the people is beginning to make itself heard, and will probably cleanse their seats at the ensuing election.—To GENERAL LAFAYETTE. iii, 450. FORD ED., vi, 78. (Pa., 1792.)

5330. ———. He [President Washington] said that as to the idea of transforming this government into a monarchy he did not believe there were ten men in the United States whose opinions were worth attention, who entertained such a thought. I told him there were many more than he imagined. I recalled to his memory a dispute at his own table * * * between General Schuyler, on one side, and Pinckney and myself on the other, wherein the former maintained the position, that hereditary descent was as likely to produce good magistrates as election. I told him, that though the people were sound, there was a numerous sect who had monarchy in contemplation; that the Secretary of the Treasury was one of these; that I had heard him say that this Constitution was a shilly-shally thing of mere milk and water, which could not last, and was only good as a step to something better. That when we reflected, that he had endeavored in the convention, to make an English constitution out of it, and when failing in that, we saw all his measures tending to bring it to the same thing, it was natural for us to be jealous; and particularly, when we saw that these measures had established corruption in the Legislature, where there was a squadron devoted to the nod of the Treasury, doing whatever he had directed, and ready to do what he should direct. That if the equilibrium of the three great bodies, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, could be preserved, if the Legislature could be kept independent, I should never fear the result of such a government; but that I could not but be uneasy when I saw that the Executive had swallowed up the Legislative branch. He said, that as to that interested spirit in the Legislature, it was what could not be avoided in any government, unless we were to exclude particular descriptions of men, such as the holders of the funds from all office. I told him, there was great difference between the little accidental schemes of self-interest, which would take place in every body of men, and influence their votes, and a regular system for forming a corps of interested persons who should be steadily at the orders of the Treasury.—THE ANAS. ix, 121. FORD ED., i, 204. (Oct. 1792.)

5331. ——. In the course of our [members of the Cabinet] conversation Knox, sticking for parade, got into great warmth and swore that our government must either be entirely new modeled or it would be knocked to pieces in less than ten years, and that, as it is at present, he would not give a copper for it; that it is the President's character, and not the written Constitution, which keeps it together.—THE ANAS. ix, 139. FORD ED., i, 222. (Feb. 1793.)

5332. ——. The aspect of our politics has wonderfully changed since you left us. In place of that noble love of liberty, and republican government which carried us triumphantly through the war, an Anglican, monarchic-al, aristocratical party has sprung up, whose avowed object is to draw over us the substance, as they have already done the forms of the British government. The mass of our citizens, however, remain true to their republican principles; the whole landed interest is republican, and so is a great mass of talents. Against us are the Executive, the Judiciary, two out of three branches of the Legislature, all the officers of the Government, all who want to be officers, all timid men who prefer the calm of despotism to the boisterous sea of liberty. British merchants and Americans trading on British capitals, speculators and holders in the banks and public funds, a contrivance invented for the purposes of corruption, and for assimilating us in all things to the rotten as well as the sound parts of the British model. It would give you a fever were I to name to you the apostates who have gone over to these heresies, men who were Samsons in the field and Solomons in the council, but who have had their heads shorn by * * * England. In short, we are likely to preserve the liberty we have obtained only by unremitting labors and perils. But we shall preserve it; and our mass of weight and wealth on the good side is so great, as to leave no danger that force will ever be attempted against us. We have only to awake and snap the Lilliputian cords with which they have been entangling us during the first sleep which succeeded our labors.—TO PHILIP MAZZEI. iv, 130. FORD ED., vii, 75. (M., April 1796.) See MAZZEI.

5333. ——. It would seem that changes in the principles of our government are to be pushed till they accomplish a monarchy peaceably, or force a resistance which, with the aid of an army, may end in monarchy. Still, I hope that this will be peaceably prevented by the eyes of the people being opened, and the consequent effect of the elective principle.—TO CHARLES PINCKNEY. FORD ED., vii, 398. (M., Oct. 1799.)

5334. ——. I know, indeed, that there are monarchists among us. One character of these is in theory only, and perfectly acquiescent in our form of government as it is, and not entertaining a thought of destroying it merely on their theoretic opinions. A second class, at the head of which is our quondam colleague [in the cabinet, Hamilton], are ardent for introduction of monarchy, eager for armies, making more noise for a great naval establishment than better patriots, who wish it on a rational scale only, commensurate to our wants and our means. This last class ought to be tolerated but not trusted.—TO GENERAL HENRY KNOX. iv, 386. FORD ED., viii, 36. (W., March 1801.)

5335. MONARCHY, Colonists and.—I believe you may be assured, that an idea or desire of returning to anything like their [the Colonists'] ancient government, never entered into their heads.*—TO DAVID HARTLEY. ii, 165. (P., 1787.)

5336. ——. I am satisfied that the King of England believes the mass of our people to be tired of their independence, and desirous of returning under his government, and that the same opinion prevails in the ministry and nation. They have hired their newswriters to repeat this lie in their gazettes so long, that they have become the dupes of it themselves.—TO JOHN JAY. ii, 305. (P., 1787.)

5337. MONARCHY, Evils of.—If anybody thinks that kings, nobes or priests are good conservators of the public happiness, send him here [France]. It is the best school in the universe to cure him of that folly. He will see here, with his own eyes, that these descriptions of men are an abandoned confederacy against the happiness of the mass of the people. The omnipotence of their effect cannot be better proved than in this country particularly, where, notwithstanding the finest soil upon earth, the finest climate under heaven, and a people of the most benevolent, the most gay and amiable character of which the human form is susceptible; where such a people, I say, surrounded by so many blessings from nature, are loaded with misery, by kings, nobles and priests, and by them alone.—TO GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 7. FORD ED., iv, 268. (P., 1786.)

5338. ——. I am astonished at some people's considering a kingly government as a refuge [from the evils of the Confederation]. Advise such to read the fable of the frogs who solicited Jupiter for a king. If that does not put them to rights send them to Europe to see something of the trappings of monarchy, and I will undertake that every man shall go back thoroughly cured. If all the evils which can arise among us from the republican form of government from this day to the day of judgment could be put into a scale against what this country [France] suffers from its monarchical form in a week, or England in a month, the latter would predominate. Consider the contents of the Red Book in England, or the Almanac Royale of France, and say what a people gain by monarchy. No race of kings has ever presented above one man of common sense in twenty generations. The best they can do is to leave things to their ministers, and what are their ministers but a committee, badly chosen? If the king ever meddles it is to do harm.—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. ii, 220. FORD ED., iv, 426. (P., Aug. 1787.)

5339. ——. I hear there are people among you who think the experience of our governments has already proved that republican government will not answer. Send those gentry here to count the blessings of monarchy. A king's sister, for instance, stopped on the road, and on a hostile journey, is sufficient cause for him to march immediately twenty thousand men to revenge this insult.—To JOSEPH JONES. ii, 249. FORD ED., iv, 438. (P., 1787.)

5340. ——. There is scarcely an evil known in the European countries which may not be traced to their king, as its source, nor a good which is not derived from the small fibres of republicanism existing among them.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 375. FORD ED., v, 8. (P., 1788.)

5341. MONARCHY, The Federal Convention and.—The want of some authority which should procure justice to the public creditors, and an observance of treaties with foreign nations, produced * * * the call of a convention of the States at Annapolis. Although, at this meeting, a difference of opinion was evident on the question of a republican or kingly government, yet, so generally through the States was the sentiment in favor of the former, that the friends of the latter confined themselves to a course of obstruction only, and delay, to everything proposed. They hoped, that nothing being done, and all things going from bad to worse, a kingly government might be usurped, and submitted to by the people, as better than anarchy and wars, internal and external, the certain consequences of the present want of a general government. The effect of their manoeuvres, with the defective attendance of deputies from the States, resulted in the measure of calling a more general convention, to be held at Philadelphia. At this, the same party exhibited the same practices, and with the same views of preventing a government of concord, which they foresaw would be republican, and of forcing through anarchy their way to monarchy. But the mass of that convention was too honest, too wise, and too steady, to be baffled or misled by their manoeuvres. One of these was a form of government proposed by Colonel Hamilton, which would have been in fact a compromise between the two parties of royalism and republicanism. According to this, the Executive and one branch of the Legislature were to be during good behavior, i. e. for life, and the governors of the States were to be named by these two prominent organs. This, however, was rejected; on which Hamilton left the Convention, as desperate, and never returned again, until near its conclusion. These opinions and efforts, secret or avowed, of the advocates for monarchy, had begotten great jealousy through the States generally; and this jealousy it was which excited the strong opposition to the conventional Constitution; a jealousy which yielded at last only to a general determination to establish certain amendments as barriers against a government either monarchical or consolidated.*—THE ANAS. ix, 89. FORD ED., i, 158. (1818.)

5343. ——. President Washington added that he considered France as the sheet anchor of this country and its friendship as a first object. There are in the United States some characters of opposite principles; some of them are high in office, others possessing great wealth, and all of them hostile to France, and fondly looking to England as the staff of their hope. * * * They * * * have espoused [the Constitution] only as a stepping-stone to monarchy, and have endeavored to approximate it to that in its administration in order to render its final transition more easy. The successes of republicanism in France have given the coup de grace to their prospects, and I hope to their projects.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 503. FORD ED., vi, 155. (Pa., 1793.)

5344. MONARCHY, Hamilton and.—[Alexander] Hamilton's financial system had then [1790] passed. It had two objects. First, as a puzzle, to exclude popular understanding and inquiry. Secondly, as a machine for the corruption of the Legislature; for he avowed the opinion, that man could be governed by one of two motives only, force or interest.† Force, he observed, in this country was out of the question; and the interests, therefore, of the members must be laid hold of, to keep the Legislature in unison with the Executive. And with grief and shame it must be acknowledged that his machine was not without effect: that even in this, the birth of our government, some members were found sordid enough to bend their duty to their interests, and to look after personal, rather than public good. * * * [The measures of Hamilton's financial system, —the Funding and United States Bank Acts.

"A small knowledge of human nature will convince us that with far the greatest part of mankind interest is the governing principle, and that almost every man is more or less under its influence. Motives of public virtue may for a time, or in particular instances, actuate men to the observance of a conduct purely disinterested, but they are not sufficient of themselves to produce a conformity to the refined dictates of social duty. Few men are capable of making a continual sacrifice of all views of profit, interest, or advantage, to the common good. It is in vain to exclaim against the depravity of human nature on this account; the fact is so, and we must in a great measure change the constitution of man before we can make it otherwise. No institution not built on the presumptive truth of these maxims can succeed."—Hamilton's Works, ii, 100.—EDITOR.

&c.] added to the number of votaries to the Treasury, and made its Chief the master of every vote in the Legislature, which might give to the government the direction suited to his political views. I know well, and so must be understood, that nothing like a majority in Congress had yielded to this corruption. Far from it. But a division, not very unequal, had already taken place in the honest part of that body, between the parties styled republican and federal. The latter being monarchists in principle, adhered to Hamilton of course, as their leader in that principle, and this mercenary phalanx added to them, ensured him always a majority in both Houses; so that the whole action of the Legislature was now under the direction of the Treasury. * * * By this combination, legislative expositions were given to the Constitution, and all the administrative laws were shaped on the model of England, and so passed. * * * Here then was the real ground of the opposition which was made to the course of administration. Its object was to preserve the Legislature pure and independent of the Executive, to restrain the administration to republican forms and principles, and not permit the Constitution to be construed into a monarchy, and to be warped in practice into all the principles and pollutions of their favorite English model. Nor was this an opposition to General Washington. He was true to the republican charge confided to him; and has solemnly and repeatedly protested to me, in our conversations that he would lose the last drop of his blood in support of it: and he did this the oftener, and with the more earnestness, because he knew my suspicions of Hamilton's designs against it, and wished to quiet them. For he was not aware of the drift, or of the effect of Hamilton's schemes. Unversed in financial projects, and calculations and budgets, his approbation of them was bottomed on his confidence in the man.—THE ANAS. ix, 91. FORD ED., i, 160, 164, 165. (1818.)

5345. ——. Hamilton was not only a monarchist, but for a monarchy bottomed on corruption. In proof of this, I will relate an anecdote, for the truth of which I attest the God who made me. Before the President [Washington] set out on his southern tour in April, 1791, he addressed a letter of the fourth of that month, from Mount Vernon, to the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and War, desiring that if any serious and important cases should arise during his absence, they would consult and act on them. And he requested that the Vice-President should also be consulted. This was the only occasion on which that officer was ever requested to take part in a cabinet question. Some occasion for consultation arising, I invited those gentlemen (and the Attorney General as well as I remember), to dine with me, in order to confer on the subject. After the cloth was removed, and our question agreed and dismissed, conversation began on other matters, and, by some circumstance, was led to the British Constitution, on which Mr. Adams observed, "Purge that constitution of its corruption, and give to its popular branch equality of representation, and it would be the most perfect constitution ever devised by the wit of man". Hamilton paused and said, "purge it of its corruption, and give to its popular branch equality of representation, and it would become an impracticable government: as it stands at present, with all its supposed defects, it is the most perfect government which ever existed". And this was assuredly the exact line which separated the political creeds of these two gentlemen. The one was for two hereditary branches and an honest elective one; the other for an hereditary King, with a House of Lords and Commons corrupted to his will, and standing between him and the people. THE ANAS. ix, 96. FORD ED., i, 165. (1818.)

5346. ——. Hamilton frankly avowed that he considered the British constitution, with all the corruptions of its administration, as the most perfect model of government which had ever been devised by the wit of man; professing however, at the same time, that the spirit of this country was so fundamentally republican that it would be visionary to think of introducing monarchy here, and that, therefore, it was the duty of its administrators to conduct it on the principles their constituents had elected.—TO MARTIN VAN BUREN. vii, 371. FORD ED., x, 314. (M., 1824.)

5347. ——. Harper takes great pains to prove that Hamilton was no monarchist, by exaggerating his own intimacy with him, and the impossibility, if he was so, that he should not at some time have betrayed it to him. This may pass with uninformed readers, but not with those who have had it from Hamilton's own mouth. I am one of those, and but one of many. At my own table, in presence of Mr. Adams, Knox, Randolph and myself, in a dispute between Mr. Adams and himself, he avowed his preference of monarchy over every other government, and his opinion that the English was the most perfect model of government ever devised by the wit of man, Mr. Adams agreeing, "if its corruptions were done away"; while Hamilton insisted that "with these corruptions it was perfect, and without them it would be an impracticable government". —TO WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 389. FORD ED., x, 330. (M., 1825.)

5348. MONARCHY, Imitation of.—When on my return from Europe, I joined the government in March, 1790, at New York, I was much astonished, indeed, at the mimicry I found established of royal forms and ceremonies, and more alarmed at the unexpected phenomenon, by the monarchical sentiments I heard expressed and openly maintained in every company, executive and judiciary (General Washington alone excepted), and by a great part of the Legislature, save only some members who had been of the old Congress, and a very few of recent introduction. I took occasion, at various times, of expressing to General Washington my disappointment at these symptoms of a change of principle, and that I thought them encouraged by the forms and ceremonies which I found prevailing, not at all in character with the simplicity of republican government, and looking as if wishfully to those of European courts. His general explanations to me were, that when he arrived at New York to enter on the executive administration of the new government, he observed to those who were to assist him, that placed as he was in an office entirely new to him, unacquainted with the forms and ceremonies of other governments, still less apprised of those which might be properly established here, and himself perfectly indifferent to all forms, he wished them to consider and prescribe what they should be; and the task was assigned particularly to General Knox, a man of parade, and to Colonel Humphreys, who had resided sometime at a foreign court. They, he said, were the authors of the present regulations, and that others were proposed so highly strained that he absolutely rejected them. Attentive to the difference of opinion prevailing on this subject, when the term of his second election arrived, he called the heads of Departments together, observed to them the situation in which he had been at the commencement of the government, the advice he had taken and the course he had observed in compliance with it; that a proper occasion had now arrived of revising that course, of correcting it in any particulars not approved in experience; and he desired us to consult together, agree on any changes we should think for the better, and that he should willingly conform to what we should advise. We met at my office. Hamilton and myself agreed at once that there was too much ceremony for the character of our government, and particularly that the parade of the installation at New York ought not to be copied on the present occasion, that the President should desire the Chief Justice to attend him at his chambers, that he should administer the oath of office to him in the presence of the higher officers of the government, and that the certificate of the fact should be delivered to the Secretary of State to be recorded. Randolph and Knox differed from us, the latter vehemently; they thought it not advisable to change any of the established forms, and we authorized Randolph to report our opinions to the President. As these opinions were divided, and no positive advice given as to any change, no change was made.—To MARTIN VAN BUREN. vii, 367. FORD ED., x, 310. (M., 1824.)

5349. ——. The forms which I had censured in my letter to Mazzei were perfectly understood by General Washington, and were those which he himself but barely tolerated. He had furnished me a proper occasion for proposing their reformation, and my opinion not prevailing, he knew I could not have meant any part of the censure for him.—To MARTIN VAN BUREN. vii, 368. FORD ED., x, 311. (M., 1824.)

5350. MONARCHY, Inimical to.—I was much an enemy to monarchies before I came to Europe. I am ten thousand times more so, since I have seen what they are.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 375. FORD ED., v, 8. (P., 1788.)

5351. MONARCHY, Preference for.—I returned from the mission [to France] in the first year of the new government * * * and proceeded to New York to enter on the office of Secretary of State. Here, certainly, I found a state of things which, of all I had ever contemplated, I the least expected. I had left France in the first year of her Revolution, in the fervor of natural rights, and zeal for reformation. My conscientious devotion to these rights could not be heightened, but it had been aroused and excited by daily exercise. The President received me cordially, and my colleagues and the circle of principal citizens, apparently, with welcome. The courtesies of dinner parties given me, as a stranger newly arrived among them, placed me at once in their familiar society. But I cannot describe the wonder and mortification with which the table conversations filled me. Politics was the chief topic, and a preference of kingly, over republican, government was evidently the favorite sentiment. An apostate I could not be, nor yet a hypocrite; and I found myself, for the most part the only advocate on the republican side of the question, unless among the guests there chanced to be some member of that party from the Legislative Houses.—THE ANAS. ix, 91. FORD ED., i, 159. (1818.)

5352. ——. When I arrived at New York in 1790, to take a part in the administration, being fresh from the French Revolution, while in its first and pure stage, and consequently somewhat whetted up in my own republican principles, I found a state of things in the general society of the place, which I could not have supposed possible. Being a stranger there, I was feasted from table to table, at large set dinners, the parties generally from twenty to thirty. The revolution I had left, and that we had just gone through in the recent change of our own government, being the common topics of conversation, I was astonished to find the general prevalence of monarchical sentiments, inasmuch that in maintaining those of republicanism, I had always the whole company on my hands, never scarcely finding among them a single coadjutor in that argument, unless some old member of Congress happened to be present. The furthest that any one would go, in support of the republican features of our new government, would be to say, "the present Constitution is well as a beginning and may be allowed a fair trial; but it is, in fact, only a stepping stone to something better". Among their writers, [Joseph] Dennie, the editor of the "Portfolio", who was a kind of oracle with them, and styled "the Addison of America", openly avowed his preference of monarchy over all other forms of government, prided himself on the avowal, and maintained it by argument freely and without reserve in his publications. I do not myself know that the Essex Junta, of Boston, were monarchists, but I have always heard it so said, and never doubted. These are but detached items from a great mass of proofs then fully before the public. * * * They are now disavowed by the party. But, had it not been for the firm and determined stand then made by a counter party, no man can say what our government would have been at this day. Monarchy, to be sure, is now defeated, and they wish it should be forgotten that it was ever advocated. They see that it is desperate, and treat its imputation to them as a calumny; and I verily believe that none of them have it now in direct aim. Yet the spirit is not done away. The same party takes now what they deem the next best ground, the consolidation of the government; the giving to the Federal member of the Government, by unlimited constructions of the Constitution, a control over all the functions of the States, and the concentration of all power ultimately at Washington.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 390. FORD ED., x, 332. (M., 1825.)

5353. MONARCHY, Throwing off.—With respect to the State of Virginia in particular, the people seem to have laid aside the monarchical, and taken up the republican form of government with as much ease as would have attended their throwing off an old and putting on a new suit of clothes. Not a single throe has attended this important transformation. A half-dozen aristocratic gentlemen, agonizing under the loss of preeminence, have sometimes ventured their sarcasms on our political metamorphosis. They have been thought fitter objects of pity than of punishment.—To BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. i, 204. FORD ED., ii, 131. (August 1777.)

5354. MONARCHY, Washington and.—I am satisfied that General Washington had not a wish to perpetuate his authority; but he who supposes it was practicable, had he wished it, knows nothing of the spirit of America, either of the people or of those who possessed their confidence. There was, indeed, a cabal of the officers of the army who proposed to establish a monarchy and to propose it to General Washington. He frowned indignantly at the proposition (according to the information which got abroad), and Rufus King and some few civil characters, chiefly (indeed, I believe, to a man) north of Maryland, who joined in this intrigue. But they never dared openly to avow it, knowing that the spirit which had produced a change in the form of government was alive to the preservation of it.—NOTES ON MARSHALL'S LIFE OF WASHINGTON. ix, 478. FORD ED., ix, 262.

5355. — —. The next effort was (on suggestion of the same individuals, in the moment of their separation), the establishment of an hereditary order, under the name of the Cincinnati, ready prepared, by that distinction, to be engrafted into the future form of government, and placing General Washington still at their head. The General wrote to me on this subject, while I was in Congress at Annapolis. * * * He afterwards called on me at that place, on his way to a meeting of the society, and after a whole evening of consultation, he left that place fully determined to use all his endeavors for its total suppression. But he found it so firmly riveted in the affections of the members that, strengthened as they happened to be by an adventitious occurrence of the moment [the arrival of the badges of the Order from France], he could effect no more than the abolition of its hereditary principle.* He called again on his return,† and explained to me fully the opposition which had been made, the effect of the occurrence from France, and the difficulty with which its duration had been limited to the lives of the present members.—THE ANAS. ix, 89. FORD ED., i, 157. (1818.) See CINCINNATI SOCIETY.

5356. MONARCHY vs. REPUBLIC. —With all the defects of our Constitution, whether general or particular, the comparison of our governments with those of Europe, is like a comparison of heaven and hell. England, like the earth, may be allowed to take the intermediate station.—To J. JONES. ii, 249. (P., 1787.)

5357. — —. We were educated in royalism; no wonder if some of us retain that idolatry still. Our young people are educated in republicanism; an apostasy from that to royalism, is unprecedented and impossible.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 5. FORD ED., v, 83. (P., 1789.)

5358. MONEY, Circulating Medium.—The increase of circulating medium * * * according to my ideas of paper money, is clearly a demerit [in the bill providing for the establishment of a national bank].—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii, 558. FORD ED., v, 287. (1791.)

5359. — —. The adequate price of a thing depends on the capital and labor necessary to produce it. In the term capital, I mean to include science, because capital as well as labor has been employed to acquire it. Two things requiring the same capital and labor, should be of the same price. If a gallon of wine requires for its production the same capital and labor with a bushel of wheat, they should be expressed by the same price, derived from the application of a common measure to them. The comparative prices of things being thus to be estimated and expressed by a common measure, we may proceed to observe that were a country so insulated as to have no commercial intercourse with any other, to confine the interchange of all its wants and supplies within itself, the amount of circulating medium, as a common measure for adjusting these exchanges, would be quite immaterial. If their circulation, for instance, were a million of dollars, and the annual produce of their industry equivalent to ten millions of bushels of wheat, the price of a bushel of wheat might be one dollar. If, then, by a progressive coinage, their medium should be doubled, the price of a bushel of wheat might become progressively two dollars, and without inconvenience. Whatever be the proportion of the circulating medium to the value of the annual produce of industry, it may be considered as the representative of that industry. In the first case, a bushel of wheat will be represented by one dollar; in the second, by two dollars. This is well explained by Hume, and seems to be admitted by Adam Smith. But where a nation is in a full course of interchange of wants and supplies with all others, the proportion of its medium to its produce is no longer indifferent.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 233. FORD ED., ix, 406. (M., 1813.)

5360. — —. One of the great advantages of specie as a medium is, that being of universal value, it will keep itself at a general level, flowing out from where it is too high into parts where it is lower. Whereas, if the medium be of local value only, as paper money, if too little, indeed, gold and silver will flow in to supply the deficiency; but if too much, it accumulates, banishes the gold and silver not locked up in vaults and hoards, and depreciates itself; that is to say, its proportion to the annual produce of industry being raised, more of it is required to represent any particular article of produce than in the other countries. This is agreed to by [Adam] Smith, the principal advocate for a paper circulation; but advocating it on the sole condition that it be strictly regulated. He admits, nevertheless, that "the commerce and industry of a country cannot be so secure when suspended on the Dædalian wings of paper money, as on the solid ground of gold and silver; and that in time of war, the insecurity is greatly increased, and great confusion possible where the circulation is for the greater part in paper". But in a country where loans are uncertain, and a specie circulation the only sure resource for them, the preference of that circulation assumes a far different degree of importance.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 233. FORD ED., ix, 407. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5361. ——. The only advantage which [Adam] Smith proposes by substituting paper in the room of gold and silver money, B. 2. c. 2. 434, is "to replace an expensive instrument with one much less costly, and sometimes equally convenient"; that is to say, page 437, "to allow the gold and silver to be sent abroad and converted into foreign goods", and to substitute paper as being a cheaper measure. But this makes no addition to the stock or capital of the nation. The coin sent was worth as much, while in the country, as the goods imported and taking its place. It is only, then, a change of form in a part of the national capital, from that of gold and silver to other goods. He admits, too, that while a part of the goods received in exchange for the coin exported may be materials, tools and provisions for the employment of an additional industry, a part, also, may be taken back in foreign wines, silks, &c., to be consumed by idle people who produce nothing; and so far the substitution promotes prodigality, increases expense and corruption, without increasing production. So far also, then, it lessens the capital of the nation. What may be the amount which the conversion of the part exchanged for productive goods may add to the former productive mass, it is not easy to ascertain, because, as he says, page 441, "it is impossible to determine what is the proportion which the circulating money of any country bears to the whole value of the annual produce. It has been computed by different authors, from a fifth to a thirtieth of that value". In the United States it must be less than in any other part of the commercial world; because the great mass of their inhabitants being in responsible circumstances, the great mass of their exchanges in the country is effected on credit, in their merchants' ledger, who supplies all their wants through the year, and at the end of it receives the produce of their farms, or other articles of their industry. It is a fact that a farmer with a revenue of ten thousand dollars a year, may obtain all his supplies from his merchant, and liquidate them at the end of the year by the sale of his produce to him, without the intervention of a single dollar of cash. This, then, is merely barter, and in this way of barter a great portion of the annual produce of the United States is exchanged without the intermediation of cash. We might safely, then, state our medium at the minimum of one-thirtieth.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 234. FORD ED., ix, 407. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5362. ——. But what is one-thirtieth of the value of the annual produce of the industry of the United States? Or what is the whole value of the annual produce of the United States? An able writer and competent judge of the subject, in 1799, on as good grounds as probably could be taken, estimated it, on the then population of four and half millions of inhabitants, to be thirty-seven and a half millions sterling, or one hundred and sixty-eight and three-fourths millions of dollars. According to the same estimate for our present population, it will be three hundred millions of dollars, one-thirtieth of which, Smith's minimum, would be ten millions, and one-fifth, his maximum, would be sixty millions for the quantum of circulation. But suppose that instead of our needing the least circulating medium of any nation, from the circumstance before mentioned, we should place ourselves in the middle term of the calculation, to wit: at thirty-five millions. One-fifth of this, at the least, Smith thinks, should be retained in specie, which would leave twenty-eight millions of specie to be exported in exchange for other commodities; and if fifteen millions of that should be returned in productive goods, and not in articles of prodigality, that would be the amount of capital which this operation would add to the existing mass. But to what mass? Not that of the three hundred millions, which is only its gross annual produce, but to that capital of which the three hundred millions are but the annual produce. But this being gross, we may infer from it the value of the capital by considering that the rent of lands is generally fixed at one-third of the gross produce, and is deemed its net profit, and twenty times that its fee simple value. The profits on landed capital may, with accuracy enough for our purpose, be supposed to be on a par with those of other capital. This would give us, then, for the United States, a capital of two thousand millions, all in active employment, and exclusive of unimproved lands lying in a great degree dormant. Of this, fifteen millions would be the hundred and thirty-third part. And it is for this petty addition to the capital of the nation, this minimum of one dollar, added to one hundred and thirty-three and a third or three-fourths per cent., that we are to give up our gold and silver medium, its intrinsic solidity, its universal value, and its saving powers in time of war, and to substitute for it paper, with all its train of evils, moral, political, and physical, which I will not pretend to enumerate. There is another authority to which we may appeal for the proper quantity of circulating medium for the United States. The old Congress, when we were estimated at about two millions of people, on a long and able discussion, June 22, 1775, decided the sufficient quantity to be two millions of dollars, which sum they then emitted.* According to this, it should be eight millions, now that we are eight millions of people. This differs little from Smith's minimum of ten millions, and strengthens our respect for that estimate.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 234. FORD ED., ix, 408. (M., Nov. 1813.) See BANKS and DEBT.

5363. ——. Specie is the most perfect medium because it will preserve its own level; because, having intrinsic and universal value, it can never die in our hands, and it is the surest resource of reliance in time of war.—To J. W. EFFES. vi, 246. FORD ED., ix, 416. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5364. ——. It would be best that our medium should be so proportioned to our produce, as to be on a par with that of the countries with which we trade, and whose medium is in a sound state.—To J. W. EFFES. vi, 246. FORD ED., ix, 416. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5365. ——. Instead of yielding to the cries of scarcity of medium set up by speculators, projectors and commercial gamblers, no endeavors should be spared to begin the work of reducing it by such gradual means as may give time to private fortunes to preserve their poise, and settle down with the subsiding medium.—To J. W. EFFES. vi, 246. FORD ED., ix, 417. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5366. ——. We are already at ten or twenty times the due quantity of medium; insomuch, that no man knows what his property is now worth, because it is bloating while he is calculating; and still less what it will be worth when the medium shall be relieved from its present dropsical state.—To J. W. EFFES. vi, 246. FORD ED., ix, 417. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5367. ——. This State [Virginia] is in a condition of unparalleled distress. The sudden reduction of the circulating medium from a plethora to all but annihilation is producing an entire revolution of fortune. In other places I have known lands sold by the sheriff for one year's rent; beyond the mountains we hear of good slaves selling for one hundred dollars, good horses for five dollars, and the sheriffs generally the purchasers. Our produce is now selling at market for one-third of its price before this commercial catastrophe, say flour at three and a quarter and three and a half dollars the barrel. We should have less right to expect relief from our legislators if they had been the establishers of the unwise system of banks. A remedy to a certain degree was practicable, that of reducing the quantum of circulation gradually to a level with that of the countries with which we have commerce, and an eternal abjuration of paper. * * * I fear local insurrections against these horrible sacrifices of property.—To H. 5368. MONEY, Clipped.—The Legislatures should cooperate with Congress in providing that no money be received or paid at their treasuries, or by any of their officers, or any bank, but on actual weight; in making it criminal, in a high degree, to diminish their own coins and, in some smaller degree, to offer them in payment when diminished.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 169. 5373. ——. I think it my duty to inform Congress that a Swiss, of the name of Drost, established in Paris, has invented a method of striking the two faces and the edge of a coin, at one stroke. By this, and other simplifications of the process of coinage, he is enabled to coin from twenty-five to thirty thousand pieces a day, with the assistance of only two persons, the pieces of metal being first prepared. I send you by Colonel Franks three coins of gold, silver and copper, which you will perceive to be perfect medals; and I can assure you, from having seen him coin many, that every piece is as perfect as these. There has certainly never yet been seen any coin, in any country, comparable to this. The best workmen in this way, acknowledge that his is like a new art. Coin should always be made in the highest perfection possible, because it is a great guard against the danger of false coinage. This man would be willing to furnish his implements to Congress, and if they please, he will go over and instruct a person to carry on the work; nor do I believe he would ask anything unreasonable. It would be very desirable, that in the institution of a new coinage, we could set out on so perfect a plan as this, and the more so as while the work is so exquisitely done, it is done cheaper.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 89. tary [of State] knows, is without example; and general experience is weighty authority.—COINAGE REPORT. vii, 464. (April 1790.)

5376. ——. Perfection in the engraving is among the greatest safeguards against counterfeits, because engravers of the first class are few, and elevated by their rank in their art, and far above the base and dangerous business of counterfeiting.—COINAGE REPORT. vii, 463. (April 1790.)

5377. ——. As to the question on whom the expense of coinage is to fall, I have been so little able to make up an opinion satisfactory to myself, as to be ready to concur in either decision.—TO ALEXANDER HAMILTON. iii, 330. (1792.)

5378. MONEY, Foreign.—The quantity of fine silver which shall constitute the Unit being settled, and the proportion of the value of gold to that of silver; a table should be formed * * * classing the several foreign coins according to their fineness; declaring the worth of a pennyweight or grain in each class, and that they shall be lawful tenders at those rates, if not clipped or otherwise diminished; and, where diminished, offering their value for them at the mint, deducting the expense of recoinage.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 169. FORD ED., iii, 453. (1784.) See GOLD AND SILVER.

5379. ——. Most of the gold and silver coins of Europe pass in the several States of America according to the quantity of pure metal they contain.—M. DU RIVAL. ii, 52. (P., 1786.)

5380. ——. A bill has passed the Representatives giving three years longer currency to foreign coins. * * * The effect of stopping the currency of gold and silver is to force bank paper through all the States. However, I presume the State Legislatures will exercise their acknowledged right of regulating the value of foreign coins, when not regulated by Congress, and their exclusive right of declaring them a tender.—TO JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 183. (Pa., Dec. 1797.)

5381. ——. By the Constitution Congress may regulate the value of foreign coin; but if they do not do it, the old power revives to the State, the Constitution only forbidding them to make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts.—TO JOHN TAYLOR. FORD ED., vii, 182. (Pa., 1797.)

5382. ——. A bill has passed the Representatives to suspend for three years the law arresting the currency of foreign coins. The Senate proposed an amendment, continuing the currency of the foreign gold only. * * * The object of opposing the bill is to make the French crowns a subject of speculation (for it seems they fell on the President's proclamation to a dollar in most of the States). and to force bank paper (for want of other medium) through all the States generally.—TO JAMES MADISON. iv, 205. FORD ED., vii, 189. (Pa., 1798.)

5383. MONEY, Legal tender.—I deny the power of the General Government of making paper money, or anything else, a legal tender.—TO JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 260. FORD ED., vii, 310. (M., 1798.)

5386. MONEY, Scarcity of.—An unparalleled want of money here, and stoppage of discount at all the banks, oblige the merchants to slacken the price of wheat and flour; but it is only temporary.—TO GEORGE GILMER. FORD ED., vi, 202. (Pa., 1793.)

5387. MONEY, Standard.—I believe all the countries in Europe determine their standard of money in gold as well as silver. Thus, the laws of England direct that a pound Troy of gold, of twenty-two carats fine, shall be cut into forty-four and a half guineas, each of which shall be worth twenty-one and a half shillings, that is, into 956 3-4 shillings. This establishes the shilling at 5.518 grains of pure gold. They direct that a pound of silver, consisting of 11 1-10 ounces of pure silver and 9-10 of an ounce alloy, shall be cut into sixty-two shillings. This establishes the shilling at 85.93 grains of pure silver, and, consequently, the proportion of gold to silver as 85.93 to 5.518, or as 15.57 to 1. If this be the true proportion between the value of gold and silver at the general market of Europe, then the value of the shilling, depending on two standards, is the same, whether a payment be made in gold or in silver. But if the proportion of the general market at Europe be as fifteen to one, then the Englishman who owes a pound weight of gold at Amsterdam, if he sends the pound of gold to pay it, sends 1043.72 shillings; if he sends fifteen pounds of silver, he sends only 1030.5 shillings; if he pays half in gold and half in silver, he pays only 1037.11 shillings. And this medium between the two standards of gold and silver, we must consider as furnishing the true medium value of the shilling. If the parliament should now order the pound of gold (of one-twelfth alloy as before) to be put into a thousand shillings instead of nine hundred and fifty-six and three-fourths, leaving the silver as it is, the medium or true value of the shilling would suffer a change of half the difference; and in the case before stated, to pay a debt of a pound weight of gold, at Amsterdam, if he sent the pound weight of gold, he would send 1090.9 shillings; if he sent fifteen pounds of silver, he would send 1030.5 shillings; if half in gold and half in silver, he would send 1060.7 shillings; which shows that this parliamentary operation would reduce the value of the shilling in the proportion of 1060.7 to 1037.11.—To J. SANSFIELD. iii, 18. (P., April 1789.)

5388. ——. Now this is exactly the effect of the late change in the quantity of gold contained in your louis. Your marc d'argent fin is cut into 53.45 livres (fifty-three livres and nine sous), the marc de l'or fin was cut, heretofore, by law, into 784.6 livres (seven hundred and eighty-four livres and twelve sous); gold was to silver then as 14.63 to 1. And if this was different from the proportion at the markets of Europe, the true value of your livre stood half way between the two standards. By the ordinance of October the 30th, 1785, the marc of pure gold has been cut into 828.6 livres. If your standard had been in gold alone, this would have reduced the value of your livre in the proportion of 828.6 to 784.6. But as you had a standard of silver as well as gold, the true standard is the medium between the two; consequently the value of the livre is reduced only one-half the difference, that is as 806.6 to 784.6, which is very nearly three per cent. Commerce, however, has made a difference of four per cent., the average value of the pound sterling, formerly twenty-four livres, being now twenty-five livres. Perhaps some other circumstance has occasioned an addition of one per cent. to the change of your standard.—To J. SANSFIELD. iii, 19. (P., April 1789.)

5389. ——. To trade on equal terms, the common measure of values should be as nearly as possible on a par with that of its corresponding nations, whose medium is in a sound state; that is to say, not in an accidental state of excess or deficiency. Now, one of the great advantages of specie as a medium is, that being of universal value, it will keep itself at a general level, flowing out from where it is too high into parts where it is lower. Whereas, if the medium be of local value only, as paper money, if too little, indeed, gold and silver will flow in to supply the deficiency; but if too much, it accumulates, banishes the gold and silver not locked up in vaults and hoards, and depreciates itself; that is to say, its proportion to the annual produce of industry being raised, more of it is required to represent any particular article of produce than in the other countries. This is agreed by [Adam] Smith, (B. 2. c. 2. 437.) the principal advocate for a paper circulation; but advocating it on the sole condition that it be strictly regulated. He admits, nevertheless, that "the commerce and industry of a country cannot be so secure when suspended on the Dædalian wings of paper money, as on the solid ground of gold and silver; and that in time of war, the insecurity is greatly increased, and great confusion possible where the circulation is for the greater part in paper". (B. 2. c. 2. 484.) But in a country where loans are uncertain, and a specie circulation the only sure resource for them, the preference of that circulation assumes a far different degree of importance.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 233. FORD ED., ix, 407. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5390. ——. Our dropsical medium is long since divested of the quality of a medium of value; nor can I find any other. In most countries a fixed quantity of wheat is perhaps the best permanent standard. But here the blockade of our whole coast, preventing all access to a market, has depressed the price of that, and exalted that of other things, in opposite directions, and, combined with the effects of the paper deluge, leaves really no common measure of values to be resorted to.—To M. CORREA. vi, 406. (M., 1814.)

5391. ——. We have no metallic measure of values at present, while we are overwhelmed with bank paper. The depreciation of this swells nominal prices, without furnishing any stable index of real value.—To JEAN BAPTISTE SAY. vi, 434. (M., March 1815.)

5392. ——. We are now without any common measure of the value of property, and private fortunes are up or down at the will of the worst of our citizens. Yet there is no hope of relief from the Legislatures who have immediate control over this subject. As little seems to be known of the principles of political economy as if nothing had ever been written or practiced on the subject, or as was known in old times, when the Jews had their rulers under the hammer. It is an evil, therefore, which we must make up our minds to meet and to endure as those of hurricanes, earthquakes and other casualties.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 499. (M., Oct. 1815.)

5393. ——. The flood with which the banks are deluging us of nominal money has placed us completely without any certain measure of value, and, by interpolating a false measure, is deceiving and ruining multitudes of our citizens.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., x, 116. (M., 1818.)

5394. ——. There is one evil which awakens me at times, because it jostles me at every turn. It is that we have now no measure of value. I am asked eighteen dollars for a yard of broadcloth, which, when we had dollars, I used to get for eighteen shillings; from this I can only understand that a dollar is now worth but two inches of broadcloth, but broadcloth is no standard of measure or value. I do not know, therefore, whereabouts I stand in the scale of property, nor what to ask, or what to give for it. I saw, indeed, the like machinery in action in the years '80 and '81, and without dissatisfaction; because in wearing out, it was working out our salvation. But I see nothing in this renewal of the game of "Robin's Alive" but a general demoralization of the nation, a filching from industry its honest earnings, wherewith to build up palaces, and raise gambling stock for swindlers and shavers, who are to close, too, their career of piracies by fraudulent bankruptcies.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 111. FORD ED., x, 121. (M., 1819.)

5395. ——. The evils of this deluge of paper money are not to be removed, until our citizens are generally and radically instructed in their cause and consequences, and silence by their authority the interested clamors and sophistry of speculating, shaving, and banking institutions. Till then we must be content to return, quoad hoc, to the savage state, to recur to barter in the exchange of our property, for want of a stable, common measure of value, that now in use being less fixed than the beads and wampum of the Indian, and to deliver up our citizens, their property and their labor, passive victims to the swindling tricks of bankers and mountebankers.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 115. (M., 1819.) See BANKS, DOLLAR, NATIONAL CURRENCY, and PAPER MONEY.

5396. MONEY, Unit of.—The plan reported by the Financier [Robert Morris] is worthy of his sound judgment. It admits, however, of objection in the size of the Unit. He proposes that this shall be the 1440th part of a dollar; so that it will require 1440 of his units to make the one before proposed. He was led to adopt this by a mathematical attention to our old currencies, all of which this Unit will measure without leaving a fraction. But as our object is to get rid of those currencies, the advantage derived from this coincidence will soon be past, whereas the inconveniences of this Unit will forever remain, if they do not altogether prevent its introduction. It is defective in two of the three requisites of a Money Unit. 1. It is inconvenient in its application to the ordinary money transactions. Ten thousand dollars will require eight figures to express them, to wit, 14,400,000 units. A horse or bullock of eighty dollars' value, will require a notation of six figures, to wit, 115,200 units. As a money of account, this will be laborious, even when facilitated by the aid of decimal arithmetic: as a common measure of the value of property, it will be too minute to be comprehended by the people. The French are subjected to very laborious calculations, the livre being their ordinary money of account, and this but between 1-5th and 1-6th of a dollar; but what will be our labors, should our money of account be 1-1440th of a dollar? 2. It is neither equal, nor near to any of the known coins in value.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 166. FORD ED., iii, 450. (1784.) See DOLLAR.

5397. ——. I concur with you in thinking that the Unit must stand on both metals.—To ALEXANDER HAMILTON. iii, 330. (Feb. 1792.)

5398. MONEY, War and.—Money is the nerve of war.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 498. (M., 1815.)

5399. MONEY BILLS, Origination.—Bills for levying money shall be originated and amended by the Representatives only.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 17. (June 1776.)

5400. ——. The Senate and the House of Representatives [of Virginia] shall each * * * have power to originate and amend bills; save only that bills for levying money shall be originated and amended by the representatives only: the assent of both houses shall be requisite to pass a law.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 17. (June 1776.)

5401. MONEY BILLS, Parliament and.—By the law and usage of the British parliament, all those are understood to be money bills which raise money in any way, or which dispose of it, and which regulate those circumstances of matter, method and time, which attend as of consequence on the right of giving and disposing. Again, the law and customs of their Parliament, which include the usage as to "money bills", are a part of the law of their land; our ancestors adopted their system of law in the general, making from time to time such alterations as local diversities required; but that part of their law, which relates to the matter now in question, was never altered by our Legislature, in any period of its history; but on the contrary, the two Houses of Assembly, both under our regal and republican governments, have ever done business on the constant admission that the law of Parliament was their law.—CONGRESS REPORT. FORD ED., ii, 136. (1777.)

5402. ——. The right of levying money, in whatever way, being * * * exercised by the Commons, as their exclusive office, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that they may also exclusively direct its application. "Cujus est dare, ejus est disponere", is an elementary principle both of law and of reason. That he who gives, may direct the application of the gift: or, in other words, may dispose of it; that if he may give absolutely, he may also carve out the conditions, limitations, purposes, and measure of the gift, seems as evidently true as that the greater power contains the lesser.—CONGRESS REPORT. FORD ED., ii, 139. (1778.)

5403. ——. In 1701, the Lords having amended a bill, "for stating and examining the public accounts", by inserting a clause for allowing a particular debt, the Commons disagreed to the amendment; and declared for a reason, "that the disposition, as well as granting of money by act of Parliament, hath ever been in the House of Commons; and, that the amendment relating to the disposal of money does entrench upon that right". And, to a bill of the same nature the year following, the Lords having proposed an amendment, and declared, "that their right in gaming, limiting, and disposing of public aids, being the main hinge of the controversy, they thought it of the highest concern that it should be cleared and settled". They then go on to prove the usage by precedents, and declarations, and from these conclude, "that the limitation, disposition, and manner of account belong only to them".—CONGRESS REPORT. FORD ED., ii, 140. (1778.)

5404. MONEY BILLS, Virginia Constitution and.—Had those who framed the [Virginia] Constitution, as soon as they had completed that work, been asked, man by man, what a money bill was, it is supposed that man by man, they would have referred for answer to the well known laws and usages of Parliament, or would have formed their answer on the Parliamentary idea of that term. Its import, at this day, must be the same as it was then. And it would be as unreasonable, now, to send us to seek its definition in the subsequent proceedings of that body, as it would have been for them, at that day, to have referred us to such proceedings before they had come into existence. The meaning of the term must be supposed complete at the time they use it; and to be sought for in those resources only which existed at the time. Constructions, which do not result from the words of the legislator, but lie hidden in his breast, till called forth, ex post facto, by subsequent occasions, are dangerous, and not to be justified by ordinary emergencies.—CONGRESS REPORT. FORD ED., ii, 138. (1778.)

5405. MONEY (Continental), Depreciation of.—Previous to the Revolution, most of the States were in the habit, whenever they had occasion for more money than could be raised immediately by taxes, to issue paper notes or bills, in the name of the State, wherein they promised to pay to the bearer the sum named in the note or bill. In some of the States no time of payment was fixed, nor tax laid to enable payment. In these, the bills depreciated. But others of the States named in the bill the day when it should be paid, laid taxes to bring in money for that purpose, and paid the bills punctually, on or before the day named. In these States, paper money was in as high estimation as gold and silver. On the commencement of the late Revolution, Congress had no money. The external commerce of the States being suppressed, the farmer could not sell his produce, and, of course, could not pay a tax. Congress had no resource then but in paper money. Not being able to lay a tax for its redemption, they could only promise that taxes should be laid for that purpose, so as to redeem the bills by a certain day. They did not foresee the long continuance of the war, the almost total suppression of their exports, and other events, which rendered the performance of their engagement impossible. The paper money continued for a twelve-month equal to gold and silver. But the quantities which they were obliged to emit for the purpose of the war, exceeded what had been the usual quantity of the circulating medium. It began, therefore, to become cheaper, or, as we expressed it, depreciated, as gold and silver would have done, had they been thrown into circulation in equal quantities. But not having, like them, an intrinsic value, its depreciation was more rapid and greater than could ever have happened with them. In two years, it had fallen to two dollars of paper money for one of silver; in three years, to four for one; in nine months more, it fell to ten for one; and in the six months following, that is to say, by September, 1779, it had fallen to twenty for one. Congress, alarmed at the consequences which were to be apprehended should they lose this resource altogether, thought it necessary to make a vigorous effort to stop its further depreciation. They, therefore, determined, in the first place, that their emissions should not exceed two hundred millions of dollars, to which term they were then nearly arrived; and though they knew that twenty dollars of what they were then issuing would buy no more for their army than one silver dollar would buy, yet they thought it would be worth while to submit to the sacrifice of nineteen out of twenty dollars, if they could thereby stop further depreciation. They, therefore published an address to their constituents, in which they renewed their original declarations, that this paper money should be redeemed at dollar for dollar. They proved the ability of the States to do this, and that their liberty would be cheaply bought at that price. The declaration was ineffectual. No man received the money at a better rate; on the contrary, in six months more, that is, by March, 1780, it had fallen to forty for one. Congress then tried an experiment of a different kind. Considering their former offers to redeem this money at par, as relinquished by the general refusal to take it but in progressive depreciation, they required the whole to be brought in, declared it should be redeemed at its present value, of forty for one, and that they would give to the holders new bills, reduced in their denomination to the sum of gold or silver, which was actually to be paid for them. This would reduce the nominal sum of the mass in circulation to the present worth of that mass, which was five millions; a sum not too great for the circulation of the States, and which, they therefore hoped, would not depreciate further, as they continued firm in their purpose of emitting no more. This effort was as unavailing as the former. Very little of the money was brought in. It continued to circulate and to depreciate till the end of 1780, when it had fallen to seventy-five for one, and the money circulated from the French army, being, by that time, sensible in all the States north of the Potomac, the paper ceased its circulation altogether in those States. In Virginia and North Carolina it continued a year longer, within which time it fell to one thousand for one, and then expired, as it had done in the other States, without a single groan. Not a murmur was heard on this occasion among the people. On the contrary, universal congratulations took place on their seeing this gigantic mass, whose dissolution had threatened convulsions which should shake their infant confederacy to its centre, quietly interred in its grave. Foreigners, indeed, who do not, like the natives, feel indulgence for its memory, as of a being which vindicated their liberties, and fallen in the moment of victory, have been loud, and still are loud in their complaints. A few of them have reason; but the most noisy are not the best of them. They are persons who have become bankrupt by unskilful attempts at commerce with America. That they may have some pretext to offer to their creditors, they have bought up great masses of this dead money in America, where it is to be had at five thousand for one. and they show the certificates of their paper possessions, as if they had all died in their hands, and had been the cause of their bankruptcy. Justice will be done to all, by paying to all persons what this money actually cost them, with an interest of six per cent. from the time they received it. If difficulties present themselves in the ascertaining the epoch of the receipt, it has been thought better that the State should lose, by admitting easy proofs, than that individuals, and especially foreigners, should, by being held to such as would be difficult, perhaps impossible.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 248. FORD ED., iv, 153. (P., 1786.)

5406. MONEY (Continental), Redemption of.—It will be asked, how will the two masses of Continental and State money have cost the people of the United States seventy-two millions of dollars, when they are to be redeemed now, with about six millions? I answer, that the difference, being sixty-six millions, has been lost on the paper bills, separately, by the successive holders of them. Every one, through whose hands a bill passed, lost on that bill what it lost in value, during the time it was in his hands. This was a real tax on him; and, in this way, the people of the United States actually contributed those sixty-six millions of dollars, during the war, and by a mode of taxation the most oppressive of all, because the most unequal of all.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 260. FORD ED., iv, 165. (P., 1786.)

5407. ——. The soldier, victualer, or other person who received forty dollars for a service, at the close of the year 1779, received in fact, no more than he who received one dollar for the same service, in the year 1775, or 1776; because, in those years, the paper money was at par with silver; whereas, by the close of 1799, forty paper dollars were worth but one of silver, and would buy no more of the necessities of life.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 259. FORD ED., iv, 163. (P., 1786.)

5408. ——. As to the paper money in your hands, the States have not yet been able to take final arrangements for its redemption. But, as soon as they get their finances into some order, they will assuredly pay for what it was worth in silver at the time you received it, with interest.—To M. DULER. ii, 64. (P., 1786.) See ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

MONEY (Metallic) Alloy in.—See

5409. MONEY (Metallic) Gold and silver ratio.—The proportion between the values of gold and silver is a mercantile problem altogether. It would be inaccurate to fix it by the popular exchanges of a half Joe for eight dollars, a Louis for four French crowns, or five Louis for twenty-three dollars. The first of these, would be to adopt* the Spanish proportion between gold and silver; the second, the French; the third, a mere popular barter, wherein convenience is consulted more than accuracy. The legal proportion in Spain is 16 for 1; in England 15 1-2 for 1; in France, 15 for 1. * * * Just principles will lead us to disregard legal proportions altogether; to enquire into the market price of gold, in the several countries with which we shall principally be connected in commerce, and to take an average from them. Perhaps we might, with safety, lean to a proportion somewhat above par for gold, considering our neighborhood, and commerce with the sources of the coins, and the tendency which the high price of gold in Spain has, to draw thither all that of their mines, leaving silver principally for our and other markets. It is not impossible that 15 for 1, may be found an eligible proportion. I state it, however, as a conjecture only.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 168. FORD ED., iii, 452. (1784.)

5410. ——. I observed * * * that the true proportion or value between gold and silver was a mercantile problem altogether and that, perhaps, fifteen for one might be found an eligible proportion. The Financier [Robert Morris] is so good as to inform me that this would be higher than the market would justify. Confident of his better information on this subject, I recede from that idea.†—SUPPLEMENTARY EXPLANATIONS. i, 171. FORD ED., iii, 454. (1784.)

5411. ——. There are particular public papers here [Paris] which collect and publish with a good deal of accuracy the facts connected with political arithmetic. In one of these I have just read the following table of the proportion between the value of gold and silver in several countries: Germany 1. to 14 11-71. Spain 1. to 14 3-10. Holland 1. to 14 3-4. England 1. to 15 1-2. France 1. to 14 42-100. Savoy 1. to 14 3-5. Russia 1. to 15. The average is 1. to 14 5-8.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 45. (P., 1785.)

5412. ——. I concur with you * * * in the proportion you establish between the value of the two metals.—To ALEXANDER HAMILTON. iii, 330. (Feb. 1792.) See DOLLAR.

* In the FORD EDITION the text reads, "would be about the Spanish proportion".—EDITOR.

† Jefferson appends this note: "In a newspaper, which frequently gives good details in political economy, I find under the Hamburg head, that the present market price of gold and silver is, in England, 15.5 for 1; in Russia, 15; in Holland, 14.75; in Savoy, 14.6; in France, 14.42; in Spain, 14.3; in Germany, 14.15; the average of which is 14.675 or 14 5-8. I would still incline to give a little more than the market price for gold, because of its superior convenience in transportation."—EDITOR.

5413. MONEY (Metallic), Payments in.—As the laws authorize the payment of a given number of dollars to you, and as your duties place you in London, I suppose we are to pay you the dollars there, or other money of equal value, estimated by the par of the metals. Such has, accordingly, been the practice ever since the close of the war.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 526. (Pa., 1793.) See BANKS, DOLLAR, MONEY, NATIONAL CURRENCY, and PAPER MONEY.

5414. MONEY (Metallic) vs. PAPER MONEY.—Sober thinkers cannot prefer a paper medium at 13 per cent. interest to gold and silver for nothing.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., v, 350. (Pa., 1791.)

5415. ——. Experience has proved to us that a dollar of silver disappears for every dollar of paper emitted.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 268. FORD ED., v, 353. (Pa., July, 1791.)

5418. MONOPOLY, Banking.—The bill for establishing a National Bank undertakes * * * to form the subscribers into a corporation [and] * * * to give them the sole and exclusive right of banking under the national authority; and so far is against the laws of Monopoly.—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii, 555. 5420. MONOPOLY, Colonies and.—The monopoly of our [the Colonies] trade * * * brings greater loss to us and benefit to them than the amount of our proportional contributions to the common defence [of the empire].—ADDRESS TO GOVERNOR DUNMORE. FORD ED., i, 457. (1775.)

5421. ——. The Congress stated the lowest terms they thought possible to be accepted, in order to convince the world they were not unreasonable. They gave up the monopoly and regulation of trade, and all acts of Parliament prior to 1764, leaving to British generosity to render these, at some future time, as easy to America as the interest of Britain would admit.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 201. FORD ED., i, 483. (M., 1775.)

5422. ——. It is not just that the Colonies should be required to oblige themselves to other contributions while Great Britain possesses a monopoly of their trade. This does of itself lay them under heavy contribution. To demand, therefore, an additional contribution in the form of a tax, is to demand the double of their equal proportion. If we are to contribute equally with the other parts of the empire, let us equally with them enjoy free commerce with the whole world. But while the restrictions on our trade shut to us the resources of wealth, is it just we should bear all other burthens equally with those to whom every resource is open?—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 479. (July 1775.) See COLONIES.

5423. MONOPOLY, Commerce and.—By a declaration of rights, I mean one which shall stipulate * * * freedom of commerce against monopolies.—To A. DONALD. ii, 355. (P., 1788.)

5424. ——. The British have wished a monopoly of commerce * * * with us, and they have in fact obtained it.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 172. FORD ED., vii, 121. (Pa., 1797.) See COMMERCE and FREE TRADE.

5425. ——. Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review the * * * shackles on commerce by monopolies.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

5426. MONOPOLY, Corporations.—Nor should we wonder at the pressure [for a fixed constitution in France in 1788-9], when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which this people were ground to powder. * * * the shackles * * * ; on industry by guilds and corporations * * *.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.) See INCORPORATION.

5427. MONOPOLY, Farmers General.—The true obstacle to this proposition has penetrated, in various ways, through the veil which covers it. The influence of the Farmers General has been heretofore found sufficient to shake a minister in his office. Monsieur de Calonne's continuance or dismissal has been thought, for some time, to be on a poise. Were he to shift this great weight, therefore, out of his own scale into that of his adversaries, it would decide their preponderance. The joint interests of France and America would be insufficient counterpoise in his favor.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix, 242. FORD ED., iv, 129. (P., 1785.)

5428. ——. As to the article of tobacco, which had become an important branch of remittance to almost all the States, I had the honor of communicating to you my proposition to the Court to abolish the monopoly of it in their farm; that the Count de Vergennes was, I thought, thoroughly sensible of the expediency of this proposition, and disposed to befriend it; that the renewal of the lease of the farms had been consequently suspended six months and was still in suspense, but that so powerful were the Farmers General and so tottering the tenure of the Minister of Finance in his office, that I despaired of preventing the renewal of the farm at that time. Things were in this state when the Marquis de Lafayette * * * proposed to me a conference with some persons well acquainted with the commercial system of this country. We met. They proposed the endeavoring to have a committee appointed to inquire into the subject. The proposition was made to the Count de Vergennes, who befriended it, and had the Marquis de Lafayette named a member of the committee. He became, of course, the active and truly zealous member for the liberty of commerce; others, though well-disposed, not choosing to oppose the farm openly. * * * The committee showed an early and decisive conviction that the measure taken by the farm to put the purchase of their tobaccos into monopoly on that side of the water, as the sale of them was on this, tended to the annihilation of commerce between the two countries. Various palliatives were proposed from time to time. I confess that I met them all with indifference; my object being a radical cure of the evils by discontinuing the farm, and not a mere assuagement of it for the present moment, which, rendering it more bearable, might lessen the necessity of removing it totally, and perhaps prevent that removal.—To JOHN JAY. FORD ED., IV, 232. (P., 1786.)

5429. — —. The Count de Vergennes said that the difficulty of changing so ancient an institution [Farmers General] was immense; that the King draws from it a revenue of 29 millions of livres; that an interruption of this revenue at least, if not a diminution, would attend a change; that their finances were not in a condition to bear even an interruption, and in short that no minister could venture to take upon himself so hazardous an operation. This was only saying explicitly what I had long been sensible of, that the Comptroller General's continuance in office was too much on a poise to permit him to shift this weight out of his own scale into that of his adversaries; and that we must be contented to await the completion of the public expectation that there will be a change in this office, which change may give us another chance for effecting this desirable reformation.—To JOHN JAY. FORD ED., IV, 234. (P., 1786.)

5430. — —. The only question agitated [at the next meeting of the committee] was how best to relieve the trade under its double monopoly. The committee found themselves supported by the presence and sentiments of the Count de Vergennes. They, therefore, resolved that the contract with Mr. Morris, if executed on his part, ought not to be annulled here, but that no similar one should ever be made hereafter; that, so long as it continued, the Farmers should be to purchase from twelve to fifteen thousand hhds. of tobacco a year, over and above what they should receive from Mr. Morris, from such merchants as should bring it in French or American vessels, on the same conditions contracted with Mr. Morris; providing, however, that where the cargo shall not be assorted, the prices shall be $38, $36 and $34 for the 1st, 2d and 3d qualities of whichever the cargo may consist. In case of dispute about the quality, specimens are to be sent to the council, who will appoint persons to examine and decide on it. This is indeed the least bad of all the palliatives which have been proposed; but it contains the seeds of perpetual trouble. It is easy to foresee that the Farmers will multiply the difficulties and vexations on those who shall propose to sell to them by force, and that these will be making perpetual complaints, so that both parties will be kept on the fret. If, without fatiguing the friendly dispositions of the ministry, this should give them just so much trouble as may induce them to look to the demolition of the monopoly as a desirable point of rest, it may produce permanent as well as temporary good.—To JOHN JAY. FORD ED., IV, 235. (P., 1786.)

5431. — —. The body [Farmers General] to which this monopoly [tobacco] was given, was not mercantile. Their object is to simplify as much as possible the administration of their affairs. They sell for cash; they purchase, therefore, with cash. Their interest, their principles and their practice, seem opposed to the general interest of the kingdom, which would require that this capital article should be laid open to a free exchange for the productions of this country. So far does the spirit of simplifying their operations govern this body, that relinquishing the advantages to be derived from a competition of sellers, they contracted some time ago with a single person (Mr. Morris), for three years' supplies of American tobacco, to be paid for in cash. They obliged themselves too, expressly, to employ no other person to purchase in America, during that term. In consequence of this, the mercantile houses of France, concerned in sending her productions to be exchanged for tobacco, cut off, for three years, from the hope of selling these tobaccos in France, were of necessity to abandon that commerce. In consequence of this, too, a single individual, constituted sole purchaser of so great a proportion of the tobaccos made, had the price in his own power. A great reduction in it took place, and that, not only on the quantity he bought, but on the whole quantity made. The loss to the States producing the article did not go to cheapening it for their friends here. Their price was fixed. What was gained on their consumption was to enrich the person purchasing it; the rest, the monopolists and merchants of other countries.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 186. (P., 1787.)

monopoly of the commerce of the Creek nation, with a right of importing their goods duty free, and considering these privileges as the principal sources of his power over that nation, is unwilling to enter into treaty with us, unless they can be continued to him. And the question is how this may be done consistently with our laws, and so as to avoid just complaints from those of our citizens who would wish to participate of the trade? Our citizens, at this time, are not permitted to trade in that nation. The nation has a right to give us their peace, and to withhold their commerce, to place it under whatever monopolies or regulations they please. If they insist that only Colonel McGillivray and his company shall be permitted to trade among them, we have no right to say the contrary. We shall even gain some advantage in substituting citizens of the United States instead of British subjects, as associates of Colonel McGillivray, and excluding both British subjects and Spaniards from the country. Suppose, then, it be expressly stipulated by treaty, that no person be permitted to trade in the Creek country, without a license from the President, but that a fixed number shall be permitted to trade there at all, and that the goods imported for and sent to the Creek nation, shall be duty free. It may further be either expressed that the person licensed shall be approved by the leader or leaders of the nation, or without this, it may be understood between the President and McGillivray that the stipulated number of licenses shall be sent to him blank, to fill up.—OPINION ON INDIAN TRADE. vii, 504. FORD ED., v, 215. (1790.)

5433. ——. The enclosed reclamations of Girod and Choate against the claims of Bapstropp to a monopoly of the Indian commerce, supposed to be under the protection of the 3rd article of the Louisiana Convention, as well as some other claims to abusive grants, will probably force us to meet that question. * * * Congress has [extended] about twenty particular laws * * * to Louisiana. Among these is the act concerning intercourse with the Indians, which establishes a system of intercourse with them admitting no monopoly. That class of rights, therefore, is now taken from under the treaty, and placed under the principles of our laws.—TO JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 313. (July 1804.)

5434. MONOPOLY, Of influence.—The British have wished a monopoly of influence with us, and they have, in fact, obtained it.—TO ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 172. FORD ED., vii, 121. (Pa., 1797.)

5435. MONOPOLY, Inventions and.—I like the declaration of rights as far as it goes, but I should have been for going further. For instance, the following alterations and additions would have pleased me. * * * Article. 9. Monopolies may be allowed to persons for their own productions in literature, and their own inventions in the arts, for a term not exceeding — years, but for no longer term, and for no other purpose.—TO JAMES MADISON. iii, 101. FORD ED., v, 113. (P., Aug. 1789.)

5436. ——. To embarrass society with monopolies for every utensil existing, and in all the details of life, would be more injurious to them than had the supposed inventors never existed; because the natural understanding of its members would have suggested the same things or others as good.—TO OLIVER EVANS. v, 75. (M., 1807.) See INVENTIONS AND PATENTS.

5437. MONOPOLY, Of the judiciary.—It is the self-appointment [of the county courts] I wish to correct; to find some means of breaking up a cabal, when such a one gets possession of the bench. When this takes place, it becomes the most afflicting of tyrannies, because its powers are so various, and exercised on everything most immediately around us. And how many instances have you and I known of these monopolies of county administration? I know a county in which a particular family (a numerous one) got possession of the bench, and for a whole generation never admitted a man on it who was not of its clan or connection. I know a county now of one thousand and five hundred militia, of which sixty are federalists. Its court is of thirty members, of whom twenty are federalists (every third man of the sect). There are large and populous districts in it without a justice, because without a federalist for appointment; the militia are as disproportionately under federal officers. * * * The remaining one thousand four hundred and forty, free, fighting and paying citizens, are governed by men neither of their choice or confidence, and without a hope of relief. They are certainly excluded from the blessings of a free government for life, and indefinitely, for aught the Constitution has provided. This solecism may be called anything but republican.—TO JOHN TAYLOR. vii, 18. FORD ED., x, 52. (M., 1816.)

5438. MONOPOLY, Land.—The property of France is absolutely concentrated in a very few hands, having revenues of from half a million of guineas a year downwards. These employ the flower of the country as servants, some of them having as many as two hundred domestics, not laboring. They employ also a great number of manufacturers, and tradesmen, and lastly the class of laboring husbandmen. But after all, there comes the most numerous of all the classes, that is, the poor who cannot find work. I asked myself what could be the reason that so many should be permitted to beg who are willing to work, in a country where there is a very considerable proportion of uncultivated lands? Those lands are undisturbed only for the sake of game. It should seem then that it must be because of the enormous wealth of the proprietors which places them above attention to the increase of their revenues by permitting these lands to be labored.—TO REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 35. (P., 1785.)

5439. MONOPOLY, Limited.—I sincerely rejoice at the acceptance of the new Constitution by nine States. It is a good canvas, on which some strokes only want retouching. What these are, I think are sufficiently manifested by the general voice from north to south, which calls for a bill of rights. It seems pretty generally understood that this should go to * * * monopolies. * * * The saying there shall be no monopolies, lessens the incitements to ingenuity, which is spurred on by the hope of a monopoly for a limited time, as of fourteen years; but the benefit of even limited monopolies is too doubtful to be opposed to that of their general suppression.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v, 45. (P., July 1788.)

5440. MONOPOLY, Military.—Nor should we wonder at the pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9], when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * the [French] people were ground to powder, when we pass in review the * * * monopoly of military honors by the noblesse * * *.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

5441. MONOPOLY, Of office.—When it is considered that during the late administration, those who were not of a particular sect of politics were excluded from all office; when, by a steady pursuit of this measure, nearly the whole offices of the United States were monopolized by that sect; when the public sentiment at length declared itself, and burst open the doors of honor and confidence to those whose opinions they more approved, was it to be imagined that this monopoly of office was still to be continued in the hands of the minority? Does it violate their equal rights to assert some rights in the majority also? Is it political intolerance to claim a proportionate share in the direction of the public affairs? Can they not harmonize in society unless they have everything in their own hands?—To THE NEW HAVEN COMMITTEE. iv, 404. FORD ED., viii, 69. (W., July 1801.)

5442. MONOPOLY, Restrict.—I do not like [in the new Federal Constitution] the omission of a bill of rights, providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for * * * restriction of monopolies.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 329. FORD ED., iv, 476. (P., December 1787.)

5443. MONOPOLY, Special privileges.—Monopolizing compensations are among the most fatal abuses which some governments practice from false economy.—OPINION ON STEVENS CASE. ix, 474. (1804.)

5444. MONOPOLY, Suppress.—A company had silently and by unfair means obtained a monopoly for the making and selling spermaceti candles [in France]. As soon as we* discovered it, we solicited its suppression which is effected by a clause in the Arret.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 342. (P., 1787.)

* An acknowledgment of Lafayette's assistance.—EDITOR.

5445. MONOPOLY, Tobacco.—The abolition of the monopoly of our tobacco in the hands of the Farmers General will be pushed by us with all our force. But it is so interwoven with the very foundations of their system of finance that it is of doubtful event.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 20. (P., Dec. 1784.)

5446. — — — The monopoly of the purchase of tobacco in France discourages both the French and American merchant from bringing it here, and from taking in exchange the manufactures and productions of France. It is contrary to the spirit of trade, and to the dispositions of merchants, to carry a commodity to any market where but one person is allowed to buy it, and where, of course, that person fixes its price which the seller must receive, or reexport his commodity, at the loss of his voyage thither. Experience accordingly shows that they carry it to other markets, and that they take in exchange the merchandise of the place where they deliver it. I am misinformed, if France has not been furnished from a neighboring nation with considerable quantities of tobacco since the peace, and been obliged to pay there in coin, what might have been paid here (France) in manufactures, had the French and American merchants brought the tobacco originally here. I suppose, too, that the purchases made by the Farmers General in America are paid for chiefly in coin, which coin is also remitted directly hence to England, and makes an important part of the balance supposed to be in favor of that nation against this. Should the Farmers General, by themselves, or by the company to whom they may commit the procuring these tobaccos from America, require, for the satisfaction of government on this head, the exportation of a proportion of merchandise in exchange for them, it would be an unpromising expedient. It would only commit the exports, as well as imports, between France and America, to a monopoly which, being secure against rivals in the sale of the merchandise of France, would not be likely to sell at such moderate prices as might encourage its consumption there, and enable it to bear a competition with similar articles from other countries. I am persuaded this exportation of coin may be prevented, and that of commodities effected, by leaving both operations to the French and American merchants, instead of the Farmers General. They will import a sufficient quantity of tobacco, if they are allowed a perfect freedom in the sale; and they will receive in payment, wines, oils, brandies, and manufactures, instead of coin; forcing each other, by their competition, to bring tobaccos of the best quality; to give to the French manufacturer the full worth of his merchandise, and to sell to the American consumer at the lowest price they can afford; thus encouraging him to use, in preference, the merchandise of this country.—To COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 386. (P., 1785.)

5447. ——. If, by a simplification of the collection of the King's duty on tobacco, the cost of that collection can be reduced even to five per cent., or a million and a half, instead of twenty-five millions; the price to the consumer will be reduced from three to two livres the pound. * * * The price, being thus reduced one-third, would be brought within the reach of a new and numerous circle of the people, who cannot, at present, afford themselves this luxury. The consumption, then, would probably increase, and perhaps, in the same if not a greater proportion with the reduction of the price; that is to say, from twenty-four to thirty-six millions of pounds; and the King, continuing to receive twenty-five sous on the pound, as at present, would receive forty-five instead of thirty millions of livres, while his subjects would pay but two livres for an object which has heretofore cost them three. Or if, in event, the consumption were not to be increased, he would levy only forty-eight millions on his people, where seventy-two millions are now levied, and would leave twenty-four millions in their pockets, either to remain there, or to be levied in some other form, should the state of revenue require it. It will enable his subjects, also, to dispose of between nine and ten millions worth of their produce and manufactures, instead of sending nearly that sum annually, in coin, to enrich a neighboring nation.—To COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 388. (P., 1785.)

5448. ——. I have heard two objections made to the suppression of this monopoly. 1. That it might increase the importation of tobacco in contraband. 2. That it would lessen the abilities of the Farmers General to make occasional loans of money to the public treasury. * * * With respect to the first * * * I may observe that contraband does not increase on lessening the temptations to it. It is now encouraged by those who engage in it being able to sell for sixty sous what cost but fourteen, leaving a gain of forty-six sous. When the price shall be reduced from sixty to forty sous, the gain will be but twenty-six, that is to say, a little more than one-half of what it is at present. It does not seem a natural consequence then, that contraband should be increased by reducing its gain nearly one-half. As to the second objection, if we suppose (for elucidation and without presuming to fix) the proportion of the farm on tobacco, at one-eighth of the whole mass farmed, the abilities of the Farmers General to lend will be reduced one-eighth, that is, they can hereafter lend only seven millions, where heretofore they have lent eight. It is to be considered, then, whether this eighth (or other proportion, whatever it be) is worth the annual sacrifice of twenty-four millions, or if a much smaller sacrifice to other moneyed men, will not produce the same loans of money in the ordinary way.—To COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 389. (P., 1785.)

5449. ——. While the advantages of an increase of revenue to the crown, a diminution of impost on the people, and a payment in merchandise, instead of money, are conjectured as likely to result to France from a suppression of the monopoly on tobacco, we have also reason to hope some advantages on our part * * *. I do not expect this advantage will be by any augmentation of price. The other markets of Europe have too much influence on this article to admit any sensible augmentation of price to take place. But the advantage I principally expect is an increase of consumption. This will give us a vent for so much more, and, of consequence, find employment for so many more cultivators of the earth; and, in whatever proportion it increases this production for us, in the same proportion will it procure additional vent for the merchandise of France, and employment for the hands that produce it. I expect, too, that by bringing our merchants here, they would procure a number of commodities in exchange, better in kind and cheaper in price.—To THE COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 390. (P., 1785.)

5450. ——. I observed [to the Count de Vergennes] that France paid us two millions of livres for tobacco; that for such portions of it as were bought in London, they sent the money directly there, and for what they bought in the United States, the money was still remitted to London by bills of exchange; whereas, if they would permit our merchants to sell this article freely, they would bring it here, and take the returns on the spot in merchandise, not money. The Count observed that my proposition contained what was doubtless useful, but that the king received on this article, at present, a revenue of twenty-eight millions, which was so considerable as to render them fearful of tampering with it; that the collection of this revenue by way of Farm was of very ancient date, and that it was always hazardous to alter arrangements of long standing, and of such infinite combinations with the fiscal system. I answered, that the simplicity of the mode of collection proposed for this article, withdrew it from all fear of deranging other parts of their system; that I supposed they would confine the importation to some of their principal ports, probably not more than five or six; that a single collector in each of these was the only new officer requisite; that he could get rich himself on six livres a hoghead, and would receive the whole revenue, and pay it into the treasury, at short hand.—CONFERENCE WITH COUNT DE VERGENNES. ix, 232. FORD ED., iv, 119. (1785.)

5451. ——. I have received the propositions of Messrs. Ross, Pleasants, &c., for furnishing tobacco to the Farmers General; but Mr. Morris had, in the meantime, obtained the contract. I have been fully sensible of the baneful influence on the commerce of France and America, which this double monopoly will have. I have struck at its root here, and spared no pains to have the farm itself demolished, but it has been in vain. The persons interested in it are too powerful to be opposed, even by the interest of the whole country.—To GOVERNOR PATRICK HENRY. i, 515. FORD ED., iv, 137. (P., 1786.)

5452. ——. Till I see all hope of removing the evil [the tobacco monopoly in France] by the roots desperate, I cannot propose to prune its branches.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 549. FORD ED., iv, 213. (P., 1786.)

5453. ——. Morris's contract for sixty thousand hogheads of tobacco has been concluded with the Farmers General. I have been for some time occupied in endeavoring to destroy the root of the evils which the tobacco trade encounters in this country, by making the ministers sensible that merchants will not bring a commodity to a market, where but one person is allowed to buy it; and that so long as that single purchaser is obliged to go to foreign markets for it, he must pay for it in coin, and not in commodities. These truths have made their way to the minds of the ministry, insomuch as to have delayed the execution of the new lease of the Farms six months. It is renewed, however, for three years, but so as not to render impossible a reformation of this great evil. They are sensible of the evil, but it is so interwoven with their fiscal system, that they find it hazardous to disentangle. The temporary distress, too, of the revenue, they are not prepared to meet. My hopes, therefore, are weak, though not quite desperate. When they become so, it will remain to look about for the best palliative this monopoly can bear. My present idea is that it will be found in a prohibition to the Farmers General to purchase tobacco anywhere but in France.—To JAMES ROSS. i, 560. FORD ED., iv, 216. (P., 1786.)

5455. ——. I think that so long as the monopoly in the sale [of tobacco] is kept up, it is of no consequence to us how they modify the pill for their own internal relief; but, on the contrary, the worse it remains, the more necessary it will render a reformation. Any palliative would take from us all those arguments and friends that would be satisfied with accommodation. The Marquis de Lafayette, though differing from me in opinion on this point, has, however, adhered to my principle of absolute liberty or nothing.—To COL. MONROE. i, 568. FORD ED., iv, 225. (P., 1786.)

5456. ——. Some symptoms make me suspect that my proceedings to reduce the abusive administration of tobacco by the Farmers General have indisposed towards me a powerful person in Philadelphia, who was profiting from that abuse. An expression in the enclosed letter of M. de Calonne would seem to imply that I had asked the abolition of Mr. Morris's contract. I never did. On the contrary, I always observed to them that it would be unjust to annul that contract. I was led to this by principles both of justice and interest. Of interest, because that contract would keep up the price of tobacco here to thirty-four, thirty-six and thirty-eight livres, from which it will fall when it shall no longer have that support. However, I have done what was right, and I will not so far wound my privilege of doing that, without regard to any man's interest, as to enter into any explanation of this paragraph with him. Yet I esteem him highly, and suppose that hitherto he had esteemed me.—To JAMES MONROE. ii, 70. (P., 1786.)

5458. ——. Of these eighty millions [of American exports to Europe], thirty are constituted by the single article of tobacco. Could the whole of this be brought into the ports of France, to satisfy its own demands, and the residue to be revended to other nations, it would be a powerful link of commercial connection. But we are far from this.

Even her own consumption, supposed to be nine millions, under the administration of the monopoly to which it is farmed, enters little, as an article of exchange, into the commerce of the two nations. When this article was first put into Farm, perhaps it did not injure the commercial interests of the kingdom; because nothing but British manufactures were then allowed to be given in return for American tobaccos. The laying the trade open, then, to all the subjects of France, would not have relieved her from a payment in money. Circumstances are changed; yet the old institution remains.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 186. (P., 1787.)

5460. ——. The governments have nothing to do, but not to hinder their merchants from making the exchange.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 189. (P., 1787.)

5461. MONOPOLY, Western trade.—The Ohio and its branches, which head up against the Potomac, afford the shortest water communication by five hundred miles of any which can ever be got between the western waters and Atlantic; and, of course, promise us almost a monopoly of the Western and Indian trade.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 402. (A., Feb. 1784.)

5462. MONOPOLY, Whale oil.—My endeavors for emancipating the tobacco trade have been less successful [than have been those with respect to whale oil]. I still continue to stir, however, this and all other articles.—To MR. OTTO. i, 559. (P., 1786.)

5463. ——. On the subject of the whale fishery, I enclose you some observations I drew up for the ministry here, in order to obtain a correction of their Arret of September last, whereby they had involved our oils with the English, in a general exclusion from their ports. They will accordingly correct this, so that our oils will participate with theirs, in the monopoly of their markets.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 538. FORD ED., v, 60. (P., 1788.)

5464. ——. I have obtained the promise of an explanatory Arret to declare that that of September 28 [1788], was not meant to extend to us. Orders are accordingly given in the ports to receive our [oils]. This places us on a better footing than ever, as it gives us a monopoly of this market in conjunction with the French fishermen.—To THOMAS PAINE. ii, 549. (P., 1788.)

5465. MONROE DOCTRINE, Jefferson and.—The question presented by the letters*

* The letters were those of Mr. Rush, our minister at the Court of St. James's, in which he communi-

you have sent me, is the most momentous which has been offered to my contemplation since that of Independence. That made us a nation, this sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on us. And never could we embark on it under circumstances more auspicious. Our first and fundamental maxim should be, never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her own. She should therefore have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be, to make our hemisphere that of freedom. One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this pursuit: she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition, we detach her from the bands, bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate a continent at one stroke, which might otherwise linger long in doubt and difficulty. Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of any one, or all on earth; and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world. With her, then, we should most sedulously cherish a cordial friendship; and nothing would tend more to knit our affections than to be fighting once more, side by side in the same cause. Not that I would purchase even her amity at the price of taking part in her wars. But the war in which the present proposition might engage us, should that be its consequence, is not her war, but ours. Its object is to introduce and establish the American system, of keeping out of our land all foreign powers, of never permitting those of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our nations. It is to maintain our own principle, not to depart from it. And if, to facilitate this, we can effect a division in the body of the European powers, and draw over to our side its most powerful member, surely we should do it. But I am clearly of Mr. Canning's opinion, that, it will prevent instead of provoke war. With Great Britain withdrawn from their scale and shifted into that of our two continents, all Europe combined would not undertake such a war. For how would they propose to get at either enemy without superior fleets? Nor is the occasion to be slighted which this proposition offers, of declaring our protest against the atrocious violations of the rights of nations, by the interference of any one in the internal affairs of another, so flagitiously begun by Bonaparte, and now continued by the equally lawless Alliance, calling itself Holy. But we have first to ask ourselves a question. Do we wish to acquire to our own confederacy any one or more of the Spanish provinces? I candidly confess, that I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition which could ever be made to our system of States. The control which, with Florida Point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico, and the countries and isthmus bordering on it, as well as all those whose waters flow into it, would fill up the measure of our political well-being. Yet, as I am sensible that this can never be obtained, even with her own consent, but by war; and its independence, which is our second interest (and especially its independence of England), can be secured without it. I have no hesitation in abandoning my first wish to future chances, and accepting its independence, with peace and the friendship of England, rather than its association, at the expense of war and her enmity. I could honestly, therefore, join in the declaration proposed, that we aim not at the acquisition of any of those possessions, that we will not stand in the way of any amicable arrangement between them and the mother country; but that we will oppose, with all our means, the forcible interposition of any other power, as auxiliary, stipendiary, or under any other form or pretext, and most especially, their transfer to any power by conquest, cession, or acquisition in any other way.* I should

* The subjoined extract from President Monroe's Message to Congress on Dec. 2d, 1823, embodies the Monroe Doctrine:

"In the wars of European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defence. With the movements on this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers [the Holy Alliance] is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defence of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the Government de facto as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy; meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend cated to President Monroe the proposition of Mr. Canning that the United States and England should issue a joint declaration announcing that, while the two governments desired for themselves no portion of the Spanish-American colonies, then in revolt against Spain, they would not view with indifference any foreign intervention in their affairs, or their acquisition by a third power. The declaration was intended to be a warning to the allied powers, Russia, Prussia and Austria, the members of the Holy Alliance.—EDITOR.

think it, therefore, advisable, that the Executive should encourage the British government to a continuance in the dispositions expressed in these letters, by an assurance of his concurrence with them as far as his authority goes; and that as it may lead to war, the declaration of which requires an act of Congress, the case shall be laid before them for consideration at their first meeting, and under the reasonable aspect in which it is seen by himself. I have been so long weaned from political subjects, and have so long ceased to take any interest in them, that I am sensible I am not qualified to offer opinions on them worthy of any attention. But the question now proposed involves consequences so lasting, and effects so decisive of our future destinies, as to rekindle all the interest I have heretofore felt on such occasions, and to induce me to the hazard of opinions, which will prove only my wish to contribute still my mite towards anything which may be useful to our country.*—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 315. FORD ED., x, 277. (M., October 1823.) See POLICY.

5466. MONROE (James), Ability.—

Many points in Monroe's character would render him the most valuable acquisition the republican interest in this Legislature [Congress] could make.—To JOHN TAYLOR. FORD ED., vii, 322. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

5467. ———. I clearly think with you on the competence of Monroe to embrace great views of action. The decision of his character, his enterprise, firmness, industry, and unceasing vigilance, would, I believe, secure, as I am sure they would merit, the public confidence, and give us all the success which our means can accomplish.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 81. FORD ED., ix, 368. (M., Oct. 1812.)

5468. MONROE (James), Book by.—

Your book * * * works irresistibly. It would be very gratifying to you to hear the unqualified eulogies both on the matter and manner by all who are not hostile to it from principle.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 183. (Pa., Dec. 1797.)

their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can any one believe that our Southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference."—EDITOR.

* Morse, in his Life of Jefferson (p. 235), says: "It is curious to note that in the course of this business (navigation of Mississippi), there was already a faint foreshadowing of that principle, which many years afterwards was christened with the name of Monroe. For a brief time it was thought, not without reason, that so soon as hostilities should break out between England and Spain, the former power would seize upon the North American possessions of the latter. Jefferson wrote to Gouverneur Morris: 'We wish you, therefore, to intimate to them (the British ministry) that we cannot be indifferent to enterprises of this kind. That we should contemplate a change of neighbors with extreme uneasiness. That a due balance on our borders is not less desirable to us than a balance of power in Europe has always appeared to them.'"—EDITOR.

5470. MONROE (James), British treaty and.—You complain of the manner in which the [British] treaty was received. But what was that manner? I cannot suppose you to have given a moment's credit to the stuff which was crowded in all sorts of forms into the public papers, or to the thousand speeches they put into my mouth, not a word of which I had ever uttered. I was not insensible at the time of the views to mischief, with which these lies were fabricated. But my confidence was firm, that neither yourself nor the British government, equally outraged by them, would believe me capable of making the editors of newspapers the confidants of my speeches or opinions. The fact was this. The treaty was communicated to us by Mr. Erskine on the day Congress was to rise. Two of the senators enquired of me in the evening, whether it was my purpose to detain them on account of the treaty. My answer was, "that it was not; that the treaty containing no provision against the impressment of our seamen, and being accompanied by a kind of protestation of the British ministers, which would leave that government free to consider it as a treaty or no treaty, according to their own convenience, I should not give them the trouble of deliberating on it." This was substantially, and almost verbally, what I said whenever spoken to about it, and I never failed when the occasion would admit of it, to justify yourself and Mr. Pinckney, by expressing my conviction, that it was all that could be obtained from the British government; that you had told their commissioners that your government could not be pledged to ratify, because it was contrary to their instructions; of course, that it should be considered but as a projet; and in this light I stated it publicly in my message to Congress on the opening of the session. Not a single article of the treaty was ever made known beyond the members of the administration, nor would an article of it be known at this day, but for its publication in the newspapers, as communicated by somebody from beyond the water, as we have always understood. But as to myself, I can solemnly protest, as the most sacred of truths, that I never, one instant, lost sight of your reputation and favorable standing with your country, and never omitted to justify your failure to attain our wish, as one which was probably unattainable. Reviewing, therefore, this whole subject, I cannot doubt you will become sensible, that your impressions have been without just ground.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 254. FORD ED., ix, 179. (W., March 1808.) See IMPRESSMENT.

5471. MONROE (James), Confidence in.—

I have had, and still have, such entire confidence in the late and present Presidents, that I willingly put both soul and body into their pockets.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 111. FORD ED., x, 120. (M., 1819.)

5472. MONROE (James), Defence of.—

I should be glad to see the defence of Monroe's conduct which you possess, though no paper of that title is necessary to me. He was appointed to an office during pleasure merely to get him out of the Senate, and with an intention to seize the first pretext for exercising the pleasure of recalling him. * * * I think with you it will be best to publish nothing concerning Colonel Monroe till his return, that he may accommodate the complexion of his publication to times and circumstances.—To JOHN EDWARDS. iv, 164. FORD ED., vii, 112. (M., Jan. 1797.)

5474. MONROE (James), Diplomatic expenses.—Although it is not pleasant to fall short in returning civilities, yet necessity has rendered this so familiar in Europe as not to lessen respect for the person whose circumstances do not permit a return of hospitalities. I see by your letters the pain which this situation gives you, and I can estimate its acuteness from the generosity of your nature. But, my dear friend, calculate with mathematical rigor the pain annexed to each branch of the dilemma, and pursue that which brings the least. To give up entertainment, and to live with the most rigorous economy till you have cleared yourself of every demand is a pain for a definite time only; but to return here with accumulated encumbrances on you, will fill your life with torture. We wish to do everything for you which law and rule will permit. But more than this would injure you as much as us. Believing that the mission to Spain will enable you to suspend expense greatly in London, and to apply your salary during your absence to the clearing off your debt, you will be instructed to proceed there as soon as you shall have regulated certain points of neutral right for us with England, or as soon as you find nothing in that way can be done.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 288. (W., Jan. 1804.)

5475. MONROE (James), Distaste for law.—You wish not to engage in the drudgery of the bar. You have two asylums from that. Either to accept a seat in the Council, or in the Judiciary department. The latter, however, would require a little previous drudgery at the bar to qualify you to discharge your duty with satisfaction to yourself. Neither of these would be inconsistent with a continued residence at Albemarle. It is but twelve hours' drive in a sulky from Charlottesville to Richmond, keeping a fresh horse always at the half-way, which would be a small annual expense.—To JAMES MONROE. ii, 71. (P., 1786.)

5476. MONROE (James), English mission.—I perceive that painful impressions have been made on your mind during your late mission, of which I had never entertained a suspicion. I must, therefore, examine the grounds, because explanations between reasonable men can never but do good. 1. You consider the mission of Mr. Pinkney as an associate, to have been in some way injurious to you. Were I to take that measure on myself, I might say in its justification, that it has been the regular and habitual practice of the United States to do this, under every form in which their government has existed. I need not recapitulate the multiplied instances, because you will readily recollect them. I went as an adjunct to Dr. Franklin, and Mr. Adams, yourself as an adjunct first to Mr. Livingston, and then to Mr. Pinkney, and I really believe there has scarcely been a great occasion which has not produced an extraordinary mission. Still, however, it is well known that I was strongly opposed to it in the case of which you complain. A committee of the Senate called on me with two resolutions of that body, on the subject of impressment and spoliation by Great Britain, and requesting that I would demand satisfaction. After delivering the resolutions, the committee entered into free conversation, and observed that although the Senate could not, in form, recommend any extraordinary mission, yet that as individuals, there was but one sentiment among them on the measure, and they pressed it. I was so much averse to it, and gave them so hard an answer, that they felt it, and spoke of it. But it did not end here. The members of the other House took up the subject, and set upon me individually, and these the best friends to you, as well as myself, and represented the responsibility which a failure to obtain redress would throw on us both, pursuing a conduct in opposition to the opinion of nearly every member of the Legislature. I found it necessary, at length, to yield my own opinion to the general sense of the national council, and it really seemed to produce a jubilee among them; not from any want of confidence in you, but from a belief in the effect which an extraordinary mission would have on the British mind, by demonstrating the degree of importance which this country attached to the rights which we considered as infringed.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 253. FORD ED., ix, 178. (W., March 1808.)

5477. MONROE (James), Friendship for.—I have ever viewed Mr. Madison and yourself as two principal pillars of my happiness. Were either to be withdrawn, I should consider it as among the greatest calamities which could assail my future peace of mind. I have great confidence that the candor and high understanding of both will guard me against this misfortune, the bare possibility of which has so far weighed on my mind, that I could not be easy without unburthening it.*—To JAMES MONROE. v, 248. FORD ED., ix, 178. (W., Feb. 1808.)

5480. MONROE (James), Louisiana purchase.—I find our opposition is very willing to pluck feathers from Monroe [on the acquisition of Louisiana], although not fond of sticking them into Livingston's coat. The truth is, both have a just portion of merit; and were it necessary or proper, it could be shown that each has rendered peculiar services, and of important value.—To GENERAL HORATIO GATES. iv, 495. FORD ED., viii, 249. (W., July 1803.) See LOUISIANA.

5481. MONROE (James), Madison and.—I had * * * a frank conversation with Colonel Monroe. * * * I reminded him that in the letter I wrote to him while in Europe, proposing the government of Orleans, I also suggested that of Louisiana, if fears for health should be opposed to the other. I said something on the importance of the post, its advantages, &c.—expressed my regret at the curtain which seemed to be drawn between him and his best friends, and my wish to see his talents and integrity engaged in the service of his country again, and that his going into any post would be a signal of reconciliation, on which the body of republicans, who lamented his absence from the public service, would again rally to him. * * * The sum of his answers was, that to accept of that office was incompatible with the respect he owed himself; that he never would act in any office where he should be subordinate to anybody but the President himself, or which did not place his responsibility substantially with the President and the nation; that at your accession to the chair, he would have accepted a place in the cabinet, and would have exerted his endeavors most faithfully in support of your fame and measures: that he is not unready to serve the public, and especially in the case of any difficult crisis in our affairs; that he is satisfied that such is the deadly hatred of both France and England, and such their self-reproach and dread at the spectacle of such a government as ours, that they will spare nothing to destroy it; that nothing but a firm union among the whole body of republicans can save it, and, therefore, that no schism should be indulged on any ground; that in his present situation, he is sincere in his anxieties for the success of the Administration, and in his support of it as far as the limited sphere of his action or influence extends; that his influence to this end had been used with those with whom the world had ascribed to him an interest he did not possess, until, whatever it was, it was lost (he particularly named J. Randolph, who, he said, had plans of his own, on which he took no advice); and that he was now pursuing what he believed his properest occupation, devoting his whole time and faculties to the liberation of his pecuniary embarrassments, which, three years of close attention, he hoped, would effect. In order to know more exactly what were the kinds of employ he would accept, I adverted to the information of the papers, * * * that General Hampton was dead, but observed that the military life in our present state, offered nothing which could operate on the principle of patriotism; he said he would sooner be shot than take a command under Wilkinson. * * * On the whole, I conclude he would accept a place in the cabinet, or a military command dependent on the Executive alone, and I rather suppose a diplomatic mission, because it would fall within the scope of his views, and not because he said so, for no allusion was made to anything of that kind in our conversation. Everything from him breathed the purest patriotism, involving, however, a close attention to his own honor and grade. He expressed himself with the utmost devotion to the interests of our own country, and I am satisfied he will pursue them with honor and zeal in any character in which he shall be willing to act.—To PRESIDENT MADISON, v, 481. FORD ED., ix, 265. (M., Nov. 1809.)

5482. MONROE (James), Mission to France.—The fever into which the western mind is thrown by the affair at New Orleans [suspension of right of deposit], stimulated by the mercantile and generally the federal interests, threatens to overbear our peace. In this situation we are obliged to call on you for a sacrifice of yourself, to prevent this greatest of evils in the present prosperous tide of our affairs. I shall to-morrow nominate you to the Senate for an extraordinary mission to France, and the circumstances are such as to render it impossible to decline; because the whole public hope will be vested on you.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 188. (W., Jan. 10, 1803.)

5483. — — — You possess the unlimited confidence of the Administration, and of the western people; and generally of the republicans everywhere; and were you to refuse to go, no other man can be found who does this. * * * All eyes, all hopes, are now fixed on you; and were you to decline, the chagrin would be universal, and would shake under your feet the high ground on which you stand with the public. Indeed, I know nothing which would produce such a shock, for on the event of this mission depend the future destinies of this republic. If we cannot, by a purchase of the country, ensure to ourselves a course of perpetual peace and friendship with all nations, then, as war cannot be distant, it behooves us immediately to be preparing for that course, without, however, hastening it; and it may be necessary (on your failure on the continent) to cross the channel. We shall get entangled in European politics, and figuring more, be much less happy and prosperous. This can only be prevented by a successful issue to your present mission. I am sensible after the measures you have taken for getting into a different line of business, that it will be a great sacrifice on your part, and presents from the season and other circumstances serious difficulties. But some men are born for the public. Nature by fitting them for the service of the human race on a broad scale, has stamped them with the evidences of her destination and their duty.—To JAMES MONROE, vi, 454. FORD ED., iv, 190. (W., Jan. 1803.) See LOUISIANA.

5484. MONROE (James), Orleans governorship.—When mentioning your going to New Orleans [as Governor], and that the salary there would not increase the ease of your situation. I meant to have added that the only considerations which might make it eligible to you were the facility of getting there the richest land in the world, the extraordinary profitability of its culture, and that the removal of your slaves there might immediately put you under.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 290. (W., Jan. 1804.)

5485. — — — I wish you were here at present, to take your choice of the two governments of Orleans and Louisiana, in either of which I could now place you; and I verily believe it would be to your advantage to be just that much withdrawn from the focus of the ensuing contest, until its event should be known.—To JAMES MONROE, v, 11. FORD ED., viii, 448. (W., May 1806.)

5486. — — — The government of New Orleans is still without such a head as I wish. The salary of five thousand dollars is too small, but I am assured the Orleans Legislature would make it adequate, would you accept it. It is the second office in the United States in importance, and I am still in hopes you will accept it. It is impossible to let you stay at home while the public has so much need of talents.—To JAMES MONROE, v, 54. FORD ED., ix, 37. (W., March 1807.)

circumstance in our felicities. Four and twenty years, which he will accomplish, of administration in republican forms and principles, will so consecrate them in the eyes of the people as to secure them against the danger of change.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 67. FORD ED., x, 84. (M., 1817.)

5489. MONROE (James), Presidential contest.—I had intended to have written you to counteract the wicked efforts which the federal papers are making to sow tares between you and me, as if I were lending a hand to measures unfriendly to any views which our country might entertain respecting you. But I have not done it, because I have before assured you that a sense of duty, as well as of delicacy, would prevent me from ever expressing a sentiment on the subject, and that I think you know me well enough to be assured I shall conscientiously observe the line of conduct I profess.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 82. (W., May 1807.)

5490. ——. I cannot, indeed, judge what falsehoods may have been written or told you; and that, under such forms as to command belief. But you will soon find that so inveterate is the rancor of party spirit among us, that nothing ought to be credited but what we hear with our own ears. If you are less on your guard than we are here, at this moment, the designs of the mischief-makers will not fail to be accomplished, and brethren and friends will be made strangers and enemies to each other, without ever having said or thought a thing amiss of each other. I presume that the most insidious falsehoods are daily carried to you, as they are brought to me, to engage us in the passions of our informers, and stated so positively and plausibly as to make even doubt a rudeness to the narrator; who, imposed on himself, has no other than the friendly view of putting us on our guard. My answer is, invariably, that my knowledge of your character is better testimony to me of a negative, than an affirmative which my informant did not hear from yourself, with his own ears. In fact, when you shall have been a little longer among us,* you will find that little is to be believed which interests the prevailing passions, and happens beyond the limits of our own senses. Let us not, then, my dear friend, embark our happiness and our affections on the ocean of slander, of falsehood and of malice, on which our credulous friends are floating. If you have been made to believe that I ever did, said, or thought a thing unfriendly to your fame and feelings, you do me injury as causeless as it is afflicting to me.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 255. FORD ED., ix, 180. (W., March 1808.)

5491. ——. In the present contest in which you are concerned, I feel no passion. I take no part, I express no sentiment. Whichever of my friends is called to the supreme cares of the nation, I know that they will be wisely and faithfully administered, and as far as my individual conduct can influence, they shall be cordially supported. For myself I have nothing further to ask of the world, than to preserve in retirement so much of their esteem as I may have fairly earned, and to be permitted to pass in tranquillity, in the bosom of my family and friends, the days which yet remain for me. Having reached the harbor myself, I shall view with anxiety (but certainly not with a wish to be in their place) those who are still buffeting the storm, uncertain of their fate.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 255. FORD ED., ix, 181. (W., March 1808.) See MADISON.

5492. MONROE (James), Purity of.—He is a man whose soul might be turned wrong side outwards, without discovering a blemish to the world.—To W. T. FRANKLIN. i, 555. (P., 1786.)

5493. MONROE (James), Randolph and.—One popular paper is endeavoring to maintain equivocal ground; approving the administration in all its proceedings, and Mr. [John] Randolph in all those which have heretofore merited approbation, carefully avoiding to mention his late aberration. The ultimate view of this paper is friendly to you; and the editor, with more judgment than him who assumes to be at the head of your friends, sees that the ground of opposition to the administration is not that on which it would be advantageous to you to be planted. The great body of your friends are among the firmest adherents to the administration; and in their support of you, will suffer Mr. Randolph to have no communications with them. * * * But it is unfortunate for you to be embarrassed with such a soi-disant friend. You must not commit yourself to him.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 10. FORD ED., viii, 448. (W., May 1806.)

5494. MONROE (James), Recall from France.—I should not wonder if Monroe were * * * recalled [from France], under the idea of his being of the partisans of France, whom the President [Washington] considers as the partisans of war and confusion, * * * and as disposed to excite them to hostile measures, or at least to unfriendly sentiments; a most infatuated blindness to the true character of the sentiments entertained in favor of France.—To W. B. GILES. iv, 127. FORD ED., vii, 44. (M., Dec. 1795.)

5496. MONROE (James), Secretary of State.—Although I may not have been among the first, I am certainly with the sincerest, who congratulate you on your entrance into the national councils. Your value there has never been unduly estimated by those whom personal feelings did not misguide.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 597. FORD ED., ix, 323. (M., May 1811.)

5497. MONROE (James), Selection of a home.—On my return from the South of France, I shall send you * * * a plan of your house. I wish to heaven you may continue in the disposition to fix it in Albemarle. Short will establish himself there, and perhaps Madison may be tempted to do so. This will be society enough, and it will be the great sweetener of our lives. Without society, and a society to our taste, men are never contented. The one here supposed, we can regulate to our minds, and we may extend our regulations to the sumptuary department so as to set a good example to a country which needs it, and to preserve our own happiness clear of embarrassment. * * * I am in hopes that Mrs. Monroe will have, in her domestic cares, occupation and pleasure sufficient to fill her time and insure her against the tedium vite; that she will find that the distractions of a town and the waste of life under these can bear no comparison with the tranquil happiness of domestic life. If her own experience has not yet taught her this truth, she has in its favor the testimony of one who has gone through the various scenes of business, of bustle, of office, of rambling and of quiet retirement and who can assure her that the latter is the one point upon which the mind can settle at rest. Though not clear of inquietudes, because no earthly situation is so, they are fewer in number and mixed with more objects of contentment than in any other mode of life.—To JAMES MONROE. ii, 71. (P., 1786.)

5498. ——. I had entertained hopes of your settling in my neighborhood; but these were determined by your desiring a plan of a house for Richmond. However reluctantly I relinquish this prospect, I shall not the less readily obey your commands by sending you a plan.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 564. FORD ED., iv, 220. (P., 1786.)

5499. MONROE (James), Slandering attack on.—I have reason to believe they are preparing a batch of small stuff, such as refusing to drink General Washington's health, speaking ill of him, and the government, withdrawing civilities from those attached to him, countenancing Paine, to which they add connivance at the equipment of privateers by Americans. * * * We are of opinion here that Dr. Edward's certificate * * * should be reserved to repel these slanders.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 232. (Pa., April 1798.)

5500. ——. I have had a consultation with Mr. Dawson on the matter respecting Skipwith. We have neither of us the least hesitation, on a view of the ground, to pronounce against your coming forward in it at all. Your name would be the watchword of party at this moment, and the question would give opportunities of slander, personal hatred, and injustice, the effect of which on the justice of the case cannot be calculated. Let it, therefore, come forward in Skipwith's name, without your appearing even to know of it. * * * I do not think "Scipio" worth your notice. * * * Your narrative and letters, wherever they are read, produce irresistible conviction, and cannot be attacked but by a contradiction of facts, on which they do not venture.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 232. (Pa., April 1798.)

5501. ——. You will have seen, among numerous addresses [to the President] and answers, one from Lancaster in Pennsylvania, and its answer; the latter travelling out of the topics of the address altogether, to mention you in a most injurious manner. Your feelings have no doubt been much irritated by it, as in truth it had all the characters necessary to produce irritation. What notice you should take of it, is difficult to say. But there is one step in which two or three with whom I have spoken concur with me, that feeble as the hand is from which this shaft is thrown, yet with a great mass of our citizens, strangers to the leading traits of the character from which it came, it will have considerable effect; and that in replace yourself on the high ground entitled to, it is absolutely necessary that you should reappear on the public theatre, and take an independent stand, from which you can be seen and known to your fellow citizens. The House of Representatives appears the only place which can answer this end, as the proceedings of the other House are too obscure. Cabell has said he would give way to you, should you choose to come in, and I really think it would be expedient for yourself as well as the public, that you should not wait until another election, but come to the next session. No interval should be admitted between this last attack of enmity and your reappearance with the approving voice of your constituents, and your taking a commanding attitude. * * * If this be done, I should think it best that you take no notice at all of the answer.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 242. FORD ED., vii, 257. (Pa., May 1798.)

5502. MONTESQUIEU (Baron), Author.—The history of Montesquieu's "Spirit of Laws" is well known. He had been a great reader, and had commonplace'd everything he read. At length he wished to undertake some work into which he could bring his whole commonplace book in a digested form. He fixed on the subject of his "Spirit of Laws", and wrote the book. He consulted his friend Helvetius about publishing it, who strongly dissuaded it. He published it, however, and the world did not confirm Helvetius's opinion.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 535. (M., 1810.)

5503. ——. Every man who reflects as he reads, has considered it as a book of paradoxes; having, indeed, much of truth and sound principle, but abounding also with inconsistencies, apocryphal facts and false inferences.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 535. (M., 1810.)

5504. ——. I had, with the world, deemed Montesquieu's work of much merit; but saw in it, with every thinking man, so much of paradox, of false principle and misapplied fact, as to render its value equivocal on the whole. Williams and others had nibbled only at its errors. A radical correction of them, therefore, was a great desideratum. This want is now supplied, and with a depth of thought, precision of idea, of language and of logic, which will force conviction into every mind. I declare to you, in the spirit of truth and sincerity, that I consider it the most precious gift the present age has received. But what would it have been, had the author, or would the author, take up the whole scheme of Montesquieu's work, and following the correct analysis he has here developed, fill up all its parts according to his sound views of them. Montesquieu's celebrity would be but a small portion of that which would immortalize the author.—To M. DESTUTT TRACY. v, 566. FORD ED., ix, 305. (M., 1811.)

5505. MONTESQUIEU (Baron), Monarchist.—I am glad to hear of everything which reduces Montesquieu to his just level, as his predilection for monarchy, and the English monarchy in particular, has done mischief everywhere.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 539. (M., 1810.)

5506. MONTICELLO, Beauties of.—And our own dear Monticello: where has nature spread so rich a mantle under the eye? Mountains, forests, rocks, rivers! With what majesty do we there ride above the storms! How sublime to look down into the workhouse of nature, to see her clouds, hail, snow, rain, thunder, all fabricated at our feet! And the glorious sun when rising, as if out of a distant water, just gilding the tops of the mountains, and giving life to all nature!—To MRS. COSWAY. ii, 35. FORD ED., iv, 315. (P., 1786.) See MIRAGE.

5507. MONTICELLO, Guests at.—You know our practice of placing our guests at their ease, by showing them we are so ourselves and that we follow our necessary vocations, instead of fatiguing them by hanging unremittently on their shoulders.—To FRANCIS W. GILMER. vii, 5. (1816.)

5508. MONTICELLO, Recollections of.—All my wishes end, where I hope my days will end, at Monticello. Too many scenes of happiness mingle themselves with all the recollections of my native woods and fields, to suffer them to be supplanted in my affection by any other.—To DR. GEORGE GILMER. ii, 243. FORD ED., iv, 436. (P., 1787.)

5509. MONTMORIN (Count), Honest.—I am pleased with Montmorin. His honesty proceeds from the heart as well as the head, and therefore may be more securely counted on.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 153. FORD ED., iv, 393. (P., 1787.)

5510. MONTMORIN (Count), Modest.—I am extremely pleased with his modesty, the simplicity of his manners, and his dispositions towards us. I promise myself a great deal of satisfaction in doing business with him.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. ii, 131. (P., 1787.)

5511. MONTMORIN (Count), Weak but worthy.—Montmorin is weak, though a most worthy character. He is indolent and inattentive, too, in the extreme.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 444. FORD ED., v, 43. (P., 1788.)

5512. MORAL LAW, Evidence of.—Man has been subjected by his Creator to the moral law, of which his feelings, or conscience as it is sometimes called, are the evidence with which his Creator has furnished him.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 613. FORD ED., vi, 220. (1793.)

5513. MORAL LAW, Nations and.—The moral duties which exist between individual and individual in a state of nature, accompany them into a state of society, and the aggregate of the duties of all the individuals composing the society constitutes the duties of that society towards any other; so that between society and society the same moral duties exist as did between the individuals composing them while in an unassociated state, their Maker not having released them from those duties on their forming themselves into a nation.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 613. FORD ED., vi, 220. (1793.)

* With the cares and delights of his family, his books and his farm, he mingled the gratification of his devotion to the Fine Arts, particularly architecture. He superintended [in 1781-2] the construction of his elegant mansion, which had been commenced some years before, and was already in a habitable condition. The plan of the building was entirely original in this country. He had drawn it himself from books, with a view to improve the architecture of his countrymen, by introducing an example of the tastes and arts of Europe. The original design of the structure, which was executed before his travels in Europe had supplied him with any models, is allowed by European travelers to have been infinitely superior, in taste and convenience, to that of any other house in America. The fame of the Monticellian philosopher having already spread over Europe, his hospitable seat was made the resort of scientific adventurers, and of dignified travelers from many parts of that continent.—RAYNER'S Life of Jefferson, p. 221.

5514. MORAL SENSE, Innate.—I think it is lost time to attend lectures on moral philosophy. He who made us would have been a pitiful bungler, if He had made the rules of our moral conduct a matter of science. For the man of science, there are thousands who are not. What would have become of them? Man was destined for society. His morality, therefore, was to be formed to this object. He was endowed with a sense of right and wrong, merely relative to this. This sense is as much a part of his nature, as the sense of hearing, seeing, feeling; it is the true foundation of morality, and not the το καλον, truth, &c., as fanciful writers have imagined. The moral sense, or conscience, is as much a part of man as his leg or arm. It is given to all human beings in a stronger or weaker degree, as force of members is given them in a greater or less degree. It may be strengthened by exercise, as may any particular limb of the body. This sense is submitted, indeed, in some degree, to the guidance of reason; but it is a small stock which is required for this; even a less one than what we call common sense. State a moral case to a plowman and a professor. The former will decide it as well and often better than the latter, because he has not been led astray by artificial rules. In this branch, therefore, read good books, because they will encourage as well as direct your feelings. The writings of Sterne, particularly, form the best course of morality that ever was written. Lose no occasion of exercising your dispositions to be grateful, to be generous, to be charitable, to be humane, to be true, just, firm, orderly, courageous, &c. Consider every act of this kind as an exercise which will strengthen your moral faculties, and increase your worth.—To PETER CARR. ii, 238. FORD ED., iv, 428. (P., 1787.)

5515. ———. I sincerely believe in the general existence of a moral instinct. I think it the brightest gem with which the human character is studded, and the want of it as more degrading than the most hideous of the bodily deformities.—To THOMAS LAW. vi, 351. (M., 1814.)

5516. ———. I believe * * * that the moral sense is as much a part of our constitution as that of feeling, seeing, or hearing; as a wise Creator must have seen to be necessary in an animal destined to live in society.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 39. (M., 1816.)

5517. ———. The moral sense [is] the first excellence of well-organized man.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 275. (M., 1823.)

5518. MORAL SENSE, Utility and.—Some have argued against the existence of a moral sense, by saying that if nature had given us such a sense, impelling us to virtuous actions, and warning us against those which are vicious, then nature would also have designated, by some particular earmarks, the two sets of actions which are, in themselves, the one virtuous and the other vicious. Whereas, we find, in fact, that the same actions are deemed virtuous in one country and vicious in another. The answer is that nature has constituted utility to man the standard and test of virtue. Men living in different countries, under different circumstances, different habits and regimens, may have different utilities; the same act, therefore, may be useful, and consequently virtuous in one country which is injurious and vicious in an-

insomuch as to have delayed the execution of the new lease of the Farms six months. It is renewed, however, for three years, but so as not to render impossible a reformation of this great evil. They are sensible of the evil, but it is so interwoven with their fiscal system, that they find it hazardous to disentangle. The temporary distress, too, of the revenue, they are not prepared to meet. My hopes, therefore, are weak, though not quite desperate. When they become so, it will remain to look about for the best palliative this monopoly can bear. My present idea is that it will be found in a prohibition to the Farmers General to purchase tobacco anywhere but in France.—To JAMES ROSS. i, 560. FORD ED., iv, 216. (P., 1786.)

5455. ——. I think that so long as the monopoly in the sale [of tobacco] is kept up, it is of no consequence to us how they modify the pill for their own internal relief; but, on the contrary, the worse it remains, the more necessary it will render a reformation. Any palliative would take from us all those arguments and friends that would be satisfied with accommodation. The Marquis de Lafayette, though differing from me in opinion on this point, has, however, adhered to my principle of absolute liberty or nothing.—To COL. MONROE. i, 568. FORD ED., iv, 225. (P., 1786.)

5456. ——. Some symptoms make me suspect that my proceedings to reduce the abusive administration of tobacco by the Farmers General have indisposed towards me a powerful person in Philadelphia, who was profiting from that abuse. An expression in the enclosed letter of M. de Calonne would seem to imply that I had asked the abolition of Mr. Morris's contract. I never did. On the contrary, I always observed to them that it would be unjust to annul that contract. I was led to this by principles both of justice and interest. Of interest, because that contract would keep up the price of tobacco here to thirty-four, thirty-six and thirty-eight livres, from which it will fall when it shall no longer have that support. However, I have done what was right, and I will not so far wound my privilege of doing that, without regard to any man's interest, as to enter into any explanation of this paragraph with him. Yet I esteem him highly, and suppose that hitherto he had esteemed me.—To JAMES MONROE. ii, 70. (P., 1786.)

5458. ——. Of these eighty millions [of American exports to Europe], thirty are constituted by the single article of tobacco. Could the whole of this be brought into the ports of France, to satisfy its own demands, and the residue to be revented to other nations, it would be a powerful link of commercial connection. But we are far from this.

Even her own consumption, supposed to be nine millions, under the administration of the monopoly to which it is farmed, enters little, as an article of exchange, into the commerce of the two nations. When this article was first put into Farm, perhaps it did not injure the commercial interests of the kingdom; because nothing but British manufactures were then allowed to be given in return for American tobaccos. The laying the trade open, then, to all the subjects of France, would not have relieved her from a payment in money. Circumstances are changed; yet the old institution remains.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 186. (P., 1787.)

5460. ——. The governments have nothing to do, but not to hinder their merchants from making the exchange.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 189. (P., 1787.)

5461. MONOPOLY, Western trade.—The Ohio and its branches, which head up against the Potomac, afford the shortest water communication by five hundred miles of any which can ever be got between the western waters and Atlantic; and, of course, promise us almost a monopoly of the Western and Indian trade.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 402. (A., Feb. 1784.)

5462. MONOPOLY, Whale oil.—My endeavors for emancipating the tobacco trade have been less successful [than have been those with respect to whale oil]. I still continue to stir, however, this and all other articles.—To MR. OTTO. i, 559. (P., 1786.)

5463. ——. On the subject of the whale fishery, I enclose you some observations I drew up for the ministry here, in order to obtain a correction of their Arret of September last, whereby they had involved our oils with the English, in a general exclusion from their ports. They will accordingly correct this, so that our oils will participate with theirs, in the monopoly of their markets.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 538. FORD ED., v, 60. (P., 1788.)

5464. ——. I have obtained the promise of an explanatory Arret to declare that that of September 28 [1788], was not meant to extend to us. Orders are accordingly given in the ports to receive our [oils]. This places us on a better footing than ever, as it gives us a monopoly of this market in conjunction with the French fishermen.—To THOMAS PAINE. ii, 549. (P., 1788.)

5465. MONROE DOCTRINE, Jefferson and.—The question presented by the letters*

* The letters were those of Mr. Rush, our minister at the Court of St. James's, in which he communi-

you have sent me, is the most momentous which has been offered to my contemplation since that of Independence. That made us a nation, this sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on us. And never could we embark on it under circumstances more auspicious. Our first and fundamental maxim should be, never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her own. She should therefore have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be, to make our hemisphere that of freedom. One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this pursuit: she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition, we detach her from the bands, bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate a continent at one stroke, which might otherwise linger long in doubt and difficulty. Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of any one, or all on earth; and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world. With her, then, we should most sedulously cherish a cordial friendship; and nothing would tend more to knit our affections than to be fighting once more, side by side in the same cause. Not that I would purchase even her amity at the price of taking part in her wars. But the war in which the present proposition might engage us, should that be its consequence, is not her war, but ours. Its object is to introduce and establish the American system, of keeping out of our land all foreign powers, of never permitting those of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our nations. It is to maintain our own principle, not to depart from it. And if, to facilitate this, we can effect a division in the body of the European powers, and draw over to our side its most powerful member, surely we should do it. But I am clearly of Mr. Canning's opinion, that, it will prevent instead of provoke war. With Great Britain withdrawn from their scale and shifted into that of our two continents, all Europe combined would not undertake such a war. For how would they propose to get at either enemy without superior fleets? Nor is the occasion to be slighted which this proposition offers, of declaring our protest against the atrocious violations of the rights of nations, by the interference of any one in the internal affairs of another, so flagitiously begun by Bonaparte, and now continued by the equally lawless Alliance, calling itself Holy. But we have first to ask ourselves a question. Do we wish to acquire to our own confederacy any one or more of the Spanish provinces? I candidly confess, that I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition which could ever be made to our system of States. The control which, with Florida Point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico, and the countries and isthmus bordering on it, as well as all those whose waters flow into it, would fill up the measure of our political well-being. Yet, as I am sensible that this can never be obtained, even with her own consent, but by war; and its independence, which is our second interest (and especially its independence of England), can be secured without it. I have no hesitation in abandoning my first wish to future chances, and accepting its independence, with peace and the friendship of England, rather than its association, at the expense of war and her enmity. I could honestly, therefore, join in the declaration proposed, that we aim not at the acquisition of any of those possessions, that we will not stand in the way of any amicable arrangement between them and the mother country; but that we will oppose, with all our means, the forcible interposition of any other power, as auxiliary, stipendiary, or under any other form or pretext, and most especially, their transfer to any power by conquest, cession, or acquisition in any other way.* I should

"In the wars of European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defence. With the movements on this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers [the Holy Alliance] is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defence of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the Government de facto as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy; meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend cated to President Monroe the proposition of Mr. Canning that the United States and England should issue a joint declaration announcing that, while the two governments desired for themselves no portion of the Spanish-American colonies, then in revolt against Spain, they would not view with indifference any foreign intervention in their affairs, or their acquisition by a third power. The declaration was intended to be a warning to the allied powers, Russia, Prussia and Austria, the members of the Holy Alliance. —EDITOR.

think it, therefore, advisable, that the Executive should encourage the British government to a continuance in the dispositions expressed in these letters, by an assurance of his concurrence with them as far as his authority goes; and that as it may lead to war, the declaration of which requires an act of Congress, the case shall be laid before them for consideration at their first meeting, and under the reasonable aspect in which it is seen by himself. I have been so long weaned from political subjects, and have so long ceased to take any interest in them, that I am sensible I am not qualified to offer opinions on them worthy of any attention. But the question now proposed involves consequences so lasting, and effects so decisive of our future destinies, as to rekindle all the interest I have heretofore felt on such occasions, and to induce me to the hazard of opinions, which will prove only my wish to contribute still my mite towards anything which may be useful to our country.*—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 315. FORD ED., x, 277. (M., October 1823.) See POLICY.

5466. MONROE (James), Ability.—Many points in Monroe's character would render him the most valuable acquisition the republican interest in this Legislature [Congress] could make.—To JOHN TAYLOR. FORD ED., vii, 322. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

5467. ——. I clearly think with you on the competence of Monroe to embrace great views of action. The decision of his character, his enterprise, firmness, industry, and unceasing vigilance, would, I believe, secure, as I am sure they would merit, the public confidence, and give us all the success which our means can accomplish.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 81. FORD ED., ix, 368. (M., Oct. 1812.)

5468. MONROE (James), Book by.—Your book * * * works irresistibly. It would be very gratifying to you to hear the unqualified eulogies both on the matter and manner by all who are not hostile to it from principle.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 183. (Pa., Dec. 1797.)

5469. ——. Monroe's book is considered as masterly by all those who are not opposed in principle, and it is deemed unanswerable. An answer, however, is commenced in Fenno's paper, under the signature of "Scipio" [Uriah Tracy]. The real author is not yet their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can any one believe that our Southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference."—EDITOR.

*Morse, in his Life of Jefferson (p. 235), says: "It is curious to note that in the course of this business (navigation of Mississippi), there was already a faint foreshadowing of that principle, which many years afterwards was christened with the name of Monroe. For a brief time it was thought, not without reason, that so soon as hostilities should break out between England and Spain, the former power would seize upon the North American possessions of the latter. Jefferson wrote to Gouverneur Morris: 'We wish you, therefore, to intimate to them (the British ministry) that we cannot be indifferent to enterprises of this kind. That we should contemplate a change of neighbors with extreme uneasiness. That a due balance on our borders is not less desirable to us than a balance of power in Europe has always appeared to them.'"—EDITOR.

5470. MONROE (James), British treaty and.—You complain of the manner in which the [British] treaty was received. But what was that manner? I cannot suppose you to have given a moment's credit to the stuff which was crowded in all sorts of forms into the public papers, or to the thousand speeches they put into my mouth, not a word of which I had ever uttered. I was not insensible at the time of the views to mischief, with which these lies were fabricated. But my confidence was firm, that neither yourself nor the British government, equally outraged by them, would believe me capable of making the editors of newspapers the confidants of my speeches or opinions. The fact was this. The treaty was communicated to us by Mr. Erskine on the day Congress was to rise. Two of the senators enquired of me in the evening, whether it was my purpose to detain them on account of the treaty. My answer was, "that it was not; that the treaty containing no provision against the impressment of our seamen, and being accompanied by a kind of protestation of the British ministers, which would leave that government free to consider it as a treaty or no treaty, according to their own convenience, I should not give them the trouble of deliberating on it." This was substantially, and almost verbally, what I said whenever spoken to about it, and I never failed when the occasion would admit of it, to justify myself and Mr. Pinckney, by expressing my conviction, that it was all that could be obtained from the British government; that you had told their commissioners that your government could not be pledged to ratify, because it was contrary to their instructions; of course, that it should be considered but as a projet; and in this light I stated it publicly in my message to Congress on the opening of the session. Not a single article of the treaty was ever made known beyond the members of the administration, nor would an article of it be known at this day, but for its publication in the newspapers, as communicated by somebody from beyond the water, as we have always understood. But as to myself, I can solemnly protest, as the most sacred of truths, that I never, one instant, lost sight of your reputation and favorable standing with your country, and never omitted to justify your failure to attain our wish, as one which was probably unattainable. Reviewing, therefore, this whole subject, I cannot doubt you will become sensible, that your impressions have been without just ground.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 254. FORD ED., ix, 179. (W., March 1808.) See IMPRESSMENT.

5471. MONROE (James), Confidence in.—I have had, and still have, such entire confidence in the late and present Presidents, that I willingly put both soul and body into their pockets.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 111. FORD ED., x, 120. (M., 1819.)

5472. MONROE (James), Defence of.—I should be glad to see the defence of Monroe's conduct which you possess, though no paper of that title is necessary to me. He was appointed to an office during pleasure merely to get him out of the Senate, and with an intention to seize the first pretext for exercising the pleasure of recalling him. * * * I think with you it will be best to publish nothing concerning Colonel Monroe till his return, that he may accommodate the complexion of his publication to times and circumstances.—To JOHN EDWARDS. iv, 164. FORD ED., vii, 112. (M., Jan. 1797.)

5474. MONROE (James), Diplomatic expenses.—Although it is not pleasant to fall short in returning civilities, yet necessity has rendered this so familiar in Europe as not to lessen respect for the person whose circumstances do not permit a return of hospitalities. I see by your letters the pain which this situation gives you, and I can estimate its acuteness from the generosity of your nature. But, my dear friend, calculate with mathematical rigor the pain annexed to each branch of the dilemma, and pursue that which brings the least. To give up entertainment, and to live with the most rigorous economy till you have cleared yourself of every demand is a pain for a definite time only; but to return here with accumulated encumbrances on you, will fill your life with torture. We wish to do everything for you which law and rule will permit. But more than this would injure you as much as us. Believing that the mission to Spain will enable you to suspend expense greatly in London, and to apply your salary during your absence to the clearing off your debt, you will be instructed to proceed there as soon as you shall have regulated certain points of neutral right for us with England, or as soon as you find nothing in that way can be done.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 288. (W., Jan. 1804.)

5475. MONROE (James), Distaste for law.—You wish not to engage in the drudgery of the bar. You have two asylums from that. Either to accept a seat in the Council, or in the Judiciary department. The latter, however, would require a little previous drudgery at the bar to qualify you to discharge your duty with satisfaction to yourself. Neither of these would be inconsistent with a continued residence at Albemarle. It is but twelve hours' drive in a sulky from Charlottesville to Richmond, keeping a fresh horse always at the half-way, which would be a small annual expense.—To JAMES MONROE. ii, 71. (P., 1786.)

5476. MONROE (James), English mission.—I perceive that painful impressions have been made on your mind during your late mission, of which I had never entertained a suspicion. I must, therefore, examine the grounds, because explanations between reasonable men can never but do good. 1. You consider the mission of Mr. Pinkney as an associate, to have been in some way injurious to you. Were I to take that measure on myself, I might say in its justification, that it has been the regular and habitual practice of the United States to do this, under every form in which their government has existed. I need not recapitulate the multiplied instances, because you will readily recollect them. I went as an adjunct to Dr. Franklin, and Mr. Adams, yourself as an adjunct first to Mr. Livingston, and then to Mr. Pinkney, and I really believe there has scarcely been a great occasion which has not produced an extraordinary mission. Still, however, it is well known that I was strongly opposed to it in the case of which you complain. A committee of the Senate called on me with two resolutions of that body, on the subject of impressment and spoliation by Great Britain, and requesting that I would demand satisfaction. After delivering the resolutions, the committee entered into free conversation, and observed that although the Senate could not, in form, recommend any extraordinary mission, yet that as individuals, there was but one sentiment among them on the measure, and they pressed it. I was so much averse to it, and gave them so hard an answer, that they felt it, and spoke of it. But it did not end here. The members of the other House took up the subject, and set upon me individually, and these the best friends to you, as well as myself, and represented the responsibility which a failure to obtain redress would throw on us both, pursuing a conduct in opposition to the opinion of nearly every member of the Legislature. I found it necessary, at length, to yield my own opinion to the general sense of the national council, and it really seemed to produce a jubilee among them; not from any want of confidence in you, but from a belief in the effect which an extraordinary mission would have on the British mind, by demonstrating the degree of importance which this country attached to the rights which we considered as infringed.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 253. FORD ED., ix, 178. (W., March 1808.)

5477. MONROE (James), Friendship for.—I have ever viewed Mr. Madison and yourself as two principal pillars of my happiness. Were either to be withdrawn, I should consider it as among the greatest calamities which could assail my future peace of mind. I have great confidence that the candor and high understanding of both will guard me against this misfortune, the bare possibility of which has so far weighed on my mind, that I could not be easy without unburthening it.*—To JAMES MONROE. v, 248. FORD ED., ix, 178. (W., Feb. 1808.)

5480. MONROE (James), Louisiana purchase.—I find our opposition is very willing to pluck feathers from Monroe [on the acquisition of Louisiana], although not fond of sticking them into Livingston's coat. The truth is, both have a just portion of merit; and were it necessary or proper, it could be shown that each has rendered peculiar services, and of important value.—To GENERAL HORATIO GATES. iv, 495. FORD ED., viii, 249. (W., July 1803.) See LOUISIANA.

5481. MONROE (James), Madison and.—I had * * * a frank conversation with Colonel Monroe. * * * I reminded him that in the letter I wrote to him while in Europe, proposing the government of Orleans, I also suggested that of Louisiana, if fears for health should be opposed to the other. I said something on the importance of the post, its advantages, &c.—expressed my regret at the curtain which seemed to be drawn between him and his best friends, and my wish to see his talents and integrity engaged in the service of his country again, and that his going into any post would be a signal of reconciliation, on which the body of republicans, who lamented his absence from the public service, would again rally to him. * * * The sum of his answers was, that to accept of that office was incompatible with the respect he owed himself; that he never would act in any office where he should be subordinate to anybody but the President himself, or which did not place his responsibility substantially with the President and the nation; that at your accession to the chair, he would have accepted a place in the cabinet, and would have exerted his endeavors most faithfully in support of your fame and measures; that he is not unready to serve the public, and especially in the case of any difficult crisis in our affairs; that he is satisfied that such is the deadly hatred of both France and England, and such their self-reproach and dread at the spectacle of such a government as ours, that they will spare nothing to destroy it; that nothing but a firm union among the whole body of republicans can save it, and, therefore, that no schism should be indulged on any ground; that in his present situation, he is sincere in his anxieties for the success of the Administration, and in his support of it as far as the limited sphere of his action or influence extends; that his influence to this end had been used with those with whom the world had ascribed to him an interest he did not possess, until, whatever it was, it was lost (he particularly named J. Randolph, who, he said, had plans of his own, on which he took no advice); and that he was now pursuing what he believed his properest occupation, devoting his whole time and faculties to the liberation of his pecuniary embarrassments, which, three years of close attention, he hoped, would effect. In order to know more exactly what were the kinds of employ he would accept, I adverted to the information of the papers, * * * that General Hampton was dead, but observed that the military life in our present state, offered nothing which could operate on the principle of patriotism; he said he would sooner be shot than take a command under Wilkinson. * * * On the whole, I conclude he would accept a place in the cabinet, or a military command dependent on the Executive alone, and I rather suppose a diplomatic mission, because it would fall within the scope of his views, and not because he said so, for no allusion was made to anything of that kind in our conversation. Everything from him breathed the purest patriotism, involving, however, a close attention to his own honor and grade. He expressed himself with the utmost devotion to the interests of our own country, and I am satisfied he will pursue them with honor and zeal in any character in which he shall be willing to act.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 481. FORD ED., ix, 265. (M., Nov. 1809.)

5482. MONROE (James), Mission to France.—The fever into which the western mind is thrown by the affair at New Orleans [suspension of right of deposit], stimulated by the mercantile and generally the federal interests, threatens to overbear our peace. In this situation we are obliged to call on you for a temporary sacrifice of yourself, to prevent this greatest of evils in the present prosperous tide of our affairs. I shall to-morrow nominate you to the Senate for an extraordinary mission to France, and the circumstances are such as to render it impossible to decline; because the whole public hope will be vested on you.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 188. (W., Jan. 10, 1803.)

5483. ——. You possess the unlimited confidence of the Administration, and of the western people; and generally of the republicans everywhere; and were you to refuse to go, no other man can be found who does this. * * * All eyes, all hopes, are now fixed on you; and were you to decline, the chagrin would be universal, and would shake under your feet the high ground on which you stand with the public. Indeed, I know nothing which would produce such a shock, for on the event of this mission depend the future destinies of this republic. If we cannot, by a purchase of the country, ensure to ourselves a course of perpetual peace and friendship with all nations, then, as war cannot be distant, it behooves us immediately to be preparing for that course, without, however, hastening it; and it may be necessary (on your failure on the continent) to cross the channel. We shall get entangled in European politics, and figuring more, be much less happy and prosperous. This can only be prevented by a successful issue to your present mission. I am sensible after the measures you have taken for getting into a different line of business, that it will be a great sacrifice on your part, and presents from the season and other circumstances serious difficulties. But some men are born for the public. Nature by fitting them for the service of the human race on a broad scale, has stamped them with the evidences of her destination and their duty.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 454. FORD ED., iv, 190. (W., Jan. 1803.) See LOUISIANA.

5484. MONROE (James), Orleans governorship.—[When mentioning your going to New Orleans [as Governor], and that the salary there would not increase the ease of your situation. I meant to have added that the only considerations which might make it eligible to you were the facility of getting there the richest land in the world, the extraordinary profitability of its culture, and that the removal of your slaves there might immediately put you under way.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 290. (W., Jan. 1804.)

5485. ——. I wish you were here at present, to take your choice of the two governments of Orleans and Louisiana, in either of which I could now place you; and I verily believe it would be to your advantage to be just that much withdrawn from the focus of the ensuing contest, until its event should be known.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 11. FORD ED., viii, 448. (W., May 1806.)

5486. ——. The government of New Orleans is still without such a head as I wish. The salary of five thousand dollars is too small, but I am assured the Orleans Legislature would make it adequate, would you accept it. It is the second office in the United States in importance, and I am still in hopes you will accept it. It is impossible to let you stay at home while the public has so much need of talents.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 54. FORD ED., ix, 37. (W. March 1807.)

circumstance in our felicities. Four and twenty years, which he will accomplish, of administration in republican forms and principles, will so consecrate them in the eyes of the people as to secure them against the danger of change.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 67. FORD ED., x, 84. (M., 1817.)

5489. MONROE (James), Presidential contest.—I had intended to have written you to counteract the wicked efforts which the federal papers are making to sow tares between you and me, as if I were lending a hand to measures unfriendly to any views which our country might entertain respecting you. But I have not done it, because I have before assured you that a sense of duty, as well as of delicacy, would prevent me from ever expressing a sentiment on the subject, and that I think you know me well enough to be assured I shall conscientiously observe the line of conduct I profess.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 82. (W., May 1807.)

5490. ——. I cannot, indeed, judge what falsehoods may have been written or told you; and that, under such forms as to command belief. But you will soon find that so inveterate is the rancor of party spirit among us, that nothing ought to be credited but what we hear with our own ears. If you are less on your guard than we are here, at this moment, the designs of the mischief-makers will not fail to be accomplished, and brethren and friends will be made strangers and enemies to each other, without ever having said or thought a thing amiss of each other. I presume that the most insidious falsehoods are daily carried to you, as they are brought to me, to engage us in the passions of our informers, and stated so positively and plausibly as to make even doubt a rudeness to the narrator; who, imposed on himself, has no other than the friendly view of putting us on our guard. My answer is, invariably, that my knowledge of your character is better testimony to me of a negative, than an affirmative which my informant did not hear from yourself, with his own ears. In fact, when you shall have been a little longer among us,* you will find that little is to be believed which interests the prevailing passions, and happens beyond the limits of our own senses. Let us not, then, my dear friend, embark our happiness and our affections on the ocean of slander, of falsehood and of malice, on which our credulous friends are floating. If you have been made to believe that I ever did, said, or thought a thing unfriendly to your fame and feelings, you do me injury as causeless as it is afflicting to me.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 255. FORD ED., ix, 180. (W., March 1808.)

5491. ——. In the present contest in which you are concerned, I feel no passion. I take no part, I express no sentiment. Whichever of my friends is called to the supreme cares of the nation, I know that they will be wisely and faithfully administered, and as far as my individual conduct can influence, they shall be cordially supported. For myself I have nothing further to ask of the world, than to preserve in retirement so much of their esteem as I may have fairly earned, and to be permitted to pass in tranquillity, in the bosom of my family and friends, the days which yet remain for me. Having reached the harbor myself, I shall view with anxiety (but certainly not with a wish to be in their place) those who are still buffeting the storm, uncertain of their fate.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 255. FORD ED., ix, 181. (W., March 1808.) See MADISON.

5492. MONROE (James), Purity of.—He is a man whose soul might be turned wrong side outwards, without discovering a blemish to the world.—To W. T. FRANKLIN. i, 555. (P., 1786.)

5493. MONROE (James), Randolph and.—One popular paper is endeavoring to maintain equivocal ground; approving the administration in all its proceedings, and Mr. [John] Randolph in all those which have heretofore merited approbation, carefully avoiding to mention his late aberration. The ultimate view of this paper is friendly to you; and the editor, with more judgment than him who assumes to be at the head of your friends, sees that the ground of opposition to the administration is not that on which it would be advantageous to you to be planted. The great body of your friends are among the firmest adherents to the administration; and in their support of you, will suffer Mr. Randolph to have no communications with them. * * * But it is unfortunate for you to be embarrassed with such a soi-disant friend. You must not commit yourself to him.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 10. FORD ED., viii, 448. (W., May 1806.)

5494. MONROE (James), Recall from France.—I should not wonder if Monroe were * * * recalled [from France], under the idea of his being of the partisans of France, whom the President [Washington] considers as the partisans of war and confusion, * * * and as disposed to excite them to hostile measures, or at least to unfriendly sentiments; a most infatuated blindness to the true character of the sentiments entertained in favor of France.—To W. B. GILES. iv, 127. FORD ED., vii, 44. (M., Dec. 1795.)

5496. MONROE (James), Secretary of State.—Although I may not have been among the first, I am certainly with the sincerest, who congratulate you on your entrance into the national councils. Your value there has never been unduly estimated by those whom personal feelings did not misguide.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 597. FORD ED., ix, 323. (M., May 1811.)

5497. MONROE (James), Selection of a home.—On my return from the South of France, I shall send you * * * a plan of your house. I wish to heaven you may continue in the disposition to fix it in Albemarle. Short will establish himself there, and perhaps Madison may be tempted to do so. This will be society enough, and it will be the great sweetener of our lives. Without society, and a society to our taste, men are never contented. The one here supposed, we can regulate to our minds, and we may extend our regulations to the sumptuary department so as to set a good better prepared for his station with us.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 292. FORD ED., iv, 460. (P., 1787.) See ETIQUETTE.

5574. MURDER, Child.—By the stat. 21. Jac. i. c. 27. and Act. Ass. 1170. c. 12. concealment by the mother of the death of a bastard child is made murder. In justification of this, it is said, that shame is a feeling which operates so strongly on the mind, as frequently to induce the mother of such a child to murder it, in order to conceal her disgrace. The act of concealment, therefore, proves she was influenced by shame, and that influence produces a presumption that she murdered the child. The effect of this law, then is, to make what, in its nature, is only presumptive evidence of a murder conclusive of that fact. To this I answer, 1. So many children die before or soon after birth, that to presume all those murdered who are found dead, is a presumption which will lead us oftener wrong than right, and consequently would shed more blood than it would save. 2. If the child were born dead, the mother would naturally choose rather to conceal it, in hopes of still keeping a good character in the neighborhood. So that the act of concealment is far from proving the guilt of murder on the mother. 3. If shame be a powerful affection of the mind, is not parental love also? Is it not the strongest affection known? Is it not greater even than that of self-preservation? While we draw presumptions from shame, one affection of the mind, against the life of the prisoner, should we not give some weight to presumptions from parental love, an affection at least as strong, in favor of life? If concealment of the fact is a presumptive evidence of murder, so strong as to overbalance all other evidence that may possibly be produced to take away the presumption, why not trust the force of this incontestable presumption to the jury, who are, in a regular course, to hear presumptive, as well as positive testimony? If the presumption arising from the act of concealment, may be destroyed by proof, positive or circumstantial, to the contrary, why should the legislature preclude that contrary proof? Objection. The crime is difficult to prove, being usually committed in secret. Answer. But circumstantial proof will do; for example, marks of violence, the behavior, countenance, &c., of the prisoner, &c. And if conclusive proof be difficult to be obtained, shall we, therefore, fasten irremovably upon equivocal proof? Can we change the nature of what is contestable, and make it incontestable? Can we make that conclusive which God and nature have made inconclusive? Solon made no law against parricide, supposing it impossible that any one could be guilty of it; and the Persians from the same opinion, adjudged all who killed their reputed parents to be bastards; and although parental be yet stronger than filial affection, we admit saticide proved on the most equivocal testimony, whilst they rejected all proof of an act certainly not more repugnant to nature, as of a thing impossible, unprovable.—NOTE TO CRIMES BILL. i, 149. FORD ED., ii, 206. (1778.)

5575. MURDER, Of colonists.—The proposition [of Lord North] is altogether unsatisfactory * * * because it does not propose to repeal the several acts of Parliament * * * exempting, by mock trial, the murderers of colonists from punishment.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 480. (July 1775.)

5576. — — — He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation, for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us; for protecting them by a mock trial from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these States.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

5577. MURDER, Degrees of.—Man-slaughter is the killing a man with design, but in a sudden gust of passion, and where the killer has not had time to cool. The first offence is not punished capitally, but the second is. This is the law of England and of all the American States; and is not now a new proposition. Those laws have supposed that a man, whose passions have so much dominion over him, as to lead him to repeated acts of murder, is unsafe to society; that it is better he should be put to death by the law, than others more innocent than himself, on the movements of his impetuous passions.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 263. FORD ED., iv, 169. (P., 1786.)

5578. — — — In 1796, our Legislature passed the law for amending the penal laws of the Commonwealth. [Virginia.] * * * Instead of the settled distinctions of murder and manslaughter, preserved in my bill, they introduced the new terms of murder in the first and second degrees.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 47. FORD ED., i, 65. (1821.)

5579. MURDER, Excusable.—Excusable homicides are in some cases not quite unblamable: These should subject the party to marks of contrition; viz., the killing of a man in defence of property; so also in defence of one's person, which is a species of excusable homicide; because, although cases may happen where these are also commendable, yet most frequently they are done on too slight appearance of danger; as in return for a blow, kick, fillip, &c., or on a person's getting into a house, not animo furandi, but perhaps veneris causa, &c. Excusable homicides are by misadventure, or in self-defence.—NOTE TO CRIMES BILL. i, 152. FORD ED., ii, 209. (1779.)

5580. MURDER, Indian.—I wish Governor Harrison may be able to have the murder of the Kaskaskian by the Kickapoo settled in the Indian way. * * * Both the Indians and our own people need some example of punishment for the murder of an Indian.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 162. (M., 1807.)

5581. — — — When a murder has been committed on one of our stragglers, the murderer should be demanded. If not delivered, give time, and still press the demand. We find it difficult, with our regular government, to take and punish a murderer of an Indian. Indeed, I believe we have never been able to do it in a single instance. They have their difficulties also, and require time. In fact, it is a case where indulgence on both sides is just and necessary, to prevent the two nations from being perpetually committed in war, by the acts of the most vagabond and ungovernable of their members. When the refusal to deliver

* The clause of Jefferson's bill read as follows: "And where persons, meaning to commit a trespass only, or larceny, or other unlawful deed, and doing an act from which involuntary homicide hath ensued, have heretofore been adjudged guilty of manslaughter, or of murder, by transferring such their unlawful intention to an act, much more penal than they could have in probable contemplation; no such case shall hereafter be deemed manslaughter, unless manslaughter was intended, nor murder, unless murder was intended."—EDITOR.

the murderer is permanent, and proceeds from the want of will, and not of ability we should then interdict all trade and intercourse with them till they give us complete satisfaction.—To MERIWETHER LEWIS. v, 350. (M., 1808.)

5582. ———. If we had to go to war [with the Indians] for every hunter or trader killed, and murderer refused, we should have had general and constant war. The process to be followed, in my opinion, when a murder has been committed, is first to demand the murderer, and not regarding a first refusal to deliver, give time and press it. If perseveringly refused, recall all traders, and interdict commerce with them, until he be delivered.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 348. (M., Aug. 1808.)

5583. MURDER, Punishment for.—As there was but one white man murdered by the Indians, I should be averse to the execution of more than one of them, selecting the most guilty and worst character. Nothing but extreme criminality should induce the execution of a second, and nothing beyond that. Their idea is that justice allows only man for man, that all beyond that is new aggression, which must be expiated by a new sacrifice of an equivalent number of our people.—To MERIWETHER LEWIS. v, 354. (M., 1808.)

5584. ———. There is the more reason for moderation, as we know we cannot punish any murder which shall be committed by us on them. Even if the murderer can be taken, our juries have never yet convicted the murderer of an Indian.—To MERIWETHER LEWIS. v, 354. (M., 1808.)

5585. MURDER, Self.—Suicide is by law punishable by forfeiture of chattels. This bill (revising the Virginia Code) exempts it from forfeiture. The suicide injures the State less than he who leaves it with his effects. If the latter then be not punished, the former should not. As to the example, we need not fear its influence. Men are too much attached to life, to exhibit frequent instances of depriving themselves of it. At any rate, the quasi-punishment of confiscation will not prevent it. For if one be found who can calmly determine to renounce life, who is so weary of his existence here, as rather to make experiment of what is beyond the grave, can we suppose him, in such a state of mind, susceptible of influence from the losses to his family from confiscation? That men in general, too, disapprove of this severity, is apparent from the constant practice of juries finding the suicide in a state of insanity; because they have no other way of saving the forfeiture. Let it then be done away.—NOTE TO CRIMES BILL. i, 152. FORD ED., ii, 210. (1779.)

5586. MUSEUMS, Maintenance of.—Nobody can desire more ardently than myself, to concur in whatever may promote useful science, and I view no science with more partiality than Natural History. But I have ever believed that in this, as in most other cases, abortive attempts retard rather than promote this object. To be really useful we must keep pace with the state of society, and not dishearten it by attempts at what its population, means, or occupations will fail in attempting. In the particular enterprises for museums, we have seen the populous and wealthy cities of Boston and New York unable to found or maintain such an institution. The feeble condition of that in each of these places sufficiently proves this. In Philadelphia alone, has this attempt succeeded to a good degree. It has been owing there to a measure of zeal and perseverance in an individual rarely equalled; to a population, crowded, wealthy, and more than usually addicted to the pursuit of knowledge. And, with all this, the institution does not maintain itself.—To MR. DE LA COSTE. v, 79. (W., 1807.)

5587. MUSIC, Domestic bands.—The bounds of an American fortune will not admit the indulgence of a domestic band of musicians, yet I have thought that a passion for music might be reconciled with that economy which we are obliged to observe. I retain, for instance, among my domestic servants a gardener, a weaver, a cabinet-maker, and a stone-cutter, to which I would add a vigneron. In a country where, like yours [France], music is cultivated and practiced by every class of men, I suppose there might be found persons of these trades who could perform on the French horn, clarionet, or hautboy, and bassoon, so that one might have a band of two French horns, two clarionets, two hautboys, and a bassoon, without enlarging his domestic expenses. A certainty of employment for a half dozen years, and at the end of that time, to find them, if they chose, a conveyance to their own country, might induce them to come here on reasonable wages. Without meaning to give you trouble, perhaps it might be practicable for you * * * to find out such men disposed to come to America. Sobriety and good nature would be desirable parts of their characters. If you think such a plan practicable, and will be so kind as to inform me what will be necessary to be done on my part, I will take care that it shall be done. To ———. i, 209. FORD ED., ii, 159. (Wg., 1778.)

5588. MUSIC, Ear for.—Music is invaluable where a person has an ear. Where they have not, it should not be attempted.—To N. BURWELL. vii, 103. FORD ED., x, 105. (M., 1818.)

5589. MUSIC, Enjoyment of.—Music is an enjoyment [in France] the deprivation of which with us, cannot be calculated. I am almost ready to say, it is the only thing which from my heart I envy them, and which, in spite of all the authority of the Decalogue, I do covet.—To MR. BELLINI. i, 445. (P., 1785.)

5590. MUSIC, Foot-bass.—I have lately examined a foot-bass, newly invented by the celebrated Krumpholtz. It is precisely a piano-forte, about ten feet long, eighteen inches broad, and nine inches deep. It is of one octave only, from fa to fa. The part where the keys are projects at the side in order to lengthen the levers of the keys. It is placed on the floor, on the harpsichord or other piano-forte, is set over it, the foot acting in concert on that, while the fingers play on this. There are three unison chords to every note, of strong brass wire, and the lowest have wire wrapped on them as the lowest in the piano-forte. The chords give a fine, clear, deep tone almost like the pipe of an organ.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. ii, 75. (P., 1786.)

5591. MUSIC, Harmonica.—I am very much pleased with your project on the harmonica, and the prospect of your succeeding in the application of keys to it. It will be the greatest present which has been made to the musical world this century, not excepting the piano-forte. If its tone approaches that given by the finger as nearly only as the harpsichord does that of the harp, it will be very valuable.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. ii, 75. (P., 1786.)

5592. MUSIC, Harpsichord.—I applaud much your perseverance in improving this instrument [harpsichord], and benefiting mankind almost in spite of their teeth.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. i, 440. (P., 1785.)

5593. MUSIC, Keeping time.—Monsieur Renaudin's invention for determining the true time of the musical movements, Largo, Adagio, &c. * * * has been examined by the [Paris] Academy of Music, who are so well satisfied of its utility, that they have ordered all music which shall be printed here, in future, to have the movements numbered in correspondence with this plexi-chronometer. * * * The instrument is useful, but still it may be greatly simplified. I got him to make me one, and having fixed a pendulum vibrating seconds, I tried by that the vibrations of his pendulum, according to the several movements. I find the pendulum regulated to

| | | | |
|---------|------------|-----|---------|
| Largo | } vibrates | 54 | } times |
| Adagio | | 60 | |
| Andante | | 70 | |
| Allegro | | 95 | |
| Presto | | 135 | |

Every one, therefore, may make a chronometer adapted to his instrument. For a harpsichord, the following occurs to me: In the wall of your chamber, over the instrument, drive five little brads, as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, in the following manner. Take a string with a bob to it, of such length, as that hung on No. 1, it shall vibrate fifty-two times in a minute. Then proceed by trial to drive number No. 2, at such a distance, that drawing the loop of the string to that, the part remaining between 1 and the bob, shall vibrate sixty times in a minute. Fix the third for seventy vibrations, &c.; the chord always hanging over No. 1, as the centre of vibration. A person, playing on the violin, may fix this on his music stand. A pendulum, thrown into vibration, will continue in motion long enough to give you the time of your piece.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. i, 504. (P., 1786.)

5594. MUSIC, Negroes and.—In music the blacks are more generally gifted than the whites, with accurate ears for tune and time, and they have been found capable of imagining a small catch.* Whether they will be equal to the composition of a more extensive run of melody, or of complicated harmony, is yet to be proved.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 383. FORD ED., iii, 246. (1782.)

5595. MUSIC, Passion for.—If there is a gratification which I envy any people in this world, it is to your country [France] its music. This is the favorite passion of my soul, and fortune has cast my lot in a country where it is in a state of deplorable barbarism.—To ——. i, 209. FORD ED., ii, 158. (Wg., 1778.)

5596. MUSIC, Piano.—I wrote [you] for a Clavichord. I have since seen a Forte-piano and am charmed with it. Send me this instrument then instead of the Clavichord: let the case be of fine mahogany, solid, not veneered, the compass from Double G. to F. in alt, a plenty of spare strings; and the workmanship

* The instrument proper to them is the banjer (corrupted by the negroes into "banjo") which they brought hither from Africa, which is the original of guitar, its chords being precisely the four lower 1's of the guitar.—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

5597. ——. I had almost decided, on Piccini's advice, to get a piano-forte for my daughter; but your last letter may pause me, till I see its effect.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. i, 440. (P., 1785.)

5598. MUSIC, Quilling.—I do not altogether despair of making something of your method of quilling, though, as yet, the prospect is not favorable.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. i, 440. (P., 1785.)

5599. ——. I mentioned to Piccini the improvement [quilling] with which I am entrusted. He plays on the piano-forte, and therefore did not feel himself personally interested.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. i, 440. (P., 1785.)

5600. MUSKETS, Improved.—An improvement is made here [France] in the construction of muskets, which it may be interesting to Congress to know, should they at any time propose to procure any. It consists in the making every part of them so exactly alike, that what belongs to any one, may be used for every other musket in the magazine. * * * As yet, the inventor has only completed the lock of the musket, on this plan. * * * He presented me the parts of fifty locks taken to pieces, and arranged in compartments. I put several together myself, taking pieces at hazard as they came to hand, and they fitted in the most perfect manner.—To JOHN JAY. i, 411. (P., 1785.)

5601. NAMES, Authority of great.—It is surely time for men to think for themselves, and to throw off the authority of names so artificially magnified.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 165. (M., 1820.)

5602. NAMES, Bestowal of.—I agree with you entirely in condemning the mania of giving names to objects of any kind after persons still living. Death alone can seal the title of any man to this honor, by putting it out of his power to forfeit it.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 335. FORD ED., vii, 459. (M., 1800.)

5603. ——. There is one * * * mode of recording merit, which I have often thought might be introduced, so as to gratify the living by praising the dead. In giving, for instance, a commission of Chief Justice to Bushrod Washington, it should be in consideration of his integrity, and science in the laws, and of the services rendered to our country by his illustrious relation, &c. A commission to a descendant of Dr. Franklin, besides being in consideration of the proper qualifications of the person, should add that of the great services rendered by his illustrious ancestor, Benjamin Franklin, by the advancement of science, by inventions useful to man, &c.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 335. FORD ED., vii, 459. (M., 1800.)

5604. ——. I am sensible of the mark of esteem manifested by the name you have given to your son. Tell him from me, that he must consider as essentially belonging to it, to love his friends and wish no ill to his enemies.—To DAVID CAMPBELL. v, 499. (M., 1810.)

5605. NAMES, Opinions and.—If * * * opinions are sound * * * they will prevail by their own weight without the aid of names.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 35. FORD ED., x, 45. (M., 1816.)

5606. NAMES, Political party.—The appellation of aristocrats and democrats is the true one expressing the essence of all [parties].—To H. LEE. vii, 376. FORD ED., x, 318. (M., 1824.)

5607. NAMES, Property in.—I am not sure that we ought to change all our names. During the regal government, sometimes, indeed, they were given through adulation; but often also as the reward of the merit of the times, sometimes for services rendered the colony. Perhaps, too, a name when given, should be deemed a sacred property.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 335. FORD ED., vii, 459. (M., 1800.)

5608. NASSAU, Fame of.—Nassau is a village the whole rents of which would not amount to more than a hundred or two guineas. Yet it gives the title of Prince to the house of Orange to which it belongs.—TRAVELS IN HOLLAND. ix, 383. (1787.)

5609. NATION (United States), Building the.—The interests of the States ought to be made joint in every possible instance, in order to cultivate the idea of our being one nation, and to multiply the instances in which the people shall look up to Congress as their head.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 347. FORD ED., iv, 52. (P., 1785.)

5610. — — — It is, indeed, an animating thought that, while we are securing the rights of ourselves and posterity, we are pointing out the way to struggling nations who wish, like us, to emerge from their tyrannies also.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iii, 128. FORD ED., v, 147. (1790.)

5611. NATION (United States), Conscience of.—It is true that nations are to be judges for themselves since no one nation has a right to sit in judgment over another. But the tribunal of our consciences remains, and that also of the opinion of the world. These will revise the sentence we pass in our own case, and as we respect these, we must see that in judging ourselves we have honestly done the part of impartial and rigorous judges.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 614. FORD ED., vi, 221. (1793.)

5612. NATION (United States), Foreign policy.—Unmeddling with the affairs of other nations, we presume not to prescribe or censure their course.—To MADAME DE STAEL. v, 133. (W., 1807.)

5613. — — — We wish the happiness and prosperity of every nation.—To MADAME DE STAEL. vi, 482. (M., 1815.)

5614. NATION (United States), Liberty.—I am in all cases for a liberal conduct towards other nations, believing that the practice of the same friendly feelings and generous dispositions, which attach individuals in private life, will attach societies on the larger scale, which are composed of individuals.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 222. (M., 1803.)

5615. NATION (United States), Objects of.—Peace with all nations, and the right which that gives us with respect to all nations, are our object.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 535. (Pa., 1793.)

5616. — — — I hope the United States will ever place themselves among [the number of] peaceable nations.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 411. FORD ED., viii, 91. (M., Sep. 1801.)

5617. NATION (United States), Supremacy.—Not in our day, but at no distant one, we may shake a rod over the heads of all, which may make the stoutest of them tremble. But I hope our wisdom will grow with our power, and teach us, that the less we use our power the greater it will be.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 465. FORD ED., ix, 520. (M., 1815.) See POLICY.

5618. — — — The day is not distant, when we may formally require a meridian of partition through the ocean which separates the two hemispheres, on the hither side of which no European gun shall ever be heard, nor an American on the other; and when, during the rage of the eternal wars of Europe, the lion and the lamb, within our regions, shall lie down together in peace.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 168. (M., 1820.)

5619. NATIONAL CURRENCY, Bank paper and.—The question will be asked and ought to be looked at, what is to be the resource if loans cannot be obtained? There is but one, "Carthago delenda est". Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation to whom it belongs. It is the only fund on which they can rely for loans; it is the only resource which can never fail them and it is an abundant one for every necessary purpose. Treasury bills, bottomed on taxes, bearing or not bearing interest, as may be found necessary, thrown into circulation will take the place of so much gold and silver, which last, when crowded, will find an efflux into other countries, and thus keep the quantum of medium at its salutary level. Let banks continue if they please, but let them discount for cash alone or for treasury notes. They discount for cash alone in every other country on earth except Great Britain, and her too often unfortunate copyist, the United States. If taken in time, they may be rectified by degrees, and without injustice, but if let alone till the alternative forces itself on us, of submitting to the enemy for want of funds, or the suppression of bank paper, either by law or by convulsion, we cannot foresee how it will end.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 199. FORD ED., ix, 399. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

5620. — — — Put down the banks, and if this country could not be carried through the longest war against her most powerful enemy, without ever knowing the want of a dollar, without dependence on the traitorous classes of her citizens, without bearing hard on the resources of the people, or loading the public with an indefinite burthen of debt, I know nothing of my countrymen. Not by any novel project, not by any charlatanerie, but by ordinary and well-experienced means; by the total prohibition of all private paper at all times, by reasonable taxes in war aided by the necessary emissions of public paper of circulating size, this bottomed on special taxes, redeemable annually as this special tax comes in, and finally within a moderate period.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 498. (M., Oct. 1815.)

5621. NATIONAL CURRENCY, Bank suspensions and.—The failure of our banks * * * restores to us a fund which ought never to have been surrendered by the nation, and which now, prudently used, will carry us through all the fiscal difficulties of the war.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 386. (M., Sep. 1814.)

5622. NATIONAL CURRENCY, Borrowing fund.—I am sorry to see our loans begin at so exorbitant an interest. And yet, even at that you will soon be at the bottom of the loan-bag. We are an agricultural nation. Such an one employs its sparings in the purchase or improvement of land or stocks. The lendable money among them is chiefly that of orphans and wards in the hands of executors and guardians, and that which the former lays by till he has enough for the purchase in view. In such a nation there is one, and only one, resource for loans, sufficient to carry them through the expense of a war; and that will always be sufficient, and in the power of an honest government, punctual in the preservation of its faith. The fund I mean, is the mass of circulating coin. Every one knows, that although not literally, it is nearly true, that every paper dollar emitted banishes a silver one from the circulation. A nation, therefore, making its purchases and payments with bills fitted for circulation, thrusts an equal sum of coin out of circulation. This is equivalent to borrowing that sum, and yet the vendor, receiving in payment a medium as effectual as coin for his purchases or payments, has no claim to interest. And so the nation may continue to issue its bills as far as its wants require, and the limits of the circulation will admit. Those limits are understood to extend with us at present, to two hundred millions of dollars, a greater sum than would be necessary for any war. But this, the only resource which the government could command with certainty, the States have unfortunately fooled away, nay corruptly alienated to swindlers and shavers, under the cover of private banks. Say, too, as an additional evil, that the disposal funds of individuals, to this great amount, have thus been withdrawn from improvement and useful enterprise, and employed in the useless, usurious and demoralizing practices of bank directors and their accomplices. In the year 1775, our State [Virginia] availed itself of this fund by issuing a paper money, bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption, and, to insure its credit, bearing an interest of five per cent. Within a very short time, not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation. It was locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, widows, farmers, &c. We then issued bills bottomed on a redeeming tax, but bearing no interest. These were readily received, and never depreciated a single farthing. In the Revolutionary war, the old Congress and the States issued bills without interest, and without a tax. They occupied the channels of circulation very freely, till those channels were overflowed by an excess beyond all the calls of circulation. But, although we have so improvidently suffered the field of circulating medium to be filched from us by private individuals, yet I think we may recover it in part, and even in the whole, if the States will cooperate with us. If Treasury bills are emitted on a tax appropriated for their redemption in fifteen years, and (to ensure preference in the first moments of competition) bearing an interest of six per cent. there is no one who would not take them in preference to the bank paper now afloat, on a principle of patriotism as well as interest; and they would be withdrawn from circulation into private hoards to a considerable amount. Their credit once established, others might be emitted, bottomed also on a tax, but not bearing interest, and if even their credit faltered, open public loans, on which these bills alone should be received as specie. These, operating as a sinking fund, would reduce the quantity in circulation, so as to maintain that in an equilibrium with specie. It is not easy to estimate the obstacles which, in the beginning, we should encounter in ousting the banks from their possession of the circulation; but a steady and judicious alternation of emissions and loans, would reduce them in time. But while this is going on, another measure should be pressed, to recover ultimately our right to the circulation. The States should be applied to, to transfer the right of issuing circulating paper to Congress exclusively, in perpetuum, if possible, but during the war at least, with a saving of charter rights. I believe that every State west and south of the Connecticut River, except Delaware, would immediately do it; and the others would follow in time. Congress would, of course, begin by obliging unchartered banks to wind up their affairs within a short time, and the others as their charters expired, forbidding the subsequent circulation of their paper. This, they would supply with their own, bottomed, every emission, on an adequate tax, and bearing or not bearing interest, as the state of the public pulse should indicate. Even in the non-complying States, these bills would make their way, and supplant the unfunded paper of their banks, by their solidity, by the universality of their currency, and by their receivability for customs and taxes. It would be in their power, too, to curtail those banks to the amount of their actual specie, by gathering up their paper, and running it constantly on them. The national paper might thus take place even in the non-complying States. In this way, I am not without a hope, that this great, this sole resource for loans in an agricultural country, might yet be recovered for the use of the nation during war; and, if obtained in perpetuum, it would always be sufficient to carry us through any war; provided, that in the interval between war and war, all the outstanding paper should be called in, coin be permitted to flow in again, and to hold the field of circulation until another war should require its yielding place again to the national medium.—To JOHN WAYLES EPPES. vi. 139. FORD ED., ix, 391. (M., June 1813.)

5623. ——. I like well your idea of issuing treasury notes bearing interest, because I am persuaded they would soon be withdrawn from circulation and locked up in vaults in private hoards. It would put it in the power of every man to lend his $100 or $1000, though not able to go forward on the great scale, and be the most advantageous way of obtaining a loan.—To THOMAS LAW. FORD ED., ix, 433. (M., Nov. 1813.)

5624. ——. The circulating fund is the only one we can ever command with certainty. It is sufficient for all our wants; and the impossibility of even defending the country without its aid as a borrowing fund, renders it indispensable that the nation should take and keep it in their own hands, as their exclusive resource.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi. 393. FORD ED., ix, 491. (M., Oct. 1814.)

5625. ——. Although a century of British experience has proved to what a wonderful extent the funding on specific redeeming taxes enables a nation to anticipate in war the resources of peace, and although the other nations of Europe have tried and trodden every path of force or folly in fruitless quest of the same object, yet we still expect to find in juggling tricks and banking dreams, that money can be made out of nothing, and in sufficient quantities to meet the expenses of a heavy war by sea and land. It is said, indeed, that money cannot be borrowed from our merchants as from those of England. But it can be borrowed from our people. They will give you all the necessities of war they produce, if, instead of the bankrupt trash they are now obliged to receive for want of any other, you will give them a paper promise funded on a specific pledge, and of a size for common circulation. But you say the merchants will not take this paper. What the people take the merchants must take, or sell nothing. All these doubts and fears prove only the extent of the dominion which the banking institutions have obtained over the minds of our citizens, and especially of those inhabiting cities or other banking places; and this dominion must be broken, or it will break us. But * * * we must make up our minds to suffer yet longer before we can get right. The misfortune is, that in the meantime, we shall plunge ourselves in unextinguishable debt, and entail on our posterity an inheritance of eternal taxes, which will bring our government and people into the condition of those of England, a nation of pikes and gudgeons, the latter bred merely as food for the former.—To JAMES MONROE. vi. 409. FORD ED., ix, 497. (M., Jan. 1815.)

5626. NATIONAL CURRENCY, Circulating medium.—If I have used any expression restraining the emissions of treasury notes to a sufficient medium, * * * I have done it inadvertently, and under the impression then possessing me, that the war would be very short. A sufficient medium would not, on the principles of any writer, exceed thirty millions of dollars, and of those of some not ten millions. Our experience has proved it may be run up to two or three hundred millions, without more than doubling what would be the prices of things under a sufficient medium, or say a metallic one, which would always keep itself at the sufficient point; and, if they rise to this term, and the descent from it be gradual, it would not produce sensible revolutions in private fortunes. I shall be able to explain my views more definitely by the use of numbers. Suppose we require, to carry on the war, an annual loan of twenty millions, then I propose that, in the first year, you shall lay a tax of two millions, and emit twenty millions of treasury notes, of a size proper for circulation, and bearing no interest, to the redemption of which the proceeds of that tax shall be inviolably pledged and applied, by recalling annually their amount of the identical bills funded on them. The second year, lay another tax of two millions, and emit twenty millions more. The third year the same, and so on, until you have reached the maximum of taxes which ought to be imposed. Let me suppose this maximum to be one dollar a head, or ten millions of dollars, merely as an exemplification more familiar than would be the algebraical symbols x or y . You would reach this in five years. The sixth year, then, still emit twenty millions of treasury notes, and continue all the taxes two years longer. The seventh year, twenty millions more, and continue the whole taxes another two years; and so on. Observe, that although you emit twenty millions of dollars a year, you call in ten millions, and, consequently, add but ten millions annually to the circulation. It would be in thirty years, then, primâ facie, that you would reach the present circulation of three hundred millions, or the ultimate term to which we might venture. But observe, also, that in that time we shall have become thirty millions of people, to whom three hundred millions of dollars would be no more than one hundred millions to us now; which sum would probably not have raised prices more than fifty per cent. on what may be deemed the standard, or metallic prices. This increased population and consumption, while it would be increasing the proceeds of the redemption tax, and lessening the balance annually thrown into circulation, would also absorb, without saturation, more of the surplus medium, and enable us to push the same process to a much higher term, to one which we might safely call indefinite, because extending so far beyond the limits, either in time or expense, of any supposable war. All we should have to do would be, when the war should be ended, to leave the gradual extinction of these notes to the operation of the taxes pledged for their redemption; not to suffer a dollar of paper to be emitted either by public or private authority, but let the metallic medium flow back into the channels of circulation, and occupy them until another war should oblige us to recur, for its support, to the same resource, and the same process, on the circulating medium.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 392. FORD ED., ix, 489. (M., Oct. 1814.)

5627. — — —. The government is now issuing Treasury notes for circulation, bottomed on solid funds and bearing interest. The banking confederacy (and the merchants bound to them by their debts) will endeavor to crush the credit of these notes; but the country is eager for them, as something they can trust to, and as soon as a convenient quantity of them can get into circulation the bank notes die.—To JEAN BAPTISTE SAY. vi, 434. (M., 1815.)

5628. — — —. The war, had it proceeded, would have upset our government; and a new one, whenever tried, will do it. And so it must be while our money, the nerve of war, is much or little, real or imaginary, as our bitterest enemies choose to make it.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 498. (M., Oct. 1815.)

5629. NATIONAL CURRENCY, Congressional control.—From the establishment of the United States Bank, to this day, I have preached against this system, and have been sensible no cure could be hoped but in the catastrophe now happening. The remedy was to let banks drop gradually at the expiration of their charters, and for the State governments to relinquish the power of establishing others. This would not, as it should not, have given the power of establishing them to Congress. But Congress could then have issued treasury notes payable within a fixed period, and founded on a specific tax, the proceeds of which, as they came in, should be exchangeable for the notes of that particular emission only. This depended, it is true, on the will of the State Legislatures, and would have brought on us the phalanx of paper interest. But that interest is now defunct.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 381. (M., Sep. 1814.)

5630. — — —. To give readier credit to their bills, without obliging themselves to give cash for them on demand, let their collectors be instructed to do so, when they have; thus, in some measure, performing the functions of a bank, as to their own notes.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 382. (M., Sep. 1814.)

5631. NATIONAL CURRENCY, Redemption.—Treasury notes of small as well as high denomination, bottomed on a tax which would redeem them in ten years, would place at our disposal the whole circulating medium of the United States; a fund of credit sufficient to carry us through any probable length of war. A small issue of such paper is now commencing. It will immediately supersede the bank paper; nobody receiving that now but for the purposes of the day, and never in payments which are to lie by for any time. In fact, all the banks having declared they will not give cash in exchange for their own notes, these circulate merely because there is no other medium of exchange. As soon as the treasury notes get into circulation, the others will cease to hold any competition with them. I trust that another year will confirm this experiment, and restore this fund to the public, who ought never more to permit its being filched from them by private speculators and disorganizers of the circulation.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 419. FORD ED., ix, 503. (M., Feb. 1815.)

5632. — — —. The third great measure necessary to ensure us permanent prosperity, should ensure resources of money by the suppression of all paper circulation during peace, and licensing that of the nation alone during war. The metallic medium of which we should be possessed at the commencement of a war, would be a sufficient fund for all the loans we should need through its continuance; and if the national bills issued, be bottomed (as is indispensable) on pledges of specific taxes for their redemption within certain and moderate epochs, and be of proper denominations for circulation, no interest on them would be necessary or just, because they would answer to every one the purposes of the metallic money withdrawn and replaced by them.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 8. FORD ED., x, 36. (M., 1816.) See BANKS, DOLLAR, MONEY, and PAPER MONEY.

5634. NATIONS, Dictation to.—The presumption of dictating to an independent nation the form of its government, is so arrogant, so atrocious, that indignation, as well as moral sentiment, enlists all our partialities and prayers in favor of one, and our equal execrations against the other.—To JAMES MONROE. vii, 287. 5635. NATIONS, European.—The European societies * * * under pretence of governing, have divided their nations into two classes, wolves and sheep.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 100. FORD ED., iv, 360. (P., 1787.)

5636. ——. The European are nations of eternal war. All their energies are expended in the destruction of the labor, property, and lives of their people.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 288. FORD ED., x, 257. (M., 1823.)

5637. NATIONS, Extinction of.—I shall not wonder to see the scenes of ancient Rome and Carthage renewed in our day; and if not pursued to the same issue, it may be because the republic of modern powers will not permit the extinction of any one of its members.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. i, 553. (P., 1786.)

5638. NATIONS, Good faith.—A character of good faith is of as much value to a nation as to an individual.—THE ANAS. FORD ED., i, 332. (1808.)

5639. NATIONS, Government of.—I think, with others, that nations are to be governed according to their own interest, but I am convinced that it is their interest, in the long run to be grateful, faithful to their engagements, even in the worst of circumstances, and honorable and generous always.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 132. FORD ED., v, 152. (N.Y., 1790.)

5640. NATIONS, History and.—Wars and contentions, indeed, fill the pages of history with more matter. But more blest is that nation whose silent course of happiness furnishes nothing for history to say. This is what I ambition for my own country.—To COUNT DIODATI. v, 62. (W., 1807.)

5641. NATIONS, Ignorant.—If a nation expects to be ignorant and free, in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 517. FORD ED., x, 4. (M., 1816.)

5642. NATIONS, Interest of.—The interests of a nation, when well understood, will be found to coincide with their moral duties.—PARAGRAPH FOR PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE. FORD ED., vi, 119. (1792.)

5643. NATIONS, Jefferson's prayer for all.—I wish that all nations may recover and retain their independence; that those which are overgrown may not advance beyond safe measures of power, that a salutary balance may be ever maintained among nations, and that our peace, commerce and friendship may be sought and cultivated by all.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 464. FORD ED., ix, 520. (M., 1815.)

5644. ——. Notwithstanding all the French and British atrocities, which will forever disgrace the present era of history, their shameless prostration of all the laws of morality which constitute the security, the peace and comfort of man—notwithstanding the waste of human life, and measure of human suffering which they have inflicted on the world—nations hitherto in slavery have desired through all this bloody mist a glimmering of their own rights. have dared to open their eyes, and to see that their own power will suffice for their emancipation. Their tyrants must now give them more moderate forms of government, and they seem now to be sensible of this themselves. Instead of the parricide treason of Bonaparte in employing the means confided to him as a republican magistrate to the overthrow of that republic, and establishment of a military despotism in himself and his descendants, to the subversion of the neighboring governments, and erection of thrones for his brothers, his sisters and sycophants, had he honestly employed that power in the establishment and support of the freedom of his own country, there is not a nation in Europe which would not at this day have had a more rational government, one in which the will of the people should have had a moderating and salutary influence. The work will now be longer, will swell more rivers with blood, produce more sufferings and more crimes. But it will be consummated; and that it may be will be the theme of my constant prayers while I shall remain on the earth beneath, or in the heavens above.—To WILLIAM BENTLEY. vi, 503. (M., 1815.)

5645. NATIONS, Just and unjust.—A just nation is taken on its word, when recourse is had to armaments and wars to bridle others.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 40. FORD ED., viii, 343. (1805.)

5646. ——. No nation, however powerful, any more than an individual, can be unjust with impunity. Sooner or later public opinion, an instrument merely moral in the beginning, will find occasion physically to inflict its sentences on the unjust.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 300. (M., 1804.)

5647. NATIONS, Justice and.—No nation can answer for perfect exactitude of proceedings in all their inferior courts. It suffices to provide a supreme judicature, where all error and partiality will be ultimately corrected.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 414. FORD ED., vi, 55. (Pa., 1792.)

5648. NATIONS, Liberal.—A nation, by establishing a character of liberality and magnanimity, gains in the friendship and respect of others more than the worth of mere money.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 56. (1806.)

5649. NATIONS, Manners of.—It is difficult to determine on the standard by which the manners of a nation may be tried, whether catholic or particular. It is more difficult for a native to bring to that standard the manners of his own nation, familiarized to him by habit.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 403. FORD ED., iii, 266. (1782.)

5650. NATIONS, Money and rights of.—Money is the agent by which modern nations will recover their rights.—To COMTE DE MOUSTIER. ii, 389. FORD ED., v, 12. (P., 1788.)

5651. NATIONS, Morality.—A nation, as a society, forms a moral person, and every member of it is personally responsible for his society.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 419. FORD ED., vi, 59. (Pa., 1792.) See MORALITY (NATIONAL).

5652. ——. The moral obligations constitute a law for nations as well as individuals.—R. to A. N. Y. TAMMANY SOCIETY. viii, 127. (1808.)

5653. NATIONS, Natural rights of.—In no case are the laws of a nation changed, of natural right, by their passage from one to another domination. The soil, the inhabitants, their property, and the laws by which they are protected go together. Their laws are subject to be changed only in the ease, and extent which their new legislature shall will.—BATTURE CASE. viii, 528. (1812.)

5654. NATIONS, Neighboring.—We have seldom seen neighborhood produce affection among nations. The reverse is almost the universal truth.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 499. FORD ED., viii, 243. (M., 1803.)

5655. NATIONS, Oppressed.—That we should wish to see the people of other countries free, is as natural, and at least as justifiable, as that one King should wish to see the Kings of other countries maintained in their despotism.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 78. FORD ED., x, 90. (M., 1817.)

5656. NATIONS, Peculiarities of.—In reading the travels of a Frenchman through the United States what he remarks as peculiarities in us, prove to us the contrary peculiarities of the French. We have the accounts of Barbary from European and American travellers. It would be more amusing if Melli Melli would give us his observations on the United States. If, with the fables and follies of the Hindoos, so justly pointed out to us by yourself and other travellers, we could compare the contrast of those which an Hindoo traveller would imagine he found among us, it might enlarge our instruction. It would be curious to see what parallel among us he would select for his Veeshni.—To NATHANIEL GREENE. vi, 72. (M., 1812.)

5657. NATIONS, Political conditions in.—The condition of different descriptions of inhabitants in any country is a matter of municipal arrangement, of which no foreign country has a right to take notice. All its inhabitants are as men to them.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 37. FORD ED., x, 46. (M., 1816.)

5658. NATIONS, Representation and.—The [representative principle] has taken deep root in the European mind, and will have its growth; their despots,* sensible of this, are already offering this modification of their governments, as if of their own accord. Instead of the parricide treason of Bonaparte. in perverting the means confided to him as a republican magistrate, to the subversion of that republic and erection of a military despotism for himself and his family, had he used it honestly for the establishment and support of a free government in his own country, France would now have been in freedom and rest; and her example operating in a contrary direction, every nation in Europe would have had a government over which the will of the people would have had some control. His atrocious egotism has checked the salutary progress of principle, and deluged it with rivers of blood which are not yet run out. To the vast sum of devastation and of human misery, of which he has been the guilty cause, much is still to be added. But the object is fixed in the eye of nations, and they will press on to its accomplishment and to the general amelioration of the condition of man. What a germ have we planted, and how faithfully should we cherish the parent tree at home!—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 520. FORD ED., x, 8. (M., 1816.)

5659. NATIONS, Revolution.—When subjects are able to maintain themselves in the field, they are then an independent power as to all neutral nations, are entitled to their commerce, and to protection within their limits.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 550. FORD ED., x, 19. (M., 1816.)

5660. NATIONS, Standing of.—The just standing of all nations is the health and security of all.—To JAMES MAURY. vi, 52. FORD ED., ix, 349. (M., 1812.)

5661. NATIONS, Unity of large.—The laws of nature render a large country unconquerable if they adhere firmly together, and to their purpose.—To H. INNES. FORD ED., vi, 266. (Pa., 1793.)

5662. ——. Without union of action and effort in all its parts, no nation can be happy or safe.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 100. FORD ED., ix, 75. (W., 1807.)

5663. ——. A nation united can never be conquered. We have seen what the ignorant, bigoted and unarmed Spaniards could do against the disciplined veterans of their invaders. * * * The oppressors may cut off heads after heads, but like those of the Hydra they multiply at every stroke. The recruits within a nation's own limits are prompt and without number; while those of their invaders from a distance are slow, limited, and must come to an end.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 525. (M., 1816.)

5664. NATIONS, Young.—The first object of young societies is bread and covering; science is but secondary and subsequent.—To J. EVELYN DENISON. vii, 418. (M., 1825.)

5665. NATIONS (American), Coalition of.—Nothing is so important as that America shall separate herself from the systems of Europe, and establish one of her own. Our circumstances, our pursuits, our interests, are distinct, the principles of our policy should be so also. All entanglements with that quarter of the globe should be avoided if we mean that peace and justice shall be the polar stars of the American societies. * * * [This] would be a leading principle with me, had I longer to live.—To J. CORREA DE SERRA. vii, 184. FORD ED., x, 162. (M., Oct. 1820.)

5666. NATURAL BRIDGE, Description.—The Natural Bridge, the most sublime of Nature's works, * * * is on the ascent of a hill which seems to have been cloven through its length by some great convulsion. The fissure, just at the Bridge, is, by some admeasurements, 270 feet deep, by others only 205. It is about 45 feet wide at the bottom and 90 feet at the top; this of course determines the length of the bridge, and its height from the water. Its breadth in the middle is about 60 feet, but more at the ends, and the thickness of the mass, at the summit of the arch, about forty feet. A part of this thickness is constituted by a coat of earth, which gives growth to many large trees. The residue, with the hill on both sides, is one solid rock of limestone. The arch approaches the semi-elliptical form; but the larger axis of the ellipsis, which would be the chord of the arch, is many times longer than the semi-axis which gives its height. Looking down from this height about a minute, gave me a violent headache. If the view from the top be painful and intolerable, that from below is delightful in an equal extreme. It is impossible for the emotions arising from the sublime to be felt beyond what they are here; so beautiful an arch, so elevated, so light, and springing as it were up to heaven, the rapture of the spectator is really indescribable! The fissure continuing narrow, deep and straight, for a considerable distance above and below the Bridge, opens a short but very pleasing view of the North Mountain on one side and the Blue Ridge on the other, at the distance each of them of about five miles.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 269. FORD ED., iii, 109. (1782.)

5667. NATURAL BRIDGE, Greatest curiosity.—The greatest of our curiosities, the Natural Bridge.—To REV. CHAS. CLAY. iii, 125. FORD ED., v, 142. (M., 1790.)

5668. NATURAL BRIDGE, Hermitage near.—I sometimes think of building a little hermitage at the Natural Bridge (for it is my property) and of passing there a part of the year at least.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 80. FORD ED., iv, 345. (P., 1786.)

5669. NATURAL HISTORY, American animals.—I really doubt whether the flat-horned elk exists in America. * * * I have seen the daim, the cerf, the chevreuil of Europe. But the animal we call elk, and which may be distinguished as the round-horned elk, is very different from them. * * * I suspect that you will find that the moose, the round-horned elk, and the American deer are species not existing in Europe. The moose is perhaps of a new class.—To COMTE DE BUFFON. ii, 286. FORD ED., iv, 458. (P., 1787.)

5670. NATURAL HISTORY, Anatomy and.—The systems of Cuvier and Blumenbach, and especially that of Blumenbach, are liable to the objection of going too much into the province of anatomy. It may be said, indeed, that anatomy is a part of natural history. In the broad sense of the word, it certainly is. In that sense, however, it would comprehend all the natural sciences, every created thing being a subject of natural history in extenso. * * * As soon as the structure of any natural production is destroyed by art, it ceases to be a subject of natural history, and enters into the domain ascribed to chemistry, to pharmacy, to anatomy, &c. Linnæus's method was liable to this objection so far as it required the aid of anatomical dissection, as of the heart, for instance, to ascertain the place of any animal, or of a chemical process for that of a mineral substance. It would certainly be better to adopt as much as possible such exterior and visible characteristics as every traveler is competent to observe, to ascertain and to relate.—To DR. JOHN MANNERS. vi, 321. (M., 1814.) See ANATOMY.

5671. NATURAL HISTORY, Buffon and.—You must not presume too strongly that your comb-footed bird is known to M. de Buffon. He did not know our panther. I gave him the striped skin of one I bought in Philadelphia, and it presents him a new species which will appear in his next volume.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. ii, 74. (P., 1786.)

5673. ———. I have made a particular acquaintance with Monsieur de Buffon, and have a great desire to give him the best idea I can of our elk. You could not oblige me more than by sending me the horns, skeleton and skin of an elk, were it possible to procure them. * * * Everything of this kind is precious here [France].—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 189. (P., 1786.) See BUFFON.

5674. NATURAL HISTORY, Costly specimens.—You ask if you shall say anything to Sullivan about the bill. No; only that it is paid. I have received letters from him explaining the matter. It was really for the skin and bones of the moose, as I had conjectured. It was my fault that I had not given him a rough idea of the expense I would be willing to incur for them. He made the acquisition an object of a regular campaign, and that, too, of a winter one. The troops he employed sallied forth, as he writes me, in the month of March—much snow—a herd attacked—one killed—in the wilderness—a road to cut twenty miles—to be drawn by hand from the frontiers to his house—bones to be cleaned, &c., &c. In fine, he puts himself to an infinitude of trouble, more than I meant. He did it cheerfully, and I feel myself really under obligations to him. That the tragedy might not want a proper catastrophe, the box, bones, and all are lost; so that this chapter of natural history will still remain a blank. But I have

* * * The venerable Buffon was indebted to Jefferson for torrents of information concerning nature in America, as well as for many valuable specimens. Buffon wrote to Jefferson, 'I should have consulted you, sir, before publishing my natural history, and then I should have been sure of my facts'.—PAR-TON'S Life of Jefferson.

written to him not to send me another.—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 284. (P., 1787.)

5675. NATURAL HISTORY, Elk and deer.—In my conversations with the Count de Buffon on the subjects of natural history, I find him absolutely unacquainted with our elk and our deer. He has hitherto believed that our deer never had horns more than a foot long; and has, therefore, classed them with the roe buck which, I am sure, you know them to be different from. * * * Will you take the trouble to procure for me the largest pair of buck's horns you can, and a large skin of each color, that is to say, a red and a blue? If it were possible to take these from a buck just killed, to leave all the bones of the head in the skin, with the horns on, to leave the bones of the legs in the skin also, and the hoofs to it, so that, having only made an incision all along the belly and neck, to take the animal out at, we could, by sewing up that incision, and stuffing the skin, present the true size and form of the animal; it would be a most precious present.—To A. CARY. i, 507. (P., 1786.)

5676. — —. You give me hopes of being able to procure for me some of the big bones. * * * A specimen of each of the several species of bones now to be found, is to me the most desirable object in natural history. And there is no expense of package or of safe transportation which I will not gladly reimburse to procure them safely. Elk horns of very extraordinary size, or anything else uncommon, would be very acceptable.—To JAMES STEPTOE. i, 323. FORD ED., iii, 62. (1782.)

5677. NATURAL HISTORY, Exporting deer.—Our deer have been often sent to England and Scotland. Do you know (with certainty) whether they have ever bred with the red deer of those countries?—To A. CARY. i, 508. (P., 1786.)

5678. NATURAL HISTORY, Far West.—Any observations of your own on the subject of the big bones or their history, or anything else in the western country, will come acceptably to me, because I know you see the works of nature in the great, and not merely in detail. Descriptions of animals, vegetables, minerals or other curious things; notes as to the Indians' information of the country between the Mississippi and the waters of the South Sea, &c., &c., will strike your mind as worthy being communicated.—To JAMES STEPTOE. i, 323. FORD ED., iii, 63. (1782.)

5679. NATURAL HISTORY, French deer.—I have examined some of the red deer of this country [France] at the distance of about sixty yards, and I find no other difference between them and ours than a shade or two in the color.—To A. CARY. i, 507. (P., 1786.)

5680. NATURAL HISTORY, Grouse and pheasant.—In the King's cabinet of Natural History, of which Monsieur de Buffon has the superintendence, I observed that they had neither our grouse nor our pheasant. * * * Pray buy the male and female of each, employ some apothecary's boy to prepare them, and send them to me.—To F. HOPKINSON. i, 506. (P., 1786.) See BIRDS.

5681. NATURAL HISTORY, Importing Useful Animals.—A fellow passenger with me from Boston to England, promised to send to you, in my name, some hares, rabbits, pheasants, and partridges, by the return of the ship, which was to go to Virginia, and the captain promised to take great care of them. My friend procured the animals, and the ship changing her destination, he kept them in hopes of finding some other conveyance, till they all perished. I do not despair, however, of finding some opportunity still of sending a colony of useful animals.—To A. CARY. i, 508. (P., 1786.)

5682. NATURAL HISTORY, Nomenclature.—The uniting all nations under one language in natural history had been happily effected by Linnæus, and can scarcely be hoped for a second time. Nothing, indeed, is so desperate as to make all mankind agree in giving up a language they possess, for one which they have to learn. * * * Disciples of Linnæus, of Blumenbach, and of Cuvier, exclusively possessing their own nomenclatures, can no longer communicate intelligibly with one another.—To DR. JOHN MANNERS. vi, 321. (M., 1814.)

5683. — —. To disturb Linnæus's system was unfortunate. The new system attempted in botany, by Jussieu, in mineralogy, by Häuy, are subjects of the same regret, and so also the no-system of Buffon, the great advocate of individualism in opposition to classification. He would carry us back to the days and to the confusion of Aristotle and Pliny, give up the improvements of twenty centuries, and cooperate with the neologists in rendering the science of one generation useless to the next by perpetual changes of its language.—To DR. JOHN MANNERS. vi, 322. (M., 1814.)

5684. NATURAL HISTORY, A passion.—Natural History is my passion.—To HARRY INNES. iii, 217. FORD ED., v, 294. (Pa., 1791.)

5685. NATURAL HISTORY, Weevil fly.—I do not think the natural history of the weevil fly of Virginia has been yet sufficiently detailed. What do you think of beginning to turn your attention to this insect, in order to give its history to the Philosophical Society? It would require some Summers' observations. * * * I long to be free for pursuits of this kind instead of the detestable ones in which I am now laboring without pleasure to myself, or profit to others. In short, I long to be with you at Monticello.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 325. (Pa., 1791.)

5686. NATURAL HISTORY, Wild sheep.—I have never known to what family you ascribed the Wild Sheep, or Fleecy Goat, as Governor Lewis called it, or the Potio-trajos, if its name must be Greek. He gave me a skin, but I know he carried a more perfect one, with the horns on, to Mr. Peale; and if I recollect well those horns, they, with the fleece, would induce one to suspect it to be the Lama, or at least a Lama affinis. I will thank you to inform me what you determine it to be.—To DR. WISTAR. v, 218. (W., 1807.)

5687. NATURAL RIGHTS, Abridging.—All natural rights may be abridged or modified in their exercise by law.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 498. FORD ED., v, 206. (1790.)

5688. — —. Laws abridging the natural right of the citizen, should be restrained by rigorous constructions within their narrowest limits.—To ISAAC MCPHERSON. vi, 176. (M., 1813.) See DUTY (NATURAL).

5689. NATURAL RIGHTS, Authority over.—Our rulers can have * * * authority over such natural rights only as we have submitted to them.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 400. FORD ED. iii, 263. (1782.)

5690. NATURAL RIGHTS, Choice of vocation.—Everyone has a natural right to choose that vocation in life which he thinks most likely to give him comfortable subsistence.—THOUGHTS ON LOTTERIES. ix, 505. FORD ED. x, 366. (M., Feb. 1826.)

5691. NATURAL RIGHTS, Equal Rights vs.—No man has a natural right to commit aggression on the equal rights of another; and this is all from which the laws ought to restrain him.—TO F. W. GILMER. vii, 3. FORD ED. x, 32. (M., 1816.)

5692. NATURAL RIGHTS, Kings and.—These are our grievances, which we have thus laid before his Majesty, with that freedom of language and sentiment which becomes a free people, claiming their rights as derived from the laws of nature, and not as the gift of their Chief Magistrate.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED. i, 445. (1774.)

5693. NATURAL RIGHTS, Moral sense and.—Questions of natural right are triable by their conformity with the moral sense and reason of man.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 618. FORD ED. vi, 225. (1793.) See MORAL SENSE.

5694. NATURAL RIGHTS, Restoring.—I shall see with sincere satisfaction the progress of those sentiments which tend to restore to man all his natural rights.—R. TO A. DANBURY BAPTISTS. viii, 113. (1802.)

5695. NATURAL RIGHTS, Retention of.—The idea is quite unfounded that on entering into society we give up any natural rights.—TO F. W. GILMER. vii, 3. FORD ED. x, 32. (M., 1816.)

5696. NATURAL RIGHTS, Self-government and.—Every man, and every body of men on earth, possesses the right of self-government. They receive it with their being from the hand of nature. Individuals exercise it by their single will; collections of men by that of their majority; for the law of the majority is the natural law of every society of men. When a certain description of men are to transact together a particular business, the times and places of their meeting and separating, depend on their own will; they make a part of the natural right of self-government. This, like all other natural rights, may be abridged or modified in its exercise by their own consent, or by the law of those who depute them, if they meet in the right of others; but as far as it is not abridged or modified, they retain it as a natural right, and may exercise them in what form they please, either exclusively by themselves, or in association with others, or by others altogether, as they shall agree.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 496. FORD ED. v, 205. (1790.)

5797. NATURAL RIGHTS, Social duties and.—I am convinced man has no natural right in opposition to his social duties.—R. TO A. DANBURY BAPTISTS. viii, 113. (1802.) See RIGHTS.

—NATURAL SELECTION, Application to mankind.—See RACE.

5698. NATURALIZATION, Eligibility.—All persons who, by their own oath or affirmation, or by other testimony, shall give satisfactory proof to any court of record in this Colony that they propose to reside in the same seven years, at the least, and who shall subscribe the fundamental laws, shall be considered as residents, and entitled to all the rights of persons natural born.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED. ii, 26. (June 1776.)

5699. NATURALIZATION, Laws.—I cannot omit recommending a revival of the laws on the subject of naturalization. Considering the ordinary chances of human life, a denial of citizenship under a residence of fourteen years is a denial to a great proportion of those who ask it, and controls a policy pursued from their first settlement by many of these States, and still believed of consequence to their prosperity. And shall we refuse the unhappy fugitives from distress that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our fathers arriving in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on this globe? The Constitution, indeed, has wisely provided that, for admission to certain offices of important trust, a residence shall be required sufficient to develop character and design. But might not the general character and capabilities of a citizen be safely communicated to every one manifesting a bonâ fide purpose of embarking his life and fortunes permanently with us? with restrictions, perhaps, to guard against the fraudulent usurpation of our flag; an abuse which brings so much embarrassment and loss on the genuine citizen, and so much danger to the nation of being involved in war, that no endeavor should be spared to detect and suppress it.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 14. FORD ED. viii, 124. (Dec. 1801.) See CITIZENS and EXPATRIATION.

5700. NATURALIZATION, Non-recognition of.—The decrees of the British courts that British subjects adopted here since the peace, and carrying on commerce from hence, are still British subjects, and their cargoes British property, have shaken these quasi-citizens in their condition. The French adopt the same principle as to their cargoes when captured. * * * Is it worth our while to go to war to support the contrary doctrine? The British principle is clearly against the law of nations, but which way our interest lies is also worthy of consideration.—TO JAMES MONROE. FORD ED. vii, 214. (Pa. March 1798.)

5701. NATURALIZATION, Obstructing.—He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by endeavoring to prevent the population of our country, and for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 10. (June 1776.)

5702. NATURALIZATION, Power of.—The Administrator [of Virginia] shall not possess the prerogative * * * of making denizens.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

5703. NATURE, Classifications.—Ray formed one classification on such lines of division as struck him most favorably; Klein adopted another; Brisson a third, and other naturalists other designations, till Linnæus appeared. Fortunately for science, he conceived in the three kingdoms of nature, modes of classification which obtained the approbation of the learned of all nations. This system was accordingly adopted by all, and united all in a general language. It offered the three great desiderata; First, of aiding the memory to retain a knowledge of the productions of nature. Secondly, of rallying all to the same names for the same objects, so that they could communicate understandingly on them. And, thirdly, of enabling them, when a subject was first presented, to trace it by its character up to the conventional name by which it was agreed to be called. This classification was indeed liable to the imperfection of bringing into the same group individuals which, though resembling in the characteristics adopted by the author for his classification, yet have strong marks of dissimilitude in other respects. But to this objection every mode of classification must be liable, because the plan of creation is inscrutable to our limited faculties. Nature has not arranged her productions on a single and direct line. They branch at every step, and in every direction, and he who attempts to reduce them into departments, is left to do it by the lines of his own fancy. The objection of bringing together what are disparata in nature, lies against the classifications of Blumenbach and of Cuvier, as well as that of Linnæus, and must forever lie against all.—To DR. JOHN MANNERS. vi, 320. (M., 1814.)

5704. NATURE, Love of.—There is not a sprig of grass that shoots uninteresting to me.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J., 192. (Pa., 1790.)

5705. NATURE, Units in.—Nature has, in truth, produced units only through all her works. Classes, orders, genera, species, are not of her work. Her creation is of individuals. No two animals are exactly alike; no two plants, nor even two leaves or blades of grass; no two crystallizations. And if we may venture from what is within the cognizance of such organs as ours, to conclude on that beyond their powers, we must believe that no two particles of matter are of exact resemblance. This infinitude of units or individuals being far beyond the capacity of our memory, we are obliged, in aid of that, to distribute them into masses, throwing into each of these all the individuals which have a certain degree of resemblance; to subdivide these again into smaller groups, according to certain points of dissimilitude observable in them, and so on until we have formed what we call a system of classes, orders, genera, and species. In doing this, we fix arbitrarily on such characteristic resemblances and differences as seem to us most prominent and invariable in the several subjects, and most likely to take a strong hold in our memories.—To DR. JOHN MANNERS. vi, 319. (M., 1814.)

5706. NATURE AND FREEDOM.—Under the law of nature we are all born free.—LEGAL ARGUMENT. FORD ED., i, 380. (1770.)

5707. NAVIES, Equalization of.—I have read with great satisfaction your observations on the principles for equalizing the power of the different nations on the sea, and think them perfectly sound. Certainly it will be better to produce a balance on that element, by reducing the means of its great monopolizer [England], than by endeavoring to raise our own to an equality with theirs.—To TENCH COXE. V, 109. FORD ED., ix, 142. (M., Sep. 1807.) See NAVY.

5708. NAVIGATION, Coasting and carrying trade.—I like your convoy bill, because although it does not assume the maintenance of all our maritime rights, it assumes as much as it is our interest to maintain. Our coasting trade is the first and most important branch, never to be yielded but with our existence. Next to that is the carriage of our own productions in our own vessels, and bringing back the returns for our own consumption; so far I would protect it and force every part of the Union to join in the protection at the point of the bayonet. But though we have a right to the remaining branch of carrying for other nations, its advantages do not compensate its risks. Your bill first rallies us to the ground the Constitution ought to have taken, and to which we ought to return without delay; the moment is the most favorable possible, because the Eastern States, by declaring they will not protect that cabotage by war, and forcing us to abandon it, have released us from every future claim for its protection on that part. Your bill is excellent in another view: It presents still one other ground to which we can retire before we resort to war; it says to the belligerents, rather than go to war, we will retire from the brokerage of other nations, and will confine ourselves to the carriage and exchange of our own productions; but we will vindicate that in all its rights—if you touch it, it is war.—To MR. BURWELL. v, 505. (M., Feb. 1810.)

5709. NAVIGATION, Defensive value of.—Our navigation * * * as a resource of defence, [is] essential, [and] will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear on their land-board, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on their seaboard, they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen-seamen, and of artists and establishments in readiness for ship-building. * * * If we lose the seamen and artists whom [our navigation] now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defence, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring home to our feelings the error of having abandoned them.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 647-8. FORD ED., vi, 480. (Dec. 1793.)

5710. NAVIGATION, Develop.—Our people are decided in the opinion that it is necessary for us to take a share in the occupation of the ocean, and their established habits induce them to require that the sea be kept open to them, and that that line of policy be pursued which will render the use of that element to them as great as possible. I think it a duty in those intrusted with the administration of their affairs to conform themselves to the decided choice of their constituents; and that therefore, we should, in every instance, preserve an equality of right to them in the transportation of commodities, in the right of fishing and in the other uses of the sea.—TO JOHN JAY. i, 404. FORD ED., iv, 88. (P., 1785.)

5712. NAVIGATION, English monopoly of.—The British say they will pocket our carrying trade as well as their own.—TO JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 215. (P., 1786.)

5713. NAVIGATION, Freedom of.—I think, whatever sums we are obliged to pay for freedom of navigation in the European seas, should be levied on the European commerce with us by a separate impost, that these powers may see that they protect these enormities [Barbary piracies] for their own loss.—TO GENERAL GREENE. i, 509. (P., 1786.)

5714. ———. What sentiment is written in deeper characters on the heart of man than that the ocean is free to all men, and their rivers to all their inhabitants? Is there a man, savage or civilized, unbiassed by habit, who does not feel and attest this truth? Accordingly, in all tracts of country united under the same political society, we find this natural right universally acknowledged and protected by laying the navigable rivers open to all their inhabitants. When their rivers enter the limits of another society, if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream is in any case obstructed, it is an act of force by a stronger society against a weaker, condemned by the judgment of mankind. The late case of Antwerp and the Scheldt was a striking proof of a general union of sentiment on this point; as it is believed that Amsterdam had scarcely an advocate out of Holland, and even there its pretensions were advocated on the ground of treaties, and not of natural right.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 577. FORD ED., v, 468. (March 1792.)

5715. NAVIGATION, French and English hostility.—The difference of sixty-two livres ten sols the hoghead established by the National Assembly [of France] on tobacco brought in their and our ships, is such an act of hostility against our navigation, as was not to have been expected from the friendship of that nation. It is as new in its nature as extravagant in its degree; since it is unexampled that any nation has endeavored to wrest from another the carriage of its own produce, except in the case of their colonies.—TO WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 274. FORD ED., v, 362. (Pa., 1791.)

5716. ———. I apprehend that these two great nations [France and England] will think it their interest not to permit us to be navigators.—TO HORATIO GATES. iv, 213. FORD ED., vii, 205. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

5717. ———. Every appearance and consideration render it probable that, on the restoration of peace, both France and Britain will consider it their interest to exclude us from the ocean, by such peaceable means as are in their power. Should this take place, perhaps it may be thought just and politic to give to our native capitalists the monopoly of our internal commerce.—TO JAMES MADISON. iv, 214. FORD ED., vii, 206. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

5718. ———. The countervailing acts of Great Britain, now laid before Congress, threaten, in the opinion of merchants, the entire loss of our navigation to England. It makes a difference, from the present state of things, of five hundred guineas on a vessel of three hundred and fifty tons.—TO HORATIO GATES. iv, 213. FORD ED., vii, 205. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

5719. ———. The [British] countervailing act * * * will, confessedly, put American bottoms out of employ in our trade with Great Britain.—TO JAMES MADISON. iv, 214. FORD ED., vii, 206. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

5720. ———. I hope we shall rub through the war [between France and England], without engaging in it ourselves, and that when in a state of peace our Legislature and Executive will endeavor to provide peaceable means of obliging foreign nations to be just to us, and of making their injustice recoil on themselves.—TO PEREGRINE FITZHUGH. iv, 216. FORD ED., vii, 209. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

5721. NAVIGATION, Industrial value.—Our navigation * * * as a branch of industry * * * is valuable * * *. Its value, as a branch of industry, is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war, that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers, shall be at war with each other, if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war-freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that, must perish on our hands.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 647. FORD ED., vi, 480. (Dec. 1793.)

5722. NAVIGATION, Jefferson's report on.—You may recollect that a report which I gave into Congress in 1793, and Mr. Madison's propositions of 1794, went directly to establish a navigation act on the British principle. On the last vote given on this (which was in Feb. 1794), from the three States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island there were two votes for it, and twenty against it; and from the three States of Virginia, Kentucky, and North Carolina, wherein not a single top-mast vessel is, I believe, owned by a native citizen, there were twenty-five votes for and four against the measure. I very much suspect that were the same proposition now brought forward, the northern vote would be nearly the same, while the southern one, I am afraid, would be radically varied. The suggestion of their disinterested endeavors for placing our navigation on an independent footing, and forcing on them the British treaty, have not had a tendency to invite new offers of sacrifice, and especially under the prospect of a new rejection. You observe that the rejection would change the politics of New England. But it would afford no evidence which they have not already in the records of January and February, 1794. However, I will * * * sound the dispositions [of members of Congress] on that subject. If the proposition should be likely to obtain a reputable vote, it may do good. As to myself, I sincerely wish that the whole Union may accommodate their interests to each other, and play into their hands mutually as members of the same family, that the wealth and strength of any one part should be viewed as the wealth and strength of the whole.—TO HUGH WILLIAMSON. FORD ED., vii, 200. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

5723. NAVIGATION, Madness for.—We are running navigation mad.—TO JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 311. FORD ED., vii, 406. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

5724. NAVIGATION, Maintain.—To maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ED., viii, 186. (Dec. 1802.)

5725. NAVIGATION, Mediterranean.—We must consider the Mediterranean as absolutely shut to us until we can open it with money. Whether this will be best expended in buying or forcing a peace is for Congress to determine.—TO MR. HAWKINS. ii, 4. (P., 1786.)

5726. NAVIGATION, Nurseries of.—We have three nurseries for forming seamen: 1. Our coasting trade, already on a safe footing. 2. Our fisheries, which in spite of natural advantages, give just cause of anxiety. 3. Our carrying trade, our only resource of indemnification for what we lose in the other. The produce of the United States, which is carried to foreign markets, is extremely bulky. That part of it which is now in the hands of foreigners, and which we may resume into our own, without touching the rights of those nations who have met us in fair arrangements by treaty, or the interests of those who, by their voluntary regulations, have paid so just and liberal a respect to our interests, as being measured back to them again, places both parties on as good ground, perhaps, as treaties could place them—the proportion, I say, of our carrying trade, which may be resumed without affecting either of these descriptions of nations, will find constant employment for ten thousand seamen, be worth two millions of dollars, annually, will go on augmenting with the population of the United States, secure to us a full indemnification for the seamen we lose, and be taken wholly from those who force us to this act of self-protection in navigation. * * * If regulations exactly the counterpart of those established against us, would be ineffectual, from a difference of circumstances, other regulations equivalent can give no reasonable ground of complaint to any nation. Admitting their right of keeping their markets to themselves, ours cannot be denied of keeping our carrying trade to ourselves. And if there be anything unfriendly in this, it was in the first example.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 553. (1791.)

5727. — — — The loss of seamen, unnoticed, would be followed by other losses in a long train. If we have no seamen, our ships will be useless, consequently our ship-timber, iron and hemp; our shipbuilding will be at an end, ship carpenters go over to other nations, our young men have no call to the sea, our produce, carried in foreign bottoms, be saddled with war freight and insurance in times of war; and the history of the last hundred years shows, that the nation which is our carrier has three years of war for every four years of peace. We lose, during the same periods, the carriage for belligerent powers, which the neutrality of our flag would render an incalculable source of profit; we lose at this moment the carriage of our own produce to the annual amount of two millions of dollars, which, in the possible progress of the encroachment, may extend to five or six millions, the worth of the whole, with an increase in the proportion of the increase of our members. It is easier, as well as better, to stop this train at its entrance, than when it shall have ruined or banished whole classes of useful and industrious citizens. It will doubtless be thought expedient that the resumption suggested should take effect so gradually, as not to endanger the loss of produce for the want of transportation; but that, in order to create transportation, the whole plan should be developed, and made known at once, that the individuals who may be disposed to lay themselves out for the carrying business, may make their calculations on a full view of all the circumstances.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 554. (1791.)

5728. NAVIGATION, Protection of.—

The British attempt, without disguise, to possess themselves of the carriage of our produce, and to prohibit our own vessels from participating of it. This has raised a general indignation in America. The States see, however, that their constitutions have provided no means of counteracting it. They are, therefore, beginning to invest Congress with the absolute power of regulating their commerce, only reserving all revenue arising from it to the State in which it is levied. This will consolidate our federal building very much, and for this we shall be indebted to the British.—TO COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. i, 465. FORD ED., iv, 104. (P., 1785.)

5729. ——. I think it essential to exclude the British from the carriage of American produce.—TO JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 41. (P., 1785.)

5730. ——. The determination of the British cabinet to make no equal treaty with us, confirms me in the opinion expressed in your letter that the United States must pass a navigation act against Great Britain, and load her manufactures with duties so as to give a preference to those of other countries; and I hope our Assemblies will wait no longer, but transfer such a power to Congress, at the sessions of this fall.—TO JOHN ADAMS. i, 486. (P., 1785.)

5731. ——. I hope we shall show [the British] we have sense and spirit enough * * * to exclude them from any share in the carriage of our commodities.—TO DAVID HUMPHREYS. i, 560. (P., 1786.)

5732. ——. A bill which may be called the true navigation act for the United States, is before Congress, and will probably pass. I hope it will lay the foundation of a due share of navigation for us.—TO JOHN COFFIN JONES. iii, 155. (N.Y., 1790.)

5733. ——. I participate fully of your indignation at the trammels imposed on our commerce with Great Britain. Some attempts have been made in Congress, and others are still making to meet their restrictions by effectual restrictions on our part. It was proposed to double the foreign tonnage for a certain time, and after that to prohibit the exportation of our commodities in the vessels of nations not in treaty with us. This has been rejected. It is now proposed to prohibit any nation from bringing or carrying in their vessels what may not be brought or carried in ours from or to the same ports; also to prohibit those from bringing to us anything not of their own produce, who prohibit us from carrying to them anything but our own produce. It is thought, however, that this cannot be carried. The fear is that it would irritate Great Britain were we to feel any irritation ourselves.—TO EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iii, 164. FORD ED., v, 196. (N.Y., 1790.)

5734. ——. Were the ocean, which is the common property of all, open to the industry of all, so that every person and vessel should be free to take employment wherever it could be found, the United States would certainly not set the example of appropriating to themselves, exclusively, any portion of the common stock of occupation. They would rely on the enterprise and activity of their citizens for a due participation of the benefits of the seafaring business, and for keeping the marine class of citizens equal to their object. But if particular nations grasp at undue shares, and, more especially, if they seize on the means of the United States, to convert them into alimant for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded; or it will be disarmed of its defence; its productions will lie at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of our own commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artists whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defence, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring home to our feelings the error of having abandoned them. The materials for maintaining our due share of navigation, are ours in abundance. And, as to the mode of using them, we have only to adopt the principles of those who put us on the defensive, or others equivalent and better fitted to our circumstances.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 647. FORD ED., vi, 481. (Dec. 1793.)

5735. ——. I have ever wished that all nations would adopt a navigation law against those who have one, which perhaps would be better than against all indiscriminately, and while in France I proposed it there.—TO TENCH COXE. v, 199. FORD ED., ix, 142. (M., 1807.)

5736. ——. Among the laws of the late Congress, some were of note; a navigation act, particularly, applicable to those nations only who have navigation acts; pinching one of them especially, not only in the general way, but in the intercourse with her foreign possessions. This part may react on us, and it remains for trial which may bear longest.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 78. FORD ED., x, 90. (M., 1817.)

5737. NAVIGATION, Protuberant.—I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures and commerce, and not in this protuberant navigation which has kept us in hot water from the commencement of our government, and is now engaging us in war.—To THOMAS LEIPER. v, 417. FORD ED., ix, 239. (W., 1809.)

5738. NAVIGATION, Reciprocity and.—The following principles, being founded in reciprocity, appear perfectly just, and to offer no cause of complaint to any nation: Where a nation refuses to receive in our vessels any productions but our own, we may refuse to receive, in theirs, any but their own productions. Where a nation refuses to consider any vessel as ours which has not been built within our territories, we should refuse to consider as theirs, any vessel not built within their territories. Where a nation refuses to our vessels the carriage even of our own productions, to certain countries under their domination, we might refuse to theirs of every description, the carriage of the same productions to the same countries. But as justice and good neighborhood would dictate that those who have no part in imposing the restriction on us, should not be the victims of measures adopted to defeat its effect, it may be proper to confine the restriction to vessels owned or navigated by any subjects of the same dominant power, other than the inhabitants of the country to which the said productions are to be carried. And to prevent all inconvenience to the said inhabitants, and to our own, by too sudden a check on the means of transportation, we may continue to admit the vessels marked for future exclusion, on an advanced tonnage, and for such length of time only, as may be supposed necessary to provide against that inconvenience. The establishment of some of these principles by Great Britain, alone, has already lost us in our commerce with that country and its possessions, between eight and nine hundred vessels of near 40,000 tons burden, according to statements from official materials, in which they have confidence. This involves a proportional loss of seamen, shipwrights, and ship-building, and is too serious a loss to admit forbearance of some effectual remedy.—REPORT ON COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION. vii, 648. FORD ED., vi, 481. (Dec. 1793.)

5739. NAVIGATION, Reduction of British.—It has been proposed in Congress to pass a navigation act which will deeply strike at that of Great Britain. * * * Would it not be worth while to have the bill now enclosed, translated, printed and circulated among the members of the [French] National Assembly? If you think so, have it done at the public expense, with any little comment you may think necessary, concealing the quarter from whence it is distributed; take any other method you think better, see whether that Assembly will not pass similar act? I shall send copies of it to

Mr. Carmichael, at Madrid, and to Colonel Humphreys, appointed resident at Lisbon, with a desire for them to suggest similar acts there. The measure is just, perfectly innocent as to all other nations, and will effectually defeat the navigation act of Great Britain, and reduce her power on the ocean within safer limits.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 225. (Pa., 1791.)

5740. — — — The navigation act, if it can be effected, will form a remarkable and memorable epoch in the history and freedom of the ocean. Mr. Short will press it at Paris, and Colonel Humphreys at Lisbon.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. iii, 245. (Pa., 1791.)

5741. — — — The Navigation Act proposed in the late Congress, but which lies over to the next, * * * is perfectly innocent as to other nations, is strictly just as to the English, cannot be parried by them, and if adopted by other nations would inevitably defeat their navigation act, and reduce their power on the sea within safer limits. It is indeed extremely to be desired that other nations would adopt it. * * * Could France, Spain and Portugal agree to concur in such a measure, it would soon be fatally felt by the navy of England.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 302. (Pa., March 1791.)

5742. NAVIGATION, Retaliatory duties.—Where a nation refuses to our vessels the carriage even of our own productions, to certain countries under their domination, we might refuse to theirs of every description, the carriage of the same productions to the same countries. But as justice and good neighborhood would dictate that those who have no part in imposing the restriction on us, should not be the victims of measures adopted to defeat its effect, it may be proper to confine the restriction to vessels owned or navigated by any subjects of the same dominant power, other than the inhabitants of the country to which the said productions are to be carried. And to prevent all inconvenience to the said inhabitants, and to our own, by too sudden a check on the means of transportation, we may continue to admit the vessels marked for future exclusion, on an advanced tonnage, and for such length of time only, as may be supposed necessary to provide against that inconvenience.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 649. FORD ED., vi, 482. (Dec. 1793.)

— NAVIGATION, Subsidies.—See BOUNTIES.

5743. NAVIGATION, Sufficient.—It is essentially interesting to us to have shipping and seamen enough to carry our surplus produce to market; but beyond that I do not think we are bound to give it encouragement by drawbacks or other premiums.—To BENJAMIN STODDERT. v, 426. FORD ED., ix, 245. (W., 1809.) See COMMERCE, DUTIES, EMBARGO, FREE TRADE, PROTECTION and SHIPS.

5744. NAVY, Bravery of.—Our public ships have done wonders. They have saved our military reputation sacrificed on the shores of Canada.—To GENERAL BAILEY. vi, 101. (M., Feb. 1813.)

5745. — —. No one has been more gratified than myself by the brilliant achievements of our little navy. They have deeply wounded the pride of our enemy, and been balm to ours, humiliated on the land where our real strength was felt to lie.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 112. FORD ED., ix, 383. (M., May 1813.)

5746. — —. I sincerely congratulate you on the successes of our little navy; which must be more gratifying to you than to most men, as having been the early and constant advocate of wooden walls. If I have differed with you on this ground, it was not on the principle, but the time; supposing that we cannot build or maintain a navy, which will not immediately fall into the gulf which has swallowed not only the minor navies, but even those of the great second-rate powers of the sea. Whenever these can be resuscitated, and brought so near to a balance with England that we can turn the scale, then is my epoch for aiming at a navy. In the meantime, one competent to keep the Barbary States in order, is necessary; these being the only smaller powers disposed to quarrel with us.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 122. (M., May 1813.)

5747. — —. At sea we have rescued our character; but the chief fruit of our victories there is to prove to those who have fleets, that the English are not invincible at sea, as Alexander has proved that Bonaparte is not invincible by land.—To SAMUEL BROWN. vi, 165. (M., July 1813.)

5748. — —. I congratulate you on the brilliant affair of the Enterprise and Boxer. No heart is more rejoiced than mine at these mortifications of English pride, and lessons to Europe that the English are not invincible at sea. If these successes do not lead us too far into the navy mania, all will be well.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 211. (M., Sep. 1813.)

5749. — —. Strange reverse of expectations that our land force should be under the wing of our little navy.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 212. (M., Sep. 1813.)

5750. — —. On the water we have proved to the world the error of British invincibility, and shown that with equal force and well-trained officers, they can be beaten by other nations as brave as themselves.—To DON V. TORONDA CORUNA. vi, 275. (M., Dec. 1813.)

5751. — —. I * * * congratulate you on the destruction of a second hostile fleet on the Lakes by Macdonough. While our enemies cannot but feel shame for their barbarous achievements at Washington [burning of Capitol], they will be stung to the soul by these repeated victories over them on that element on which they wish the world to think them invincible. We have dissipated that error. They must now feel a conviction themselves that we can beat them gun to gun, ship to ship, and fleet to fleet, and that their early successes on the land have been either purchased from traitors, or obtained from raw men entrusted of necessity with commands for which no experience had qualified them, and that every day is adding that experience to unquestioned bravery.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 386. (M., Sep. 1814.) See CAPITOL.

5752. — —. Frigates and seventy-fours are a sacrifice we must make, heavy as it is, to the prejudices of a part of our citizens. They have, indeed, rendered a great moral service, which has delighted me as much as any one in the United States. But they have had no physical effect sensible to the enemy; and now, while we must fortify them in our harbors, and keep armies to defend them, our privateers are bearding and blockading the enemy in their own seaports.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 409. FORD ED., ix, 498. (M., Jan. 1815.)

5753. — —. Through the whole period of the war, we have beaten them [the British] single-handed at sea, and so thoroughly established our superiority over them with equal force, that they retire from that kind of contest, and never suffer their frigates to cruise singly. The Endymion would never have engaged the frigate President, but knowing herself blocked by three frigates and a razee, who, though somewhat slower sailers, would get up before she could be taken.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vi, 424. FORD ED., ix, 508. (M., 1815.)

5754. NAVY, Build a.—We ought to begin a naval power, if we mean to carry on our own commerce.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 10. (P., Nov. 1784.)

5755. — —. Tribute or war is the usual alternative of these [Barbary] pirates. * * * Why not begin a navy then and decide on war? We cannot begin in a better cause nor against a weaker foe.—To HORATIO GATES. FORD ED., iv, 24. (P., Dec. 1784.)

5756. — —. It is proper and necessary that we should establish a small marine force.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 592. (P., 1786.)

5757. NAVY, Coercion by a.—[A naval force] will arm the federal head with the safest of all the instruments of coercion over its delinquent members, and prevent it from using what would be less safe.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 592. (P., 1786.)

5758. — —. Every rational citizen must wish to see an effective instrument of coercion, and should fear to see it on any other element than the water.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 606. FORD ED., iv, 265. (P., 1786.)

5759. NAVY, Dockyards for.—Presuming it will be deemed expedient to expend annually a sum towards providing the naval defence which our situation may require, I cannot but recommend that the first appropriations for that purpose may go to the saving what we already possess. No cares, no attentions, can preserve vessels from rapid decay which lie in water and exposed to the sun. These decays require great and constant repairs, and will consume, if continued, a great portion of the money destined to naval purposes. To avoid this waste of our resources, it is proposed to add to our navy yard here [Washington] a dock, within which our vessels may be laid up dry and under cover from the sun. Under these circumstances experience proves that works of wood will remain scarcely at all affected by time. The great abundance of running water which this situation possesses, at heights far above the level of the tide, if employed as is practiced for lock navigation, furnishes the means of raising and laying up our vessels on a dry and sheltered bed.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 20. FORD ED., viii, 186. (Dec. 1802.)

5760. ——. The proposition for building lock-docks for the preservation of our navy, has local rivalries to contend against. Till these can be overruled or compromised, the measure can never be adopted. Yet there ought never to be another ship built until we can provide some method of preserving them through the long intervals of peace which I hope are to be the lot of our country.—To Mr. COXE. v, 58. (W., 1807.)

5761. ——. While I was at Washington, in the administration of the government, Congress was much divided in opinion on the subject of a navy, a part of them wishing to go extensively into the preparation of a fleet, another part opposed to it, on the objection that the repairs and preservation of a ship, even idle in harbor, in ten or twelve years, amount to her original cost. It has been estimated in England, that if they could be sure of peace a dozen years it would be cheaper for them to burn their fleet, and build a new one when wanting, than to keep the old one in repair during that term. I learnt that, in Venice, there were then ships, lying on their original stocks, ready for launching at any moment, which had been so for eighty years, and were still in a state of perfect preservation; and that this was effected by disposing of them in docks pumped dry, and kept so by constant pumping. It occurred to me that this expense of constant pumping might be saved by combining a lock with the common wet dock, wherever there was a running stream of water, the bed of which, within a reasonable distance, was of sufficient height above the high-water level of the harbor. This was the case at the navy yard, on the Eastern Branch at Washington, the high-water line of which was seventy-eight feet lower than the ground on which the Capitol stands, and to which it was found that the water of the Tiber Creek could be brought for watering the city. My proposition then was as follows: Let a b be the high-water level of the harbor, and the vessel to be laid up draw eighteen feet of water. Make a chamber A twenty feet deep below high-water and twenty feet high above it as c d e f, and at the upper end make another chamber, B, the bottom of which should be in the high-water level, and the tops twenty feet above that. g h is the water of the Tiber. When the vessel is to be introduced, open the gate at c b a. The tide water rises in the chamber A to the level b i, and floats the vessel in with it. Shut the gate c b d and open that of f i. The water of the Tiber fills both chambers to the level c f g, and the vessel floats into the chamber B; then opening both gates c b d and f i, the water flows out, and the vessel settles down on the stays previously prepared at the bottom i h to receive her. The gate at g h must of course be closed, and the water of the feeding stream be diverted elsewhere. The chamber B is to have a roof over it of the construction of that over the meal market at Paris, except that that is hemispherical, this semi-cylindrical. For this construction see Delenne's Architecture, whose invention it was. The diameter of the dome of the meal market is considerably over one hundred feet. It will be seen at once that instead of making the chamber B of sufficient width and length for a single vessel only, it may be widened to whatever span the semi-circular framing of the roof can be trusted, and to whatever length you please, so as to admit two or more vessels in breadth, and as many in length as the localities render expedient. I had a model of this lock-dock made and exhibited in the President's house during the session of Congress at which it was proposed. But the advocates for a navy did not fancy it, and those opposed to the building of ships altogether, were equally indisposed to provide protection for them. Ridicule was also resorted to, the ordinary substitute for reason, when that fails, and the proposition was passed over. I then thought and still think the measure wise, to have a proper number of vessels always ready to be launched, with nothing unfinished about them except the planting their masts, which must of necessity be omitted, to be brought under a roof. Having no view in this proposition but to combine for the public a provision for defence, with economy in its preservation. I have thought no more of it since. And if any of my ideas anticipated yours, you are welcome to appropriate them to yourself, without objection on my part.—To LEWIS M. WISS. vii, 419. (M., 1825.)

5762. NAVY, Early history of.—I have racked my memory and ransacked my papers, to enable myself to answer the inquiries of your favor of Oct. the 15th; but to little purpose. My papers furnish me nothing, my memory, generalities only. I know that while I was in Europe, and anxious about the fate of our sea-faring men, for some of whom, then in captivity in Algiers, we were treating, and all were in like danger, I formed, undoubtedly, the opinion that our government, as soon as practicable, should provide a naval force sufficient to keep the Barbary States in order; and on this subject we communicated together, as you observe. When I returned to the United States and took part in the administration under General Washington, I constantly maintained that opinion; and in December, 1750, took advantage of a reference to me from the first Congress which met after I was in office, to report in favor of a force sufficient for the protection of our Mediterranean commerce; and I laid before them an accurate statement of the whole Barbary force, public and private. I think General Washington approved of building vessels of war to that extent. General Knox, I know, did. But what was Colonel Hamilton's opinion, I do not in the least remember. Your recollections on that subject are certainly corroborated by his known anxieties for a close connection with Great Britain, to which he might apprehend danger from collisions between their vessels and ours. Randolph was then Attorney-General; but his opinion on the question I also entirely forget. Some vessels of war were accordingly built and sent into the Mediterranean. The additions to these in your time, I need not note to you, who are well known to have ever been an advocate for the wooden walls of Themistocles. Some of those you added, were sold under an act of Congress passed while you were in office. I thought, afterwards, that the public safety might require some additional vessels of strength, to be prepared and in readiness for the first moment of a war, provided they could be preserved against the decay which is unavoidable if kept in the water, and clear of the expense of officers and men. With this view I proposed that they should be built in dry docks, above the level of the tide waters, and covered with roofs. I further advised that places for these docks should be selected where there was a command of water on a high level, as that of the Tiber at Washington, by which the vessels might be floated out, on the principle of a lock. But the majority of the Legislature was against any addition to the Navy, and the minority, although for it in judgment, voted against it on a principle of opposition. We are now, I understand, building vessels to remain on the stocks, under shelter, until wanted, when they will be launched and finished. On my plan they could be in service at an hour's notice. On this, the finishing, after launching, will be a work of time. This is all I recollect about the origin and progress of our navy. That of the late war, certainly raised our rank and character among nations. Yet a navy is a very expensive engine. It is admitted, that in ten or twelve years a vessel goes to entire decay; or, if kept in repair, costs as much as would build a new one: and that a nation who could count on twelve or fifteen years of peace, would gain by burning its navy and building a new one in time. Its extent, therefore, must be governed by circumstances. Since my proposition for a force adequate to the piracies of the Mediterranean, a similar necessity has arisen in our own seas for considerable addition to that force. Indeed, I wish we could have a convention with the naval powers of Europe, for them to keep down the pirates of the Mediterranean, and the slave ships on the coast of Africa, and for us to perform the same duties for the society of nations in our seas. In this way, those collisions would be avoided between the vessels of war of different nations, which beget wars and constitute the weightiest objection to navies.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 264. 5763. NAVY, Europe and.—A maritime force is the only one by which we can act on Europe.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 536. FORD ED., v, 58. (P., 1788.)

5764. NAVY, Expansion and.—Nothing should ever be accepted which would require a navy to defend it.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 445. (M., April 1809.)

5765. NAVY, Future of.—Paul Jones is young enough to see the day * * * when we shall be able to fight the British ship to ship.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 405. FORD ED., v, 22. (P., 1788.)

5766. NAVY, Gunboats.—The obstacle to naval enterprise which vessels of this construction offer for our seaport towns; their utility toward supporting within our waters the authority of the laws; the promptness with which they will be manned by the seamen and militia of the place the moment they are wanted; the facility of their assembling from different parts of the coast to any point where they are required in greater force than ordinary; the economy of their maintenance and preservation from decay when not in actual service; and the competence of our finances to this defensive provision, without any new burden, are considerations which will have due weight with Congress in deciding on the expediency of adding to their number from year to year, as experience shall test their ability, until all our important harbors, by these and auxiliary means, shall be ensured against insult and opposition to the laws.—FOURTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 38. FORD ED., viii, 331. (Nov. 1804.)

5767. ———. The efficacy of gunboats for the defence of harbors, and of other smooth and enclosed waters, may be estimated in part from that of galleys, formerly much used, but less powerful, more costly in their construction and maintenance, and requiring more men. But the gunboat itself is believed to be in use with every modern maritime nation for the purpose of defence. In the Mediterranean, on which are several small powers, whose system like ours is peace and defence, few harbors are without this article of protection. Our own experience there of the effect of gunboats for harbor service is recent. Algiers is particularly known to have owed to a great provision of these vessels the safety of its city, since the epoch of their construction. Before that it had been repeatedly insulted and injured. The effect of gunboats at present in the neighborhood of Gibraltar, is well known, and how much they were used both in the attack and defence of that place during a former war. The extensive resort to them by the two greatest naval powers in the world, on an enterprise of invasion not long since in prospect, shows their confidence in their efficacy for the purpose for which they are suited. By the northern powers of Europe, whose seas are particularly adapted to them, they are still more used. The remarkable action between the Russian flotilla of gunboats and galleys, and a Turkish fleet of ships-of-the-line and frigates in the Liman Sea, 1788, will be readily recollected. The latter, commanded by their most celebrated admiral, were completely defeated, and several of their ships-of-the-line destroyed.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 80. FORD ED., ix, 24. (Feb. 1807.)

5768. ———. Of these boats a proper proportion would be of the larger size, such as those heretofore built, capable of navigating any seas, and of reinforcing occasionally the strength of even the most distant port when menaced with danger. The residue would be confined to their own or the neighboring harbors would be smaller, less furnished for accommodation, and consequently less costly. Of the number supposed necessary, seventy-three are built or building and the hundred and twenty-seven still to be provided, would cost from five to six hundred thousand dollars.

At times when Europe as well as the United States shall be at peace, it would not be proposed that more than six or eight of these vessels should be kept afloat. When Europe is in war, twice that number might be necessary to be distributed among those particular harbors which foreign vessels of war are in the habit of frequenting for the purpose of preserving order therein. But they would be manned, in ordinary, with only their complement for navigation, relying on the seamen and militia of the port if called into action on sudden emergency. It would be only when the United States should themselves be at war, that the whole number would be brought into actual service, and would be ready in the first moments of the war to co-operate with other means for covering at once the line of our seaports. At all times, those unemployed would be withdrawn into places not exposed to sudden enterprise, hauled up under sheds from the sun and weather, and kept in preservation with little expense for repairs or maintenance. It must be superfluous to observe, that this species of naval armament is proposed merely for defensive operation; that it can have but little effect toward protecting our commerce in the open seas even on our coast; and still less can it become an excitement to engage in offensive maritime war, toward which it would furnish no means.—SPECIAL MESSAGE, viii, 81. FORD ED., ix, 26. (Feb. 1807.)

5769. ——. I believe that gunboats are the only water defence which can be useful to us, and protect us from the ruinous folly of a navy.—To THOMAS PAINE, v, 189. FORD ED., ix, 137. (M., Sep. 1807.) See GUNBOATS.

5770. NAVY, Increase of.—The building some ships of the line instead of our most indifferent frigates is not to be lost sight of. That we should have a squadron properly composed to prevent the blockading our ports is indispensable. The Atlantic frontier from numbers, wealth, and exposure to potent enemies, have a proportionate right to be defended with the Western frontier, for whom we keep up 3,000 men. Bringing forward the measure, therefore, in a moderate form, placing it on the ground of comparative right, our nation which is a just one, will come into it, notwithstanding the repugnance of some on the subject being first presented.—To JACOB CROWNSHIELD. FORD ED., viii, 453. (M., May 1806.)

5771. NAVY, Liberty and a.—A naval force can never endanger our liberties, nor occasion bloodshed; a land force would do both.—To JAMES MONROE, i, 606. FORD ED., iv, 265. (P., 1786.)

5772. ——. A public force on that element [the ocean] * * * can never be dangerous.—To COLONEL HUMPHREYS, ii, 10. (P., 1786.)

5773. ——. It is on the sea alone [that] we should think of ever having a force.—To E. CARRINGTON, ii, 405. FORD ED., v, 2. (P., 1788.)

5774. NAVY, Madness for.—We are running navigation mad, and commerce mad, and navy mad, which is worst of all.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, iv, 311. FORD ED., vii, 406. (Pa. Jan. 1800.)

5775. NAVY, Mediterranean pirates and.—The promptitude and energy of Commodore Preble, the efficacious cooperation of Captains Rodgers and Campbell of the returning squadron, the proper decision of Captain Bambridge that a vessel which had committed an open hostility was of right to be detained for inquiry and consideration, and the general zeal of the other officers and men, are honorable facts which I make known with pleasure. And to these I add what was indeed transacted in another quarter—the gallant enterprise of Captain Rodgers in destroying, on the coast of Tripoli, a corvette of that power, of twenty-two guns.—SPECIAL MESSAGE, viii, 32. (Dec. 1803.)

5776. ——. Reflecting with high satisfaction on the distinguished bravery displayed whenever occasion permitted in the late Mediterranean service, I think it would be an useful encouragement to make an opening for some present promotion, by enlarging our peace establishment of captains and lieutenants.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE, viii, 50. FORD ED., viii, 393. (1805.)

5777. NAVY, Midshipmen.—The places of midshipman are so much sought that (being limited) there is never a vacancy. Your son shall be set down for the second which shall happen; the first being anticipated. We are not long generally without vacancies happening. As soon as he can be appointed, you shall know it.—To THOMAS COOPER, iv, 453. FORD ED., viii, 178. (W., 1802.)

5778. NAVY, Militia and.—For the purpose of manning the gunboats in sudden attacks on our harbors, it is a matter for consideration, whether the seamen of the United States may not justly be formed into a special militia, to be called on for tours of duty in defence of the harbors where they shall happen to be; the ordinary militia furnishing that portion which may consist of landmen.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE, viii, 86. FORD ED., ix, 161. (Oct. 1807.) See MILITIA.

5779. NAVY, National respect and.—Were we possessed even of a small naval force what a bridle would it be in the mouths of the West Indian powers, and how respectfully would they demean themselves towards us. Be assured that the present disrespect of the nations of Europe for us will inevitably bring on insults which must involve us in war.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 34. (P., 1785.)

5780. NAVY, Navigation and.—[Our navigation] will require a protecting force on the sea. Otherwise the smallest power in Europe, every one which possesses a single ship of the line, may dictate to us, and enforce their demands by captures on our commerce. Some naval force then is necessary if we mean to be commercial. Can we have a better occasion of beginning one? or find a foe* more certainly within our dimensions? The motives pleading for war rather than tribute are numerous and honorable, those opposing them are mean and short-sighted.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 32. (P., 1785.)

5781. — —. A naval force alone can countenance our people as carriers on the water.—To JOHN JAY. i, 405. FORD ED., iv, 90. (P., 1785.) See NAVIGATION.

5782. NAVY, Necessary.—A land army would be useless for offence, and not the best nor safest instrument of defence. For either of the sea purposes, the sea is the field on which we should meet an European enemy. On that element we should possess some power.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 413. FORD ED., iii, 279. (1782.)

5783. — —. A small naval force is sufficient for us, and a small one is necessary.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 414. FORD ED., iii, 280. (1782.)

5784. — —. The justest dispositions possible in ourselves, will not secure us against war. It would be necessary that all other nations were just also. Justice indeed, on our part, will save us from those wars which would have been produced by a contrary disposition. But how can we prevent those produced by the wrongs of other nations? By putting ourselves in a condition to punish them. Weakness provokes insult and injury, while a condition to punish, often prevents them. This reasoning leads to the necessity of some naval force; that being the only weapon by which we can reach an enemy. I think it to our interest to punish the first insult; because an insult unpunished is the parent of many others. We are not, at this moment, in a condition to do it, but we should put ourselves into it, as soon as possible. If a war with England should take place, it seems to me that the first thing necessary would be a resolution to abandon the carrying trade, because we cannot protect it. Foreign nations must, in that case, be invited to bring us what we want, and to take our productions in their own bottoms. This alone could prevent the loss of those productions to us, and the acquisition of them to our enemy. Our seamen might be employed in depredations on their trade. But how dreadfully we shall suffer on our coasts, if we have no force on the water, former experience has taught us. Indeed, I look forward with horror to the very possible case of war with an European power, and think there is no protection against them, but from the possession of some force on the sea. Our vicinity to their West India possessions, and to the fisheries, is a bridge which a small naval force, on our part, would hold in the mouths of the most powerful of these countries. I hope our land office will rid us of our debts, and that our first attention then, will be to the beginning a naval force of some sort. This alone can countenance our people as carriers on the water, and I suppose them to be determined to continue such.—To JOHN JAY. i, 404. FORD ED., iv, 89. (P., 1785.)

5785. — —. A little navy [is] 'the only kind of force we ought to possess.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE. FORD ED., iv, 70. (P., July 1785.)

5786. NAVY, Peace establishment.—The law providing for a naval peace establishment fixes the number of frigates which shall be kept in constant service in time of peace, and prescribes that they shall be manned by not more than two-thirds of their complement of seamen and ordinary seamen. Whether a frigate may be trusted to two-thirds only of her proper complement of men must depend on the nature of the service on which she is ordered. She may sometimes, for her safety, so as to ensure her object, require her fullest complement. * * * Congress will perhaps consider whether the best limitation on the Executive discretion * * * would not be by the number of seamen which may be employed in the whole service, rather than the number of vessels.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 51. FORD ED., viii, 393. (Dec. 1805.)

5787. NAVY, Reduction.—The navy will be reduced to the legal establishment by the last of this month.—To NATHANIEL MACON. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.)

5788. — —. The session of the first Congress, convened since republicanism has recovered its ascendancy, * * * will pretty completely fulfil all the desires of the people. They have reduced the * * * navy to what is barely necessary.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

5790. NAVY, Size of.—The actual habits of our countrymen attach them to commerce. They will exercise it for themselves. Wars, then, must sometimes be our lot; and all the wise can do, will be to avoid that half of them which would be produced by our own follies and our own acts of injustice; and to make for the other half the best preparations we can. Of what nature should these be? A land army would be useless for offence, and not the best nor safest instrument of defence. For either of these purposes, the sea is the field on which we should meet an European enemy. On that element it is necessary we should possess some power. To aim at such a navy as the greater nations of Europe possess, would be a foolish and wicked waste of the energies of our countrymen. It would be to pull on our own heads that load of military expense which makes the European laborer go supperless to bed, and moistens his bread with the sweat of his brows. It will be enough if we enable ourselves to prevent insults from those nations of Europe which are weak on the sea, because circumstances exist, which render even the stronger ones weak as to us. Providence has placed their richest and most defenceless possessions at our door; has obliged their most precious commerce to pass, as it were, in review before us. To protect this, or to assail, a small part only of their naval force will ever be risked across the Atlantic. The dangers to which the elements expose them here are too well known, and the greater dangers to which they would be exposed at home were any general calamity to involve their whole fleet. They can attack us by detachment only; and it will suffice to make ourselves equal to what they may detach. Even a smaller force than they may detach will be rendered equal or superior by the quickness with which any check may be repaired with us, while losses with them will be irreparable till too late. A small naval force, then, is sufficient for us, and a small one is necessary. * * * It should by no means be so great as we are able to make it.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 413. FORD ED., iii, 279. (1782.)

5791. ——. I am for such a naval force only as may protect our coasts and harbors from such depredations as we have experienced; * * * not for a navy, which by its own expenses and the eternal wars in which it will implicate us, will grind us with public burthens, and sink us under them.—TO ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

5792. ——. With respect to the extent to which our naval preparations should be carried, some difference of opinion may be expected to appear; but just attention to the circumstances of every part of the Union will doubtless reconcile all. A small force will probably continue to be wanted for actual service in the Mediterranean. Whatever annual sum beyond that you may think proper to apportionate to naval preparations, would perhaps be better employed in providing those articles which may be kept without waste or consumption, and be in readiness when any exigence calls them into use.—FIRST INAUGURAL MESSAGE. viii, 12. FORD ED., viii, 122. (Dec. 1801.)

5793. NAVY, Submarine boats.—I have ever looked to the submarine boat as most to be depended on for attaching the torpedoes, and * * * I am in hopes it is not abandoned as impracticable. I should wish to see a corps of young men trained to this service. It would belong to the engineers if at hand, but being nautical, I suppose we must have a corps of naval engineers, to practice and use them. I do not know whether we have authority to put any part of our existing naval establishment in a course of training, but it shall be the subject of a consultation with the Secretary of the Navy.—TO ROBERT FULTON. v, 165. FORD ED., ix, 125. (M., Aug. 1807.)

5794. ——. I wait [Colonel Fulton's] answer as to the submarine boat, before I make you the proposition in form. The very name of a corps of submarine engineers would be a defence.—TO ROBERT SMITH. v, 172. (M., Aug. 1807.)

5795. NAVY DEPARTMENT, Bill to establish.—The bill for establishing a Department of Secretary of the Navy was tried yesterday [April 25th] on its passage to the third reading, and prevailed by 47 against 41.—TO JAMES MADISON. iv, 237. FORD ED., vii, 244. (Pa., 1798.)

5796. NAVY YARDS, Location of.—From the federalists [in Virginia] I expect nothing on any principle of duty or patriotism; but I did suppose they would pay some attentions to the interests of Norfolk. Is it the interest of that place to strengthen the hue and cry against the policy of making the Eastern Branch [Washington] our great naval deposit? Is it their interest that this should be removed to New York or Boston, to one of which it must go if it leaves this? Is it their interest to scout a defence by gunboats in which they would share amply, in hopes of a navy which will not be built in our day, and would be no defence if built, or of forts which will never be built or maintained, and would be no defence if built? Yet such are the objects which they patronize in their papers. This is worthy of more consideration than they seem to have given it.—TO WILSON C. NICHOLAS. FORD ED., viii, 338. (W., Dec. 1804.)

5797. NECESSITY, Law of.—A strict observance of the written law is * * * one of the high duties of a good citizen, but it is not the highest. The laws of necessity, of self-preservation, of saving our country when in danger, are of higher obligation. To lose our country by a scrupulous adherence to written law, would be to lose the law itself, with life, liberty, property, and all those who are enjoying them with us; thus absurdly sacrificing the end to the means.—TO J. B. COLVIN. v, 542. FORD ED., ix, 279. (M., 1810.)

5798. NECKER (Jacques), Ambition of.—It is a tremendous cloud, indeed, which hovers over this nation, and he at the helm has neither the courage nor the skill necessary to weather it. Eloquence in a high degree, knowledge in matters of account and order, are distinguishing traits in his character. Ambition is his first passion, virtue his second. He has not discovered that sublime truth, that a bold, unequivocal virtue is the best handmaid even to ambition, and would carry him further, in the end, than the temporizing, wavering policy he pursues. His judgment is not of the first order, scarcely even of the second; his resolution frail; and upon the whole, it is rare to meet an instance of a person so much below the reputation he has obtained.—TO JOHN JAY. iii, 52. (P., 1789.)

5799. NECKER (Jacques), Friend of liberty.—Though he has appeared to trim a little, he is still, in the main, a friend to public liberty.—TO JOHN JAY. iii, 28. (P., 1789.)

5800. NECKER (Jacques), Praise of.—The grandson of M. Necker cannot fail of a hearty welcome in a country which so much respected him. To myself, who loved the virtues and honored the talents of the grandfather, the attentions I received in his natal house, and particular esteem for yourself, are additional titles to whatever service I can render him.—To MADAME DE STAEL. v, 133. (W., 1807.)

5801. NECKER (Jacques), Unfriendly to America.—Necker never set any store by us, or the connection with us.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 342. (P., 1787.)

5802. NEGROES, Amalgamation.—Their amalgamation with the other color produces a degradation to which no lover of his country, no lover of excellence in the human character can innocently consent.—To EDWARD COLES. FORD ED., ix, 478. (M., 1814.)

5803. NEGROES, Bravery.—They are at least as brave, and more adventuresome. But this may proceed from a want of forethought, which prevents their seeing a danger till it be present. When present, they do not go through it with more coolness or steadiness than the whites.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 381. FORD ED., iii, 245. (1782.)

5804. NEGROES, Colonization.—The bill reported by the revisors* of the whole [Virginia] code does not itself contain the proposition to emancipate all slaves born after the passing the act; but an amendment containing it was prepared, to be offered to the Legislature whenever the bill should be taken up, and further directing, that they should continue with their parents to a certain age, then to be brought up, at the public expense, to tillage, arts or sciences, according to their geniuses, till the females should be eighteen, and the males twenty-one years of age, when they should be colonized to such place as the circumstances of the time should render most proper, sending them out with arms, implements of household and of the handicraft arts, seeds, pairs of the useful domestic animals, &c., to declare them a free and independent people, and extend to them our alliance and protection, till they shall have acquired strength; and to send vessels at the same time to other parts of the world for an equal number of white inhabitants; to induce them to migrate hither, proper encouragements were to be proposed.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 380. FORD ED., iii, 243. (1782.)

5805. — — — This unfortunate difference of color, and perhaps of faculty, is a powerful obstacle to the emancipation of these people. Many of their advocates, while they wish to vindicate the liberty of human nature, are anxious also to preserve its dignity and beauty. Some of these, embarrassed by the question, "What further is to be done with them?" join themselves in opposition with those who are actuated by sordid avarice only. Among the Romans emancipation required but one effort. The slave, when made free, might mix with, without straining the blood of his master. But with us a second is necessary, unknown to history. When freed, he is to be removed beyond the reach of mixture.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 386. FORD ED., iii, 250. (1782.)

5806. — — — You ask my opinion on the proposition of Mrs. Mifflin, to take measures for procuring, on the coast of Africa, an establishment to which the people of color of these States might, from time to time, be colonized, under the auspices of different governments. Having long ago made up my mind on this subject, I have no hesitation in saying that I have ever thought it the most desirable measure which could be adopted, for gradually drawing off this part of our population, most advantageously for themselves as well as for us. Going from a country possessing all the useful arts, they might be the means of transplanting them among the inhabitants of Africa, and would thus carry back to the country of their origin, the seeds of civilization which might render their sojournment and sufferings here a blessing in the end to that country.—To JOHN LYNCH. v, 563. FORD ED., ix, 303. (M., 1811.)

5807. — — — Nothing is more to be wished than that the United States would themselves undertake to make such an establishment on the coast of Africa. Exclusive of motives of humanity, the commercial advantages to be derived from it might repay all its expenses. But for this, the national mind is not yet prepared. It may perhaps be doubted whether many of these people would voluntarily consent to such an exchange of situation, and very certain that few of those advanced to a certain age in habits of slavery, would be capable of self-government. This should not, however, discourage the experiment, nor the early trial of it.—To JOHN LYNCH. v, 565. FORD ED., ix, 304. (M., 1811.)

5808. — — — I received in the first year of my coming into the administration of the General Government, a letter from the Governor of Virginia (Colonel Monroe), consulting me, at the request of the Legislature of the State, on the means of procuring some such asylum, to which these people might be occasionally sent. I proposed to him the establishment of Sierra Leone, to which a private company in England had already colonized a number of negroes and particularly the fugitives from these States during the Revolutionary War; and at the same time suggested, if this could not be obtained, some of the Portuguese possessions in South America, as next most desirable. The subsequent Legislature approving these ideas, I wrote, the ensuing year, 1802, to Mr. King, our Minister in London, to endeavor to negotiate with the Sierra Leone company a reception of such of these people as might be colonized thither. He opened a correspondence with Mr. Wedderburne and Mr. Thornton, secretaries of the company, on the subject, and, in 1803, I received through Mr. King the result, which was that the colony was going on, but in a languishing condition; that the funds of the company were likely to fail, as they received no returns of profit to keep them up; that they were, therefore, in treaty with their government to take the establishment off their hands; but that in no event should they be willing to receive more of these people from the United States, as it was exactly that portion of their settlers which had gone from hence, which, by their idleness and turbulence, had kept the settlement in constant danger of dissolution, which could not have been prevented but for the aid of the maroon negroes from the West Indies, who were more industrious and orderly than the others, and supported the authority of the government and its laws. * * * The effort which I made with Portugal, to obtain an establishment for them within their claims in South America, proved also abortive.—To JOHN LYNCH. v, 564. FORD ED., ix, 303. (M., 1811.) See COLONIZATION.

5809. NEGROES, Elevating.—Nobody wishes more ardently than I do to see a good system commenced for raising the condition both of their body and mind to what it ought to be, as fast as the imbecility of their present existence, and other circumstances which cannot be neglected, will admit.—To BENJAMIN BANNEKER. iii, 291. FORD ED., v, 377. (Pa., 1791.)

— NEGROES, Emancipation.—See SLAVERY.

5810. NEGROES, Future of.—I have supposed the black man, in his present state, might not be in body and mind equal to the white man; but it would be hazardous to affirm, that, equally cultivated for a few generations, he would not become so.—To GENERAL CHASTELLUX. i, 341. FORD ED., iii, 138. (P., 1785.)

5811. NEGROES, Griefs.—Their griefs are transient. Those numberless afflictions, which render it doubtful whether Heaven has given life to us in mercy or in wrath, are less felt, and sooner forgotten with them.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 382. FORD ED., iii, 245. (1782.)

5812. NEGROES, Improvement.—The improvement of the blacks in body and mind, in the first instance of their mixture with the whites, has been observed by every one, and proves that their inferiority is not the effect merely of their condition in life.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 384. FORD ED., iii, 247. (1782.)

5813. — —. Bishop Grégoire wrote to me on the doubts I had expressed five or six and twenty years ago, in the Notes on Virginia, as to the grade of understanding of the negroes, and he sent me his book on the literature of the negroes. His credulity has made him gather up every story he could find of men of color (without distinguishing whether black, or of what degree of mixture), however slight the mention, or light the authority on which they are quoted. The whole do not amount, in point of evidence, to what we know ourselves of Banneker. We know he had spherical trigonometry enough to make almanacs, but not without the suspicion of aid from Ellicot, who was his neighbor and friend, and never missed an opportunity of puffing him. I have a long letter from Banneker, which shows him to have had a mind of very common stature indeed. As to Bishop Grégoire, I wrote him a very soft answer. It was impossible for doubt to have been more tenderly or hesitatingly expressed than that was in the Notes on Virginia, and nothing was or is farther from my intentions, than to enlist myself as the champion of a fixed opinion, where I have only expressed a doubt. St. Domingo will, in time, throw light on the question.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 475. FORD ED., ix, 261. (M., 1809.)

5814. NEGROES, Indians vs.—Comparing them by their faculties of memory, reason, and imagination, it appears to me that in memory they are equal to the whites; in reason much inferior, as I think one could scarcely be found capable of tracing and comprehending the investigations of Euclid; and that in imagination they are dull, tasteless, and anomalous. It would be unfair to follow them to Africa for this investigation. We will consider them here, on the same stage with the whites, and where the facts are not apocryphal on which a judgment is to be formed. It will be right to make great allowances for the difference of condition, of education, of conversation, of the sphere in which they move. Many millions of them have been brought to, and born in America. Most of them, indeed, have been confined to tillage, to their own homes, and their own society; yet many of them have been so situated that they might have availed themselves of the conversation of their masters; many of them have been brought up to the handicraft arts, and from that circumstance have always been associated with the whites. Some have been liberally educated, and all have lived in countries where the arts and sciences are cultivated to a considerable degree, and have had before their eyes samples of the best works from abroad. The Indians, with no advantages of this kind, will often carve figures on their pipes not destitute of design and merit. They will crayon out an animal, a plant, or a country, so as to prove the existence of a germ in their minds which only wants cultivation. They astonish you with strokes of the most sublime oratory; such as prove their reason and sentiment strong, their imagination glowing and elevated. But never yet could I find that a black had uttered a thought above the level of plain narration; never saw even an elementary trait of painting or sculpture.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 382. FORD ED., iii, 245. (1782.)

5815. NEGROES, Industry.—An opinion is hazarded by some, but proved by none, that moral urgencies are not sufficient to induce the negro to labor; that nothing can do this but physical coercion. But this is a problem which the present age alone is prepared to solve by experiment. It would be a solecism to suppose a race of animals created, without sufficient foresight and energy to preserve their own existence. It is disproved, too, by the fact that they exist, and have existed through all the ages of history. We are not sufficiently acquainted with all the nations of Africa, to say that there may not be some in which habits of industry are established, and the arts practiced which are necessary to render life comfortable. The experiment now in progress in St. Domingo, those of Sierra Leone and Cape Mesurado, are but beginning. Your proposition has its aspects of promise also; and should it not fully answer to calculations in figures, it may yet, in its developments, lead to happy results.—To MISS FANNY WRIGHT. vii, 408. FORD ED., x, 344. (M., 1825.)

5816. NEGROES, Integrity.—Notwithstanding these considerations which must weaken their respect for the laws of property, we find among them numerous instances of the most rigid integrity, and as many as among their better instructed masters, of benevolence, gratitude, and unshaken fidelity.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 386. FORD ED., iii, 249. (1782.) See SLAVERY.

5817. NEGROES, Literary.—Misery is often the parent of the most affecting touches in poetry. Among the blacks is misery enough. God knows, but no poetry. Love is the peculiar cestrum of the poet. Their love is ardent, but it kindles the senses only, not the imagination. Religion, indeed, has produced a Phyllis Wheatley;* but it could not produce a poet. The compositions published under her name are below the dignity of criticism. The heroes of the Dunciad are to her, as Hercules to the author of that poem.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 383. FORD ED., iii, 246. (1782.)

5818. — —. Ignatius Sancho has approached nearer to merit in composition [than Phyllis Wheatley]: yet his letters do more honor to the heart than the head. They breathe the purest effusions of friendship and general philanthropy, and show how great a degree of the latter may be compounded with strong religious zeal. He is often happy in the turn of his compliments, and his style is easy and familiar, except when he affects a Shandean fabrication of words. But his imagination is wild and extravagant, escapes incessantly from every restraint of reason and taste, and, in the course of its vagaries, leaves a tract of thought as incoherent and eccentric, as is the course of a meteor through the sky. His subjects should often have led him to a process of sober reasoning; yet we find him always substituting sentiment for demonstration. Upon the whole, though we admit him to the first place among those of his own color who have presented themselves to the public judgment, yet when we compare him with the writers of the race among whom he lived and particularly with the epistolary class in which he has taken his own stand, we are compelled to enroll him at the bottom of the column. This criticism supposes the letters published under his name to be genuine, and to have received amendment from no other hand; points which would not be of easy investigation.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 383. FORD ED., iii, 247. (1782.)

5819. NEGROES, Music.—In music they are more generally gifted than the whites, with accurate ears for tune and time, and they have been found capable of imagining a small catch.* Whether they will be equal to the composition of a more extensive run of melody, or of complicated harmony, is yet to be proved.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 383. FORD ED., iii, 246. (1782.)

5820. NEGROES, Natural History and.—The opinion that they are inferior in the faculties of reason and imagination, must be hazarded with great diffidence. To justify a general conclusion, requires many observations, even where the subject may be submitted to the anatomical knife, to optical glasses, to analysis by fire or by solvents. How much more then where it is a faculty, not a substance, we are examining; where it eludes the research of all the senses; where the conditions of its existence are various and variously combined; where the effects of those which are present or absent bid defiance to calculation; let me add, too, as a circumstance of great tenderness, where our conclusion would degrade a whole race of men from the rank in the scale of beings which their Creator may perhaps have given them. To our reproach it must be said, that though for a century and a half we have had under our eyes the races of black and of red men, they have never yet been viewed by us as subjects of natural history. I advance it, therefore, as a suspicion only, that the blacks, whether originally a distinct race, or made distinct by time and circumstances, are inferior to the whites in the endowments both of body and mind. It is not against experience to suppose that different species of the same genus, or varieties of the same species, may possess different qualifications. Will not a lover of natural history, then, one who views the gradations in all the races of animals with the eye of philosophy, excuse an effort to keep those in the department of man as distinct as nature has formed them?—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 386. FORD ED., iii, 249. (1782.)

*The instrument proper to them is the Banjer [corrupted by the negroes into "banjo"] which they brought hither from Africa, and which is the original of the guitar, its chords being precisely the four lower chords of the guitar.—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

5821. NEGROES, Peculiarities.—To these objections, which are political, may be added others, which are physical and moral. Whether the black of the negro resides in the reticular membrane between the skin and scarf-skin, or in the scarf-skin itself; whether it proceeds from the color of the blood, the color of the bile, or from that of some other secretion, the difference is fixed in nature, and is as real as if its seat and cause were better known to us. And is this difference of no importance? Is it not the foundation of a greater or less share of beauty in the two races? Are not the fine mixtures of red and white, the expressions of every passion by greater or less suffusions of color in the one, preferable to that eternal monotony, which reigns in the countenances, that immovable veil of black which covers all the emotions of the other race? Add to these, flowing hair, a more elegant symmetry of form, their own judgment in favor of the whites, declared by their preference of them, as uniformly as is the preference of the Oranootan for the black woman over those of his own species. The circumstance of superior beauty, is thought worthy attention in the propagation of our horses, dogs, and other domestic animals; why not in that of man? Besides those of color, figure, and hair, there are other physical distinctions proving a difference of race. They have less hair on the face and body. They secrete less by the kidneys, and more by the glands of the skin, which gives them a very strong and disagreeable odor. This greater degree of transpiration renders them more tolerant of heat, and less of cold than the whites. Perhaps, too, a difference of structure in the pulmonary apparatus, which a late ingenious experimentalist (Crawford) has discovered to be the principal regulator of animal heat, may have disabled them from extricating, in the act of inspiration, so much of that fluid from the outer air, or obliged them in expiration, to part with more of it.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 381. FORD ED., iii, 244. (1782.)

— NEGROES, Penal Colony for.—See COLONY, PENAL.

5822. NEGROES, Racial differences.—It will probably be asked, why not retain and incorporate the blacks into the State, and thus save the expense of supplying by importation of white settlers, the vacancies they will leave? Deep-rooted prejudices entertained by the whites; ten thousand recollections, by the blacks, of the injuries they have sustained; new provocations; the real distinctions which nature has made; and many other circumstances will divide us into parties, and produce convulsions, which will probably never end but in the extermination of the one or the other race.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 380. FORD ED., iii, 244. (1782.)

5823. NEGROES, Rights of.—Be assured that no person living wishes more sincerely than I do, to see a complete refutation of the doubts I have myself entertained and expressed on the grade of understanding allotted to the negroes by nature, and to find that in this respect they are on a par with ourselves. My doubts were the result of personal observation on the limited sphere of my own State, where the opportunities for the development of their genius were not favorable, and those of exercising it still less so. I expressed them, therefore, with great hesitation; but whatever be their degree of talent it is no measure of their rights. Because Sir Isaac Newton was superior to others in understanding, he was not therefore lord of the person or property of others. On this subject they are gaining daily in the opinions of nations, and hopeful advances are making towards their reestablishment on an equal footing with the other colors of the human family. I pray you, therefore, to accept my thanks for the many instances you have enabled me to observe of respectable intelligence in that race of men, which cannot fail to have effect in hastening the day of their relief.—To HENRI GREGOIRE. V, 429. FORD ED., ix, 246. (W., 1809.)

5824. NEGROES, Sleep and amusements.—They seem to require less sleep. A black, after hard labor through the day, will be induced by the slightest amusements to sit up till midnight, or later, though knowing he must be out with the first dawn of the morning.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 381. FORD ED., iii, 245. (1782.)

5825. — — — In general, their existence appears to participate more of sensation than reflection. To this must be ascribed their disposition to sleep when abstracted from their diversions, and unemployed in labor. An animal whose body is at rest, and who does not reflect, must be disposed to sleep of course.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 382. FORD ED., iii, 245. (1782.)

5826. NEGROES, Talents.—Nobody wishes more than I do to see such proofs as you exhibit, that nature has given to our black brethren talents equal to those of the other colors of men, and that the appearance of a want of them is owing merely to the degraded condition of their existence, both in Africa and America. * * * I have taken the liberty of sending your Almanac to Monsieur de Condorcet, Secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and member of the Philanthropic Society, because I considered it as a document to which your color had a right for their justification against the doubts which have been entertained of them.—To BENJAMIN BANNEKER. iii, 291. FORD ED., v, 377. (Pa., 1791.) See BANNEKER.

5827. NELSON (Thomas), Governor of Virginia.—[Governor Jefferson's] office was now [June, 1781.] near expiring, the country [Virginia] under invasion by a powerful army, no services but military of any avail, unprepared by his line of life and education for the command of armies, he believed it right not to stand in the way of talents better fitted than his own to the circumstances under which the country was placed. He, therefore, himself proposed to his friends in the Legislature that General Nelson, who commanded the militia of the State, should be appointed Governor, as he was sensible that the union of the civil and military power in the same hands at this time, would greatly facilitate military measures. This appointment accordingly took place on the 12th of June, 1781.—INVASION OF VA. MEMORANDUM. ix, 223. (M., 1781.)

5828. NEOLOGY, American.—I am no friend to what is called Purism, but a zealous one to the Neology which has introduced these two words without the authority of any dictionary. I consider the one as destroying the nerve and beauty of language, while the other improves both, and adds to its copiousness. I have been not a little disappointed, and made suspicious of my own judgment, on seeing the Edinburgh Reviewers, the ablest critics of the age, set their faces against the introduction of new words into the English language; they are particularly apprehensive that the writers of the United States will adulterate it. Certainly so great growing a population, spread over such an extent of country, with such a variety of climates, of productions, of arts, must enlarge their language, to make it answer its purpose of expressing all ideas, the new as well as the old. The new circumstances under which we are placed, call for new words, new phrases, and for the transfer of old words to new objects. An American dialect will, therefore, be formed; so will a West-Indian and Asiatic, as a Scotch and an Irish are already formed. But whether will these adulterate, or enrich the English language? Has the beautiful poetry of Burns, or his Scottish dialect disfigured it? Did the Athenians consider the Doric, the Ionian, the Aeolic, and other dialects as disfiguring or as beautifying their language? Did they fastidiously disavow Herodotus, Pindar, Theocritus, Sappho, Alcaeus, as Grecian writers? On the contrary, they were sensible that the variety of dialects, still infinitely varied by poetical license, constituted the riches of their language, and made the Grecian Homer the first of poets, as he must ever remain, until a language equally ductile and copious, shall again be spoken.—To JOHN WALDO. vi, 184. (M., 1813.)

5829. NEUTRALITY, Carrying trade and.—If war in Europe take place, I hope the new world will fatten on the follies of the old. If we can but establish the principles of the armed neutrality for ourselves, we must become carriers for all parties as far as we can raise vessels.—To E. RUTLEDGE. iii, 165. FORD ED., v, 197. (N.Y., 1790.)

5830. — — — A stoppage by some of the belligerent powers of one of our vessels going with grain to an unblockaded port, would be so unequivocal an infringement of the neutral rights, that we cannot conceive it will be attempted.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 551. FORD ED., vi, 243. (Pa., May 1793.)

5831. — — — The rights of a neutral to carry on a commercial intercourse with every part of the dominions of a belligerent, permitted by the laws of the country (with the exception of blockaded ports and contraband of war), was believed to have been decided between Great Britain and the United States by the sentence of the commissioners mutually appointed to decide on that and other questions of difference between the two nations, and by the actual payment of damages awarded by them against Great Britain for the infraction of that right. When, therefore, it was perceived that the same principle was revived with others more novel, and extending the injury, instructions were given to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of London, and remonstrances duly made by him on the subject. These were followed by a partial and temporary suspension only, without the disavowal of the principle. He has, therefore, been instructed to urge this subject anew, to bring it more fully to the bar of reason, and to insist on the rights too evident and too important to be surrendered. SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 57. FORD ED., viii, 417. (Jan. 1806.)

5832. — — — To former violations of maritime rights, another is now added of very extensive effect. The government of that nation [Great Britain] has issued an order interdicting all trade by neutrals between ports not in amity with them; and being now at war with nearly every nation on the Atlantic and Mediterranean seas, our vessels are required to sacrifice their cargoes at the first port they touch, or to return home without the benefit of going to any other market. Under this new law of the ocean, our trade on the Mediterranean has been swept away by seizures and condemnations, and that in other seas is threatened with the same fate.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 84. FORD ED., ix, 156. (1807.) See NAVIGATION.

5833. NEUTRALITY, Contraband of war.—In our treaty with Prussia, we have gone ahead of other nations in doing away with restraints on the commerce of peaceful nations, by declaring that nothing shall be contraband. For, in truth, in the present improved state of the arts, when every country has such ample means of procuring arms within and without itself, the regulations of contraband answer no other end than to draw other nations into the war. However, as other nations have not given sanction to this improvement, we claim it, at present, with Prussia alone.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 551. FORD ED., vi, 243. (Pa., May 1793.) See BELLIGERENTS and CONTRABAND OF WAR.

5834. NEUTRALITY, Duties.—We have seen with sincere concern the flames of war lighted up again in Europe, and nations with which we have the most friendly and useful relations engaged in mutual destruction. While we regret the miseries in which we see others involved, let us bow with gratitude to that kind Providence which, inspiring with wisdom and moderation our late legislative councils while placed under the urgency of the greatest wrongs, guarded us from hastily entering into the sanguinary contest, and left us only to look on and to pity its ravages. These will be heaviest on those immediately engaged. Yet the nations pursuing peace will not be exempt from all evil. In the course of this conflict [France and England], let it be our endeavor, as it is our interest and desire, to cultivate the friendship of the belligerent nations by every act of justice and of incessant kindness; to receive their armed vessels with hospitality from distresses of the sea, but to administer the means of annoyance to none; to establish in our harbors such a police as may maintain law and order; to restrain our citizens from embarking individually in a war in which their country takes no part; to punish severely those persons, citizen or alien, who shall usurp the cover of our flag for vessels not entitled to it, infecting thereby with suspicion those of real Americans, and committing us into controversies for the redress of wrongs not our own; to exact from every nation the observance, toward our vessels and citizens, of those principles and practices which all civilized people acknowledge; to merit the character of a just nation, and maintain that of an independent one, preferring every consequence to insult and habitual wrong. Congress will consider whether the existing laws enable us efficaciously to maintain this course with our citizens in all places, and with others while within the limits of our jurisdiction, and will give them the new modifications necessary for these objects. Some contraventions of right have already taken place, both within our jurisdictional limits and on the high seas. The friendly disposition of the governments from whose agents they have proceeded, as well as their wisdom and regard for justice, leave us in reasonable expectation that they will be rectified and prevented in future; and that no act will be countenanced by them which threatens to disturb our friendly intercourse. Separated by a wide ocean from the nations of Europe, and from the political interests which entangle them together, with productions and wants which render our commerce and friendship useful to them and theirs to us, it cannot be the interest of any to assail us, nor ours to disturb them.

We should be most unwise, indeed, were we to cast away the singular blessings of the position in which nature has placed us, the opportunity she has endowed us with of pursuing, at a distance from foreign contentions, the paths of industry, peace and happiness; of cultivating general friendship, and of bringing collisions of interest to the umpirage of reason rather than of force. How desirable, then, must it be, in a government like ours, to see its citizens adopt individually the views, the interests, and the conduct which their country should pursue, divesting themselves of those passions and partialities which tend to lessen useful friendships, and to embarrass and embroil us in the calamitous scenes of Europe. Confident that you will duly estimate the importance of neutral dispositions toward the observance of neutral conduct, that you will be sensible how much it is our duty to look on the bloody arena spread before us with commiseration indeed, but with no other wish than to see it closed, I am persuaded you will cordially cherish these dispositions in all discussions among yourselves, and in all communications with your constituents; and I anticipate with satisfaction the measures of wisdom which the great interests now committed to you will give you an opportunity of providing, and myself that of approving and carrying into execution with the fidelity I owe to my country.—THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 27. FORD ED., viii, 272. (Oct. 1803.)

5835. NEUTRALITY, Enemy goods.—Another source of complaint with Mr. Genet has been that the English take French goods out of American vessels, which he says is against the law of nations and ought to be prevented by us. On the contrary, we suppose it to have been long an established principle of the law of nations, that the goods of a friend are free in an enemy's vessel, and an enemy's goods lawful prize in the vessel of a friend. The inconvenience of this principle which subjects merchant vessels to be stopped at sea, searched, ransacked, led out of their course, has induced several nations latterly to stipulate against it by treaty, and to substitute another in its stead, that free bottoms shall make free goods, and enemy bottoms enemy goods; a rule equal to the other in point of loss and gain, but less oppressive to commerce. As far as it has been introduced, it depends on the treaties stipulating it, and forms exceptions, in special cases, to the general operation of the law of nations. We have introduced it into our treaties with France, Holland and Prussia; and French goods found by the two latter nations in American bottoms are not made prize of. It is our wish to establish it with other nations. But this requires their consent also, is a work of time, and in the meanwhile, they have a right to act on the general principle, without giving to us or to France cause of complaint. Nor do I see that France can lose by it on the whole. For though she loses her goods when found in our vessels by the nations with whom we have no treaties, yet she gains our goods, when found in the vessels of the same and all other nations; and we believe the latter mass to be greater than the former.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iv, 43. FORD ED., vi, 387. (Pa., Aug. 1793.)

5836. — — — It is to be lamented, indeed, that the general principle has operated so cruelly in the dreadful calamity which has lately happened in St. Domingo. The miserable fugitives, who, to save their lives, had taken asylum in our vessels, with such valuable and portable things as could be gathered in the moment out of the ashes of their houses and wrecks of their fortunes, have been plundered of these remains by the licensed sea rovers of their enemies. This has swelled, on this occasion, the disadvantages of the general principle, that "an enemy's goods are free prize in the vessels of a friend". But it is one of those deplorable and unforeseen calamities to which they expose themselves who enter into a state of war, furnishing to us an awful lesson to avoid it by justice and moderation, and not a cause of encouragement to expose our own towns to the same burning and butcheries, nor of complaint because we do not.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iv, 44. FORD ED., vi, 387. (Pa., Aug. 1793.) See ENEMY GOODS.

5837. NEUTRALITY, Fraudulent use of flag.—As there appears * * * a probability of a very general war in Europe, you will be pleased to be particularly attentive to preserve for our vessels all the rights of neutrality, and to endeavor that our flag be not usurped by others to procure to themselves the benefits of our neutrality. This usurpation tends to commit us with foreign nations, to subject those vessels truly ours to rigorous scrutinies and delays, to distinguish them from counterfeits, and to take the business of transportation out of our hands.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 533. FORD ED., vi, 205. (Pa., 1793.)

5838. ——. It will be necessary for all our public agents to exert themselves with vigilance for securing to our vessels all the rights of neutrality.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 535. (Pa., 1793.) See FLAG.

5839. NEUTRALITY, The Grange capture.—The capture of the British ship Grange, by the French frigate L'Embuscade, has been found to have taken place within the * * * jurisdiction of the United States * * *. The government, is, therefore, taking measures for the liberation of the crew and restitution of the ship and cargo.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 559. FORD ED., vi, 253. (Pa., May 1793.)

5840. ——. The government deems the capture [of the Grange] to have been unquestionably within its jurisdiction, and that according to the rules of neutrality and the protection it owes to all persons while within its limits, it is bound to see that the crew be liberated, and the vessel and cargo restored to their former owners. * * * I am, in consequence, charged by the President of the United States to express to you his expectation, and at the same time his confidence, that you will be pleased to take immediate and effectual measures for having the ship Grange and her cargo restored to the British owners, and the persons taken on board her set at liberty.—To JEAN BAPTISTE TERNANT. iii, 561. FORD ED., vi, 256. (Pa., May 15, 1793.)

5841. ——. In forming these determinations [respecting Grange, &c.] the government of the United States has listened to nothing but the dictates of immutable justice: they consider the rigorous exercise of that virtue as the surest means of preserving perfect harmony between the United States and the powers at war.—To JEAN BAPTISTE TERNANT. iii, 562. FORD ED., vi, 257. (Pa., May 1793.)

5842. NEUTRALITY, Impartial.—Our conduct as a neutral nation is marked out in our treaties with France and Holland, two of the belligerent powers; and as the duties of neutrality require an equal conduct to both parties, we should, on that ground, act on the same principles towards Great Britain.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 551. FORD ED., vi, 243. (Pa., May 1793.)

5843. ——. A manly neutrality, claiming the liberal rights ascribed to that condition by the very powers at war, was the part we should have taken, and would, I believe, have given satisfaction to our allies. If anything prevents its being a mere English neutrality, it will be that the penchant of the President is not that way, and above all, the ardent spirit of our constituents.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 557. FORD ED., vi, 251. (May 1793.)

5844. ——. The line is now drawn so clearly as to show on one side, 1. The fashionable circles of Philadelphia, New York, Boston and Charleston (natural aristocrats). 2. Merchants trading on British capital. 3. Paper men (all the old Tories are found in some one of the three descriptions). On the other side are, 1. Merchants trading on their own capital. 2. Irish merchants. 3. Tradesmen, mechanics, farmers, and every other possible description of our citizens.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 557. FORD ED., vi, 251. (May 1793.)

5845. ——. I trust that in the readiness with which the United States have attended to the redress of such wrongs as are committed by their citizens, or within their jurisdiction, you will see proofs of their justice and impartiality to all parties, and that it will ensure to their citizens pursuing their lawful business by sea or by land, in all parts of the world, a like efficacious interposition of the governing powers to protect them from injury, and redress it, where it has taken place. With such dispositions on both sides, vigilantly and faithfully carried into effect, we may hope that the blessings of peace, on the one part, will be as little impaired, and the evils of war on the other, as little aggravated, as the nature of things will permit; and that this should be so, is, we trust, the prayer of all.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 559. FORD ED., vi, 254. (Pa., 1793.)

5846. ——. The course intended to be pursued being that of a strict and impartial neutrality, decisions, rendered by the President on that principle, dissatisfy both parties, and draw complaints from both.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 580. FORD ED., vi, 299. (Pa., June 1793.)

5847. ——. It will never be easy to convince me that by a firm yet just conduct in 1793, we might not have obtained such a respect for our neutral rights from Great Britain, as that her violations of them and use of our means to wage her wars, would not have furnished any pretence to the other party to do the same. War with both would have been avoided, commerce and navigation protected and enlarged. We shall now either be forced into a war, or have our commerce and navigation at least totally annihilated, and the produce of our farms for some years left to rot on our hands. A little time will unfold these things, and show which class of opinions would have been most friendly to the firmness of our government, and to the interests of those for whom it was made.—To DR. JOHN EDWARDS. iv, 165. FORD ED., vii, 113. (M., Jan. 1797.)

5848. ——. It is to be deplored that distant as we are from the storms and convulsions which agitate the European world, the pursuit of an honest neutrality, beyond the reach of reproach, has been insufficient to secure to us the certain enjoyments of peace with those whose interests as well as ours would be promoted by it.—R. to A. NEW JERSEY LEGISLATURE. viii, 122. (1807.)

5849. ——. I verily believe that it will ever be in our power to keep so even a stand between England and France, as to inspire a wish in neither to throw us into the scale of his adversary. If we can do this for a dozen years only, we shall have little to fear from them.—To MR. COXE. v, 58. (W., 1807.)

5850. ——. Neither belligerent pretends to have been injured by us, or can say that we have in any instance departed from the most faithful neutrality.—R. to A. VIRGINIA ASSEMBLY. viii, 148. (1809.)

5851. ——. A law respecting our conduct as a neutral between Spain and her contending colonies was passed [by the late Congress] by a majority of one only, I believe, and against the very general sentiment of our country. It is thought to strain our complaisance to Spain beyond her right or merit, and almost against the right of the other party, and certainly against the claims they have to our good wishes and neighborly relations. That we should wish to see the people of other countries free, is as natural, and, at least as justifiable, as that one king should wish to see the kings of other countries maintained in their despotism. Right to both parties, innocent favor to the juster cause, is our proper sentiment.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 78. FORD ED., x, 90. (M., 1817.)

5852. NEUTRALITY, Markets and.—If the new government wears the front which I hope it will, I see no impossibility in the availing ourselves of the wars of others to open the other parts of America [West Indies] to our commerce, as the price of our neutrality.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

5853. ——. With England, I think we shall cut off the resource of impressing our seamen to fight her battles, and establish the inviolability of our flag in its commerce with her enemies. We shall thus become what we sincerely wish to be, honestly neutral, and truly useful to both belligerents. To the one, by keeping open market for the consumption of her manufactures, while they are excluded from all the other countries under the power of her enemy; to the other, by securing for her a safe carriage of all her productions, metropolitan or colonial, while her own means are restrained by her enemy, and may, therefore, be employed in other useful pursuits. We are certainly more useful friends to France and Spain as neutrals, than as allies.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 18. (W., 1806.) See COMMERCE, MARKETS, and NAVIGATION.

5854. NEUTRALITY, Obligations of.—Where [treaties] are silent, the general principles of the law of nations must give the rule [of neutral obligation]. I mean the principles of that law as they have been liberalized in latter times by the refinement of manners and morals, and evidenced by the declarations, stipulations, and practice of every civilized nation.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 551. FORD ED., vi, 243. (Pa., May 1793.)

5855. NEUTRALITY, Passage of troops.—It is well enough agreed in the laws of nations, that for a neutral power to give or refuse permission to the troops of either belligerent party to pass through their territory, is no breach of neutrality, provided the same refusal or permission be extended to the other party. If we give leave of passage then to the British troops, Spain will have no just cause of complaint against us, provided we extend the same leave to her when demanded. If we refuse (as indeed we have a right to do), and the troops should pass notwithstanding, of which there can be little doubt, we shall stand committed. For either we must enter immediately into the war, or pocket an acknowledged insult in the face of the world; and one insult pocketed soon produces another. There is, indeed, a middle course which I should be inclined to prefer; that is to avoid giving any answer. They will proceed notwithstanding, but to do this under our silence, will admit of palliation, and produce apologies, from military necessity; and will leave us free to pass it over without dishonor, or to make it a handle of quarrel hereafter, if we should have use for it as such. But, if we are obliged to give an answer, I think the occasion not such as should induce us to hazard that answer which might commit us to the war at so early a stage of it; and, therefore, that the passage should be permitted. If they should pass without having asked leave, I should be for expressing our dissatisfaction to the British court, and keeping alive an altercation on the subject, till events should decide whether it is most expedient to accept their apologies, or to profit of the aggression as a cause of war.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 509. FORD ED., v, 239. (1790.)

5856. NEUTRALITY, Passports for vessels.—The proposition to permit all our vessels destined for any port in the French West India Islands to be stopped, unless furnished with passports from yourself, is so far beyond the powers of the Executive, that it will be unnecessary to enumerate the objections to which it would be liable.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 88. FORD ED., vi, 460. (Pa., Nov. 1793.)

5857. NEUTRALITY, Preserving.—Amidst the confusion of a general war which seems to be threatening that quarter of the globe [Europe], we hope to be permitted to preserve the line of neutrality.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 535. (Pa., March 1793.)

5858. ——. I wish we may be able to repress the spirit of the people within the limits of a fair neutrality.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 548. FORD ED., vi, 238. (Pa., 1793.)

5859. ——. You may, on every occasion, give assurances [to the British government] which cannot go beyond the real desires of this country, to preserve a fair neutrality in the present war, on condition that the rights of neutral nations are respected in us, as they have been settled in modern times, either by the express declarations of the powers of Europe, or their adoption of them on particular occasions.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 542. (Pa., April 1793.)

5860. ——. We shall be a little embarrassed occasionally till we feel ourselves firmly seated in the saddle of neutrality.—To GEORGE WYTHE. FORD ED., vi, 218. (Pa., April 1793.)

5861. ——. I fear that a fair neutrality will prove a disagreeable pill to our friends [the French], though necessary to keep out of the calamities of a war.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 232. (Pa., April 1793.)

5862. ——. No country, perhaps, was ever so thoroughly against war as ours. These dispositions pervade every description of its citizens, whether in or out of office. They cannot, perhaps, suppress their affections, nor their wishes. But they will suppress the effects of them so as to preserve a fair neutrality. Indeed we shall be more useful as neutrals than as parties, by the protection which our flag will give to supplies of provisions. In this spirit let all your assurances be given to the government [of France].—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. FORD ED., vi, 217. (Pa., April 1793.)

5863. ——. If we preserve even a sneaking neutrality, we shall be indebted for it to the President, and not to his counsellors.—To COLONEL MONROE. iii, 548. FORD ED., vi, 239. (Pa., May 1793.)

5864. NEUTRALITY, Profitable.—The great harvest for [the profits of navigation] is when other nations are at war and our flag neutral.—OPINION ON SHIP PASSPORTS. vii, 625. (1793.)

5865. ——. Let us milk the cow while the Russian holds her by the horns and the Turk holds her by the tail.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 245. FORD ED., x, 217. (M., 1822.)

5866. NEUTRALITY, Provisions not contraband.—This article* is so manifestly contrary to the law of nations, that nothing more would seem necessary than to observe that it is so. Reason and usage have established that when two nations go to war, those who choose to live in peace retain their natural right to pursue their agriculture, manufactures, and other ordinary vocations, to carry the produce of their industry for exchange to all nations, belligerent or neutral, as usual, to go and come freely, without injury or molestation, and, in short, that the war among others shall be, for them, as if it did not exist. One restriction on their natural rights has been submitted to by nations at peace; that is to say, that of not furnishing to either party implements merely of war, for the annoyance of the other, nor anything whatever to a place blockaded by its enemy. What these implements of war are, has been so often agreed and is so well understood, as to leave little question about them at this day. There does not exist, perhaps, a nation in our common hemisphere which has not made a particular enumeration of them, in some or all of their treaties, under the name of contraband. It suffices for the present occasion, to say, that corn flour and meal, are not of the class of contraband, and consequently remain articles of free commerce. A culture, which, like that of the soil, gives employment to such a proposition of mankind, could never be suspended by the whole earth, or interrupted for them, whenever any two nations should think proper to go to war.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 59. FORD ED., vi, 413. (Pa., Sept. 1793.)

5867. ——. The state of war existing between Great Britain and France, furnishes no legitimate right either to interrupt the agriculture of the United States, or the peaceable exchange of its produce with all nations; and

* Instructions to commanders of British war ships directing them to stop vessels carrying provisions to French ports, and send them to English ports where their cargoes may be purchased by that government, or released on security that they will be taken to the ports of some country in amity with Great Britain.—EDITOR.

consequently, the assumption of it will be as lawful hereafter as now, in peace as in war. No ground, acknowledged by the common reason of mankind, authorizes this act now, and unacknowledged ground may be taken at any time and all times. We see, then, a practice begun, to which no time, no circumstances prescribe any limits, and which strikes at the root of our agriculture, that branch of industry which gives food, clothing and comfort to the great mass of the inhabitants of these States. If any nation whatever has a right to shut up to our produce all the ports of the earth except her own, and those of her friends, she may shut up these also, and so confine us within our own limits. No nation can subscribe to such pretensions; no nation can agree, at the mere will or interest of another, to have its peaceable industry suspended, and its citizens reduced to idleness and want. The loss of our produce, destined for foreign markets, or that loss which would result from an arbitrary restraint of our markets, is a tax too serious for us to acquiesce in. It is not enough for a nation to say, we and our friends will buy your produce. We have a right to answer, that it suits us better to sell to their enemies as well as their friends. Our ships do not go to France to return empty. They go to exchange the surplus of our produce, which we can spare, for surpluses of other kinds, which they can spare, and we want: which they can furnish on better terms, and more to our mind, than Great Britain or her friends. We have a right to judge for ourselves what market best suits us, and they have none to forbid to us the enjoyment of the necessities and comforts which we may obtain from any other independent country.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 60. FORD ED., vi, 413. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

5868. ——. This act, too, tends directly to draw us from that state of peace in which we are wishing to remain. It is an essential character of neutrality to furnish no aids (not stipulated by treaty) to one party, which we are not equally ready to furnish to the other. If we permit corn to be sent to Great Britain and her friends, we are equally bound to permit it to France. To restrain it, would be a partiality which might lead to war with France; and, between restraining it ourselves, and permitting her enemies to restrain it unrightfully, is no difference. She would consider this as a mere pretext, of which she would not be the dupe; and on what honorable ground could we otherwise explain it? Thus we should see ourselves plunged, by this unauthorized act of Great Britain, into a war with which we meddle not, and which we wish to avoid, if justice to all parties, and from all parties, will enable us to avoid it. In the case where we found ourselves obliged, by treaty, to withhold from the enemies of France the right of arming in our ports, we thought ourselves in justice bound to withhold the same right from France also, and we did it. Were we to withhold from her supplies of provisions, we should, in like manner, be bound to withhold them from her enemies also; and thus shut to ourselves all the ports of Europe, where corn is in demand, or make ourselves parties in the war. This is a dilemma, which Great Britain has no right to force upon us, and for which no pretext can be found in any part of our conduct. She may, indeed, feel the desire of starving an enemy nation; but she can have no right of doing it at our loss, nor of making us the instruments of it.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 61. FORD ED., vi, 414. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

5869. NEUTRALITY, Public vessels.

The public ships of war of both nations [France and England] enjoy a perfect equality in our ports; first, in cases of urgent necessity; secondly, in cases of comfort or convenience; and thirdly, in the time they choose to continue; and all a friendly power can ask from another is, to extend to her the same indulgences which she extends to other friendly powers.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iv, 66. FORD ED., vi, 423. (Pa., 1793.) See ASYLUM.

5870. ———. The bringing vessels to, of whatever nation, while within the limits of the protection of the United States, will be pointedly forbidden; the government being firmly determined to enforce a peaceable demeanor among all the parties within those limits, and to deal to all the same impartial measure.—To THE GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA. iii, 564. (Pa., May 1793.)

5871. ———. Mr. Thornton's attempt to justify his nation in using our ports as cruising stations on our friends and ourselves, renders the matter so serious as to call, I think, for answer. That we ought, in courtesy and friendship, to extend to them all the rights of hospitality is certain; that they should not use our hospitality to injure our friends or ourselves is equally enjoined by morality and honor. After the rigorous exertions we made in Genet's time to prevent this abuse on his part, and the indulgences extended by Mr. Adams to the British cruisers even after our pacification with France, by ourselves also from an unwillingness to change the course of things as the war was near its close, I did not expect to hear from that quarter charges of partiality.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 501. (M., Aug. 1803.)

5872. ———. I do not think the loan of our navy yard any more contrary to neutrality than that of our ports. It is merely admitting a ship to a proper station in our waters.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 475. (M., Sep. 1806.)

5873. ———. Several French vessels of war, disabled from keeping the sea, * * * put into the harbors of the United States to avoid the danger of shipwreck. The minister of their nation states that their crews are without resources for subsistence, and other necessities, for the reimbursement of which he offers bills on his government, the faith of which he pledges for their punctual payment. The laws of humanity make it a duty for nations, as well as individuals, to succor those whom accident and distress have thrown upon them. By doing this in the present case, to the extent of mere subsistence and necessities, and so as to aid no military equipment, we shall keep within the duties of rigorous neutrality, which never can be in opposition to those of humanity. We furnished, on a former occasion, to a distressed crew of the other belligerent party, similar accommodations, and we have ourselves received from both those powers, friendly and free supplies to the necessities of our vessels of war in their Mediterranean ports. In fact, the governments of civilized nations generally are in the practice of exercising these offices of humanity towards each other. Our government having as yet made no regular provision for the exchange of these offices of courtesy and humanity between nations, the honor, the interest, and the duty of our country require that we should adopt any other mode by which it may legally be done on the present occasion. It is expected that we shall want a large sum of money in Europe, for the purposes of the present negotiation with Spain, and besides this we want annually large sums there, for the discharge of our installments of debt. Under these circumstances, supported by the unanimous opinion of the heads of Departments, * * * and firmly trusting that the government of France will feel itself peculiarly interested in the punctual discharge of the bills drawn by their Minister, * * * I approve of the Secretary of the treasury's taking the bills of the Minister of France, to an amount not exceeding sixty thousand dollars.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 35. (W., Jan. 1807.)

5874. ———. Armed vessels remaining within our jurisdiction in defiance of the authority of the laws, must be viewed either as rebels, or public enemies. The latter character it is most expedient to ascribe to them; the laws of intercourse with persons of that description are fixed and known. If we relinquish them we shall have a new code to settle with those individual offenders, with whom self-respect forbids any intercourse but merely for purposes of humanity.—To GOVERNOR W. H. CABELL. v, 170. (M., 1807.)

5875. NEUTRALITY, Rights.—The doctrine that the rights of nations remaining quietly under the exercise of moral and social duties, are to give way to the convenience of those who prefer plundering and murdering one another, is a monstrous doctrine; and ought to yield to the more rational law, that "the wrongs which two nations endeavor to inflict on each other, must not infringe on the rights or conveniences of those remaining at peace".—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 410. FORD ED., viii, 90. (M., 1801.)

5876. ———. It would indeed be advantageous to us to have neutral rights established on a broad ground; but no dependence can be placed in any European coalition for that. They have so many other bye-interests of greater weight, that some one or other will always be bought off. To be entangled with them would be a much greater evil than a temporary acquiescence in the false principles which have prevailed.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iv, 414. FORD ED., viii, 98. (W., 1801.)

5877. ———. With respect to the rights of neutrality, we have certainly a great interest in their settlement. But this depends exclusively on the will of two characters, Bonaparte and Alexander. The dispositions of the former to have them placed on liberal grounds are known. The interest of the latter should insure the same disposition. The only thing to be done is to bring the two characters together to treat on the subject. All the minor maritime powers of Europe will of course concur with them. We have not failed to use such means as we possess to induce these two sovereigns to avail the world of its present situation to declare and enforce the laws of nature and convenience on the seas. But the organization of the treaty-making power by our Constitution is too particular for us to commit the nation in so great an operation with all the European powers. With such a federal phalanx in the Senate, compact and vigilant for opportunities to do mischief, the addition of a very few other votes, misled by accidental or imperfect views of the subject, would suffice to commit us most dangerously. All we can do, therefore, is to encourage others to declare and guarantee neutral rights, by excluding all intercourse with any nation which infringes them, and so leave a niche in their compact for us, if our treaty-making power shall choose to occupy it.—To THOMAS PAINE. FORD ED., viii, 437. (W., March 1806.)

5878. — — —. The license to four British vessels to sail to Lima proves that belligerents may, either by compact or force, conduct themselves towards one another as they please; but not that a neutral may, unless by some express permission of the belligerent.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 466. (M., Aug. 1806.)

5879. — — —. It is all important that we should stand in terms of the strictest cordiality with France. In fact, we are to depend on her and Russia for the establishment of neutral rights by the treaty of peace, among which should be that of taking no persons by a belligerent out of a neutral ship, unless they be the soldiers of an enemy.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v. 64. FORD ED., ix, 40. (W., April 1807.)

5880. — — —. The instructions given to our ministers [to England] were framed in the sincerest spirit of amity and moderation. They accordingly proceeded, in conformity therewith, to propose arrangements which might embrace and settle all the points in difference between us, which might bring us to a mutual understanding on our neutral and national rights, and provide for a commercial intercourse on conditions of some equality. After long and fruitless endeavors to effect the purposes of their mission, and to obtain arrangements within the limits of their instructions, they concluded to sign such as could be obtained, and to send them for consideration, candidly declaring to the other negotiators, at the same time, that they were acting against their instructions, and that their government, therefore, could not be pledged for ratification. Some of the articles proposed might have been admitted on a principle of compromise, but others were too highly disadvantageous, and no sufficient provision was made against the principal source of the irritations and collisions which were constantly endangering the peace of the two nations. The question, therefore, whether a treaty should be accepted in that form could have admitted but of one decision, even had no declarations or the other party impaired our confidence in it. Still anxious not to close the door against friendly adjustment, new modifications were framed, and further concessions authorized than could before have been supposed necessary; and our ministers were instructed to resume their negotiations on these grounds. On this new reference to amicable discussion, we were reposing in confidence, when on the 22nd day of June last, by a formal order from the British admiral, the frigate Chesapeake, leaving her port for distant service, was attacked by one of those vessels which had been lying in our harbors under the indulgences of hospitality, was disabled from proceeding, had several of her crew killed, and four taken away.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 83. FORD ED., ix, 150. (Oct. 27, 1807.) See CHESAPEAKE.

5881. — — —. The nations of the earth prostrated at the foot of power, the ocean submitted to the despotism of a single nation, the laws of nature and the usages which have hitherto regulated the intercourse of nations and interposed some restraint between power and right, now totally disregarded. Such is the state of things when the United States are left single-handed to maintain the rights of neutrals, and the principles of public right against a warring world.—R. to A. NIAGARA REPUBLICANS. iii, 155. (1809.)

5882. — — —. When two nations go to war, it does not abridge the rights of neutral nations but in the two articles of blockade and contraband of war.—To BENJAMIN STODDERT. v, 425. FORD ED., ix, 245. (W., 1809.) See ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA and EMBARGO.

5883. NEUTRALITY, Sale of arms.—The manufacture of arms is the occupation and livelihood of some of our citizens; and * * * it ought not to be expected that a war among other nations should produce such an internal derangement of the occupations of a nation at peace, as the suppression of a manufacture which is the support of some of its citizens; but * * * if they should export these arms to nations at war, they would be abandoned to the seizure and confiscation which the law of nations authorized to be made of them on the high seas.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 87. FORD ED., vi, 460. (Pa., Nov. 1793.) See BELLIGERENTS.

— NEUTRALITY, Sale of ships.—See BELLIGERENTS.

5884. NEUTRALITY, Treasury Department and.—Hamilton produced [at a cabinet meeting] the draft of a letter by himself to the collectors of the customs, giving them in charge to watch over all proceedings in their districts, contrary to the laws of neutrality, or tending to infract our peace with the belligerent powers, and particularly to observe if vessels pierced for guns should be built, and to inform him of it. This was objected to. 1. As setting up a system of espionage, destructive of the peace of society. 2. Transferring to the Treasury Department the conservation of the laws of neutrality and peace with foreign nations. 3. It was rather proposed to intimate to the judges that the laws respecting neutrality being now come into activity, they should charge the grand juries with the observance of them; these being constitutional and public informers, and the persons accused knowing of what they should do, and having an opportunity of justifying themselves. E. K. [Edmund Randolph] found a hair to split, which, as always happens, became the decision. Hamilton is to write to the collectors of the customs, who are to convey their information to the attorneys of the district to whom E. R. is to write to receive their information and proceed by indictment. The clause respecting the building vessels pierced for guns was omitted, for though three against one thought it would be a breach of neutrality, yet they thought we might defer giving a public opinion on it as yet.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 556. FORD ED., vi, 250. (May 1793.)

5885. — — —. I have been still reflecting on the draft of the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the custom house officers, instructing them to be on the watch as to all infractions or tendencies to infraction of the laws of neutrality by our citizens, and to communicate the same to him. When this paper was first communicated to me, though the whole of it struck me disagreeably, I did not in the first moment see clearly the improprieties but of the last clause. The more I have reflected, the more objectionable the whole appears. By this proposal the collectors of the customs are to be made an established corps of spies or informers against their fellow citizens, whose actions they are to watch in secret, inform against in secret to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is to communicate it to the President. If the action and evidence appear to justify a prosecution, a prosecution is to be set on foot on the secret information of a collector. If it will not justify it, then the only consequence is that the mind of government has been poisoned against a citizen, neither known nor suspecting it, and perhaps too distant to bring forward his justification. This will at least furnish the collector with a convenient weapon to keep down a rival, draw a cloud over an inconvenient censor, or satisfy mere malice and private enmity. The object of this new institution is to be to prevent infractions of the laws of neutrality, and preserve our peace with foreign nations; but I cannot possibly conceive how the superintendence of the laws of neutrality, or the preservation of our peace with foreign nations can be ascribed to the department of the Treasury, which I suppose to comprehend merely matters of revenue. It would be to add a new and a large field to a department already amply provided with business, patronage, and influence. It was urged as a reason that the collectors of the customs are in convenient positions for this espionage. They are in convenient positions, too, for building ships of war; but will that business be transplanted from its department, merely because it can be conveniently done in another? It seemed the desire that if this means was disapproved, some other equivalent might be adopted. Though we consider the acts of a foreigner making a captive within our limits, as an act of public hostility, and therefore to be turned over to the military rather than the civil power; yet the acts of our citizens infringing the laws of neutrality, or contemplating that, are offences against the ordinary laws and cognizable by them. Grand juries are the constitutional inquisitors and informers of the country; they are scattered everywhere, see everything, see it while they suppose themselves mere private persons, and not with the prejudiced eye of a permanent and systematic spy. Their information is on oath, is public, it is in the vicinage of the party charged, and can be at once refuted. These officers taken only occasionally from among the people, are familiar to them, the office respected, and the experience of centuries has shown that it is safely entrusted with our character, property and liberty. A grand juror cannot carry on systematic persecution against a neighbor whom he hates, because he is not permanent in the office. The judges generally, by a charge, instruct the grand jurors in the infractions of law which are to be noticed by them; and our judges are in the habit of printing their charges in the newspapers. The judges, having notice of the proclamation, will perceive that the occurrence of a foreign war has brought into activity the laws of neutrality, as a part of the law of the land. This new branch of the law they will know needs explanation to the grand juries more than any other. They will study and define the subjects to them and to the public. The public mind will by this be warned against the acts which may endanger our peace, foreign nations will see a much more respectable evidence of our bonâ fide intentions to preserve neutrality, and society will be relieved from the inquietude which must forever be excited by the knowledge of the existence of such a poison in it as secret accusation. It will be easy to suggest this matter to the attention of the judges, and that alone puts the whole machine into motion. The one is a familiar, impartial and precious instrument; the other, not popular in its present functions, will be odious in the new ones, and the odium will reach the Executive, who will be considered as having planted a germ of private inquisition absolutely unknown to our laws.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. iii, 553. FORD ED., vi, 245. (May 1793.)

5886. NEUTRALITY, Usurpation of jurisdiction.—The United States being at peace with both parties, will certainly not see with indifference its territory or jurisdiction violated by [France or England] either, and will proceed immediately to enquire into the facts and to do what these shall show ought to be done with exact impartiality.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. FORD ED., vi, 236. (Pa., May 1793.)

5887. — — —. It is the right of every nation to prohibit acts of sovereignty from being exercised by any other within its limits; and the duty of a neutral nation to prohibit such as would injure one of the warring powers.—To E. C. GENET. iii, 572. FORD ED., vi, 283. (Pa., June 1793.) See CONSULS, GENET, and PRIVATEERS.

5888. NEUTRALITY, Violations of.—Since our last meeting the aspect of our foreign relations has considerably changed. Our coasts have been infested and our harbors watched by private armed vessels, some of them without commissions, some with illegal commissions, others with those of legal form but committing piratical acts beyond the authority of their commissions. They have captured in the very entrance of our harbors, as well as on the high seas, not only the vessels of our friends coming to trade with us, but our own also. They have carried them off under pretence of legal adjudication, but not daring to approach a court of justice, they have plundered and sunk them by the way, or in obscure places where no evidence could arise against them; maltreated the crews, and abandoned them in boats in the open sea, or on desert shores without food or covering. These enormities appearing to be unreachd by any control of their sovereigns, I found it necessary to equip a force to cruise within our own seas, to arrest all vessels of these descriptions found hovering on our coast within the limits of the Gulf Stream, and to bring the offenders in for trial as pirates. The same system of hovering on our coasts, and harbors under color of seeking enemies, has been also carried on by public armed ships, to the great annoyance and oppression of our commerce. New principles, too, have been interpolated into the law of nations, founded neither in justice, nor the usage, or acknowledgment of nations. According to these, a belligerent takes to itself a commerce with its own enemy, which it denies to a neutral on the ground of its aiding that enemy in the war. But reason revolts at such an inconsistency; and the neutral having equal right with the belligerent to decide the question, the interest of our constituents and the duty of maintaining the authority of reason, the only umpire between just nations, impose on us the obligation of providing an effectual and determined opposition to a doctrine so injurious to the rights of peaceable nations. Indeed, the confidence we ought to have in the justice of others, still countenances the hope that a sounder view of those rights will of itself induce from every belligerent a more correct observance of them.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 47. FORD ED., viii, 389. (Dec. 1805.)

ing us reason to believe that the war is becoming nearly general in Europe, and that it has already involved nations with which we are in daily habits of commerce and friendship, the President has thought it proper to issue the Proclamation of which I enclose you a copy, in order to mark out to our citizens the line of conduct they are to pursue. That this intimation, however, might not work to their prejudice, by being produced against them as conclusive evidence of their knowledge of the existence of war and of the nations engaged in it, in any case where they might be drawn into courts of justice for acts done without that knowledge, it has been thought necessary to write to the representatives of the belligerent powers here, * * * reserving to our citizens those immunities to which they are entitled, till authentic information shall be given to our government by the parties at war, and be thus communicated, with due certainty, to our citizens. You will be pleased to present to the government where you reside this proceeding of the President, as a proof of the earnest desire of the United States to preserve peace and friendship with all the belligerent powers, and to express his expectation that they will in return extend a scrupulous and effectual protection to all our citizens, whosoever they may need it, in pursuing their lawful and peaceable concerns with their subjects, or within their jurisdiction. You will, at the same time, assure them that the most exact reciprocation of this benefit shall be practiced by us towards their subjects, in the like cases.—To MESSRS. MORRIS, PINCKNEY and SHORT. iii, 543. (Pa., April 26, 1793.)

5890. ——. I dare say you will have judged from the pusillanimity of the proclamation, from whose pen it came. A fear lest any affection [to France] should be discovered is distinguishable enough. This base fear will produce the very evil they wish to avoid. For our constituents, seeing that the government does not express their mind, perhaps rather leans the other way, are coming forward to express it themselves.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 562. FORD ED., vi, 259. (Pa., May 1793.)

5891. ——. The proclamation as first proposed was to have been a declaration of neutrality. It was opposed on these grounds. 1. That a declaration of neutrality was a declaration there should be no war, to which the Executive was not competent. 2. That it would be better to hold back the declaration of neutrality, as a thing worth something to the powers at war; that they would bid for it, and we might reasonably ask a price, the broadest privileges of neutral nations. The first objection was so far respected as to avoid inserting the term neutrality, and the drawing the instrument was left to E. R. [Edmund Randolph].—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 591. FORD ED., vi, 315. (1793.)

5892. ——. That there should be a proclamation was passed unanimously with the approbation or the acquiescence of all parties. Indeed, it was not expedient to oppose it altogether, lest it should prejudice what was the next question, the boldest and greatest that ever was hazarded, and which would have called for extremities had it prevailed.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 591. FORD ED., vi, 316. (June 1793.)

5893. ——. You have most perfectly seized the original idea of the proclamation. When first proposed as a declaration of neutrality, it was opposed, first, because the Executive had no power to declare neutrality. Secondly, as such a declaration would be premature, and would lose us the benefit for which it might be bartered. It was urged that there was a strong impression in the minds of many that they were free to join in the hostilities on the side of France. Others were unapprised of the danger they would be exposed to in carrying contraband goods. It was, therefore, agreed that a proclamation should issue, declaring that we were in a state of peace with all the parties, admonishing the people to do nothing contravening it, and putting them on their guard as to contraband. On this ground it was accepted or acquiesced in by all [the cabinet], and E. R. [Edmund Randolph] who drew it, brought to me the draft, to let me see there was no such word as neutrality in it. Circumstances forbid other criticism. The public, however, soon took it up as a declaration of neutrality, and it came to be considered at length as such.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 17. FORD ED., vi, 346. (Pa., 1793.)

5894. ——. "On the declaration of war between France and England, the United States being at peace with both, their situation was so new and unexperienced by themselves, that their citizens were not, in the first instant, sensible of the new duties resulting therefrom, and of the laws it would impose even on their dispositions towards the belligerent powers. Some of them imagined (and chiefly their transient sea-faring citizens) that they were free to indulge those dispositions, to take side with either party, and enrich themselves by depredations on the commerce of the other, and were meditating enterprises of this nature, as was said. In this state of the public mind, and before it should take an erroneous direction difficult to be set right, and dangerous to themselves and their country, the President thought it expedient, by way of Proclamation, * to remind our fellow-citizens that we were in a state of peace with all the belligerent powers; that in that state it was our duty neither to aid nor injure any; to exhort and warn them against acts which might contravene this duty, and particularly those of positive hostility, for the punishment of which the laws would be appealed to, and to put them on their guard also as to the risks they would run if they should attempt to carry articles of contraband to any. Very soon afterwards we learnt that Genet was undertaking the fitting and arming vessels in that port [Charleston], enlisting men, foreigners and citizens, and giving them commissions to commit hostilities against nations at peace with us; that these vessels were taking and bringing prizes into our ports; that the consuls of France were assuming to hold courts of admiralty on them, to try, condemn and authorize their sale as legal prizes, and all this before Mr. Genet had presented himself or his credentials to the President, before he was received by him, without his consent or consultation, and directly in contravention of the state of peace existing and declared to exist in the President's proclamation, and which it was incumbent on him to preserve till the constitutional authority should otherwise declare. These proceedings became immediately, as was naturally to be expected, the subject of complaint by the representative here of that power against whom they would chiefly operate." This was the true sense of the proclamation in the view of the draftsman and of the two signers; but H. [Hamilton] had other views. The instrument was badly drawn, and made the President go out of his line to declare things which, though true, it was not his province to declare. The instrument was communicated to me after it was drawn, but I was busy, and only ran an eye over it to see that it was not made a declaration of neutrality, and gave it back again, without, I believe, changing a tittle.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 29. FORD ED., vi, 368. (Aug. 1793.)

* In sending this explanation of the intention of the proclamation to Madison, Jefferson wrote: "Having occasion to state it (the intention, &c.) in a paper which I am preparing, I have done it in the following [above quoted] terms. Edmund Randolph called on me just as I had finished so far [within the quotation marks], and he said it presented fairly his view of the matter. He recalled to my mind that I had, at the time, opposed its being made a declaration of neutrality, on the ground that the Executive was not the competent authority for that, and, therefore, that it was agreed the instrument should be drawn with great care."—EDITOR.

5895. ———. You will see a piece signed "Pacificus" [Alexander Hamilton] in defence of the proclamation. You will readily know the pen. I know it the more readily because it is an amplification only of the topics urged in discussing the question [in cabinet] when first proposed. The right of the Executive to declare that we are not bound to execute the guarantee [to France] was then advanced by him and denied by me. No other opinion was expressed on it. In this paper he repeats it, and even considers the proclamation as such a declaration; but if anybody intended it as such (except himself) they did not then say so. The passage beginning with the words, "the answer to this is," &c., is precisely the answer he gave at the time to my objection, that the Executive had no authority to issue a declaration of neutrality, nor to do more than declare the actual state of things to be that of peace. "For until the new government is acknowledged the treaties, &c., are, of course, suspended." This, also, is the sum of his arguments the same day on the great question which followed that of the proclamation, to wit, whether the Executive might not, and ought not to declare the [French] treaties suspended. * * * Upon the whole, my objections to the competence of the Executive to declare neutrality (that being understood to respect the future) were supposed to be got over by avoiding the use of that term. The declaration of the disposition of the United States can hardly be called illegal, though it was certainly officious and improper. The truth of the fact lent it some cover. My objections to the impolicy of a premature declaration were answered by such arguments as timidity would reasonably suggest. I now think it extremely possible that Hammond might have been instructed to have asked it, and to offer the broadest neutral privileges, as the price, which was exactly the price I wanted that we should contend for. But is it not a miserable thing that the three heresies I have quoted from this paper, should pass unnoticed and unanswered, as these certainly will, for none but mere bunglers and brawlers have for some time past taken the trouble to answer anything?—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 327. (June 1793.)

5896. ———. The real milk and water views of the proclamation appeared to me to have been truly given in a piece published in the papers soon after [it was issued], and which I knew to be E. R.'s [Edmund Randolph's] from its exact coincidence with what he has expressed.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 328. (1793.)

5897. NEW HAMPSHIRE, Opinion in.—The public sentiment in New Hampshire is no longer progressive in any direction; * * * it is dead water.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 343. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

5898. NEW HAMPSHIRE, Republicanism in.—Although we have not yet got a majority into the fold of republicanism in your State, yet one long pull more will effect it, * * * unless it be true, as is sometimes said, that New Hampshire is but a satellite of Massachusetts. In this last State, the public sentiment seems to be under some influence additional to that of the clergy and lawyers. I suspect there must be a leaven of State pride at seeing itself deserted by the public opinion, and that their late popular song of "Rule New England" betrays one principle of their present variance from the Union. But I am in hopes they will in time discover that the shortest road to rule is to join the majority.—To JOHN LANGDON. FORD ED., viii, 161. (W., June 1802.)

5899. NEW JERSEY, Republicanism in.—Jersey is coming majestically round to the true principles.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 300. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

5900. NEW ORLEANS, Battle of.—I am glad we closed our war with the eclat of the action at New Orleans.—To MARQUIS LA-FAYETTE. vi, 427. FORD ED., ix, 510. (M., 1815.)

5901. ———. Peace was indeed desirable; yet it would not have been as welcome without the successes of New Orleans. These last have established truths too important not to be valued; that the people of Louisiana are sincerely attached to the Union; that their city can be defended; that the Western States make its defence their peculiar concern; that the militia are brave; that their deadly aim countervails the manœuvring skill of the enemy; that we have officers of natural genius now starting forward from the mass; and that putting together all our conflicts, we can beat the British by sea and by land, with equal numbers.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. vi, 450. (M., 1815.)

5902. ———. The affair of New Orleans was fraught with useful lessons to ourselves, our enemies, and our friends, and will powerfully influence our future relations with the nations of Europe. It will show them we mean to take no part in their wars, and count no odds when engaged in our own.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 453. FORD ED., ix, 512. (M., 1815.)

5903. ———. It may be thought that useless blood was spilt at New Orleans, after the treaty of peace had been actually signed. I think it had many valuable uses. It proved the fidelity of the Orleansese to the United States. It proved that New Orleans can be defended both by land and water; that the Western country will fly to its relief (of which ourselves had doubted before); that our militia are heroes when they have heroes to lead them on; and that, when unembarrassed by field evolutions, which they do not understand, their skill in the fire-arm, and deadly aim, give them advantage over regulars.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 420. FORD ED., ix, 504. (M., 1815.) See FEDERALISTS.

— NEW ORLEANS, Batture Case.—See BATTURE.

5904. NEW ORLEANS, Right of deposit.—We state in general the necessity, not only of our having a port near the mouth of the river (without which we could make no use of the navigation at all) but of its being so well separated from the territories of Spain and her jurisdiction, as not to engender daily disputes and broils between us. It is certain, that if Spain were to retain any jurisdiction over our entrepôt, her officers would abuse that jurisdiction, and our people would abuse their privileges in it. Both parties must foresee this, and that it will end in war. Hence the necessity of a well-defined separation. Nature has decided what shall be the geography of that in the end, whatever it might be in the beginning, by cutting off from the adjacent countries of Florida and Louisiana, and enclosing between two of its channels, a long and narrow strip of land, called the Island of New Orleans. The idea of ceding this could not be hazarded to Spain, in the first step; it would be too disagreeable at first view; because this island, with its town, constitutes at present, their principal settlement in that part of their dominions, containing about ten thousand white inhabitants of every age and sex. Reason and events, however, may by little and little, familiarize them to it. That we have a right to some spot as an entrepôt for our commerce, may be at once affirmed. The expediency, too, may be expressed of so locating it as to cut off the source of future quarrels and wars. A disinterested eye, looking on a map, will remark how conveniently this tongue of land is formed for the purpose.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 178. FORD ED., v, 219. (N.Y., 1790.)

5905. ——. Observe always, that to accept the navigation of the river without an entrepôt would be perfectly useless, and that an entrepôt, if trammelled, would be a certain instrument for bringing on war instead of preventing it.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 228. FORD ED., v, 305. (Pa., 1791.)

5906. ——. To conclude the subject of navigation, each of the following conditions is to be considered by the Commissioners [to Spain] as a sine quâ non. 1. That our right be acknowledged of navigating the Mississippi in its whole breadth and length, from its source to the sea, as established by the treaty of 1763. 2. That neither the vessels, cargoes, or the persons on board, be stopped, visited, or subjected to the payment of any duty whatsoever; or, if a visit must be permitted, that it be under such restrictions as to produce the least possible inconvenience. But it should be altogether avoided, if possible, as the parent of perpetual broils. 3. That such conveniences be allowed us ashore, as may render our right of navigation practicable and under such regulations as may bond fide respect the preservation of peace and order alone, and may not have in object to embarrass our navigation, or raise a revenue on it.*—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 585. FORD ED., v, 475. (1792.)

* "The right of navigation (of the Mississippi) was conceded by the treaty of 1795, and with it a right to the free use of the port of New Orleans upon reasonably satisfactory terms for a period of three years, and thereafter until some equally convenient harbor should be allotted. The credit of this ultimate achievement was Mr. Jefferson's, none the less because the treaty was not signed until he had retired from office. It was really his statesmanship which had secured it, not only in spite of the natural repugnance of Spain, but also in spite of the obstacles in-

5907. NEW ORLEANS, Suspension of right.—The suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans, ceded to us by our treaty with Spain, threw our whole country into such a ferment as imminently threatened its peace. This, however, was believed to be the act of the Intendant, unauthorized by his government. But it showed the necessity of making effectual arrangements to secure the peace of the two countries against the indiscreet acts of subordinate agents.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 456. FORD ED., viii, 204. (W., Feb. 1803.)

5908. ——. The government of Spain has instantly redressed the infraction of treaty by her Intendant at New Orleans. * * * By a reasonable and peaceable process we have obtained in four months, what would have cost us seven years of war, 100,000 human lives, 100 millions of additional debt, besides ten hundred millions lost by the want of market for our produce, or depredations on it in seeking markets, and the general demoralizing of our citizens which war occasions.—To JOHN BACON. FORD ED., viii, 229. (W., April 1803.) See LOUISIANA and MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION.

5909. NEW YORK, Politics of.—I have been much pleased to see a dawn of change in the spirit of your State [New York]. The late elections have indicated something, which, at a distance, we do not understand. However, what with the English influence in the lower, and the Patroon influence in the upper part of your State, I presume little is to be hoped.—To AARON BURR. iv, 186. FORD ED., vii, 147. (Pa., June 1797.)

5910. ——. New York is coming majestically round to the true principles.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 300. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

5911. NEW YORK CITY, Depravity in.—New York, like London, seems to be a cloacina of all the depravities of human nature.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 310. (M., 1823.)

5912. NEW YORK CITY, Washington's defence.—The maxim laid down by Congress to their generals was that not a foot of territory was to be ceded to their enemies where there was a possibility of defending it. In consequence of these views, and against his own judgment, General Washington was obliged to fortify and attempt to defend the city of New York. But that could not be defended without occupying the heights on Long Island which commanded the city of New York. He was, therefore, obliged to establish a strong detachment in Long Island to defend those heights. The moment that detachment was routed, which he had much expected, his first object was to withdraw them, and his second to evacuate New York. He did this, therefore, immediately, and without waiting any movement of the enemy. He brought off his whole baggage, stores, and other implements, without leaving a single article except the very heaviest of his cannon, and things of little value. I well remember his letter to Congress, wherein he expressed his wonder that the enemy had given him this leisure, as, from the heights they had got possession of, they might have compelled him to a very precipitate retreat. This was one of the instances where our commanding officers directly thrown in his way in the earlier stages by many persons in the United States, who privately gave the Spanish minister to understand that the country cared little about the Mississippi, and would not support the Secretary in his demands."—MORSE'S Life of Jefferson.

were obliged to conform to popular views, though they foresaw certain loss from it. Had he proposed at first to abandon New York, he might have been abandoned himself. An obedience to popular will cost us an army in (Charleston in the year 1779.—NOTES ON M. SOULES'S WORK. ix, 298. FORD ED., iv, 305. (P., 1786.)

5913. NEWS, Home.—But why has nobody else written to me? Is it that one is forgotten as soon as their back is turned? I have a better opinion of men. It must be either that they think that the details known to themselves are known to everybody, and so come to us through a thousand channels, or that we should set no value on them. Nothing can be more erroneous than both those opinions. We value those details, little and great, public and private, in proportion to our distance from our own country; and so far are they from getting to us through a thousand channels, that we hear no more of them or of our country here [Paris] than if we were among the dead.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 45. (P., 1785.)

5914. ——. It is unfortunate that most people think the occurrences passing daily under their eyes, are either known to all the world, or not worth being known. * * * I hope you will be so good as to continue your friendly information. The proceedings of our public bodies, the progress of the public mind on interesting questions, the casualties which happen among our private friends, and whatever is interesting to yourself and family, will always be anxiously received by me.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 549. FORD ED., iv, 212. (P., 1786.)

5915. ——. I give you thanks for the details of small news contained in your letter. You know how precious that kind of information is to a person absent from his country, and how difficult it is to be procured.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 91. (P., 1789.)

5916. ——. If there is any news stirring in town or country, such as deaths, courtships, or marriages, in the circle of my acquaintance, let me know it.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 183. FORD ED., i, 344. (F., 1762.)

5917. NEWS, Minor.—Details, political and literary, and even of the small history of our country, are the most pleasing communications possible.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 402. (P., 1785.)

5918. ——. I pray you to write to me often. Do not turn politician too; but write me all the small news—the news about persons and about States; tell me who dies, that I may meet these disagreeable events in detail, and not all at once when I return (from France); who marry, who hang themselves because they cannot marry, &c.—To MRS. TRIST. i, 395. (P., 1785.)

5919. ——. It is more difficult here [Paris] to get small than great news, because most of our correspondents in writing letters to cross the Atlantic, think they must always tread in buskins, so that half one's friends might be dead without its being ever spoken of here.—To DR. JAMES CURRIE. FORD ED., iv, 131. (P., 1786.)

5920. ——. Nothing is so grateful to me, at this distance [Paris], as details, both great and small, of what is passing in my own country. * * * When one has been long absent from his neighborhood, the small news of that is the most pleasing, and occupies his first attention.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 517. FORD ED., iv, 187. (P., 1786.)

5921. NEWS, Useful.—The details from my own country of the proceedings of the legislative, executive and judiciary bodies, and even those which respect individuals only, are the most pleasing treat we can receive at this distance [Paris], and the most useful, also.—To JOSEPH JONES. i, 354. (P., 1785.)

5922. NEWSPAPERS, Abuses by.—The abuses of the freedom of the press here have been carried to a length never before known or borne by any civilized nation.—To M. PICTET. iv, 463. (W., 1803.)

5923. NEWSPAPERS, Advertisements.—We have been trying to get another weekly or half weekly paper set up [in Philadelphia], excluding advertisements, so that it might go through the States, and furnish a whig vehicle of intelligence. We hoped at one time to have persuaded Freneau to set up here, but failed. In the meantime, Bache's paper [The Advertiser] the principles of which were always republican, improves in its matter. If we can persuade him to throw all his advertisements on one leaf, by tearing that off, the leaf containing intelligence may be sent without overcharging the post, and be generally taken instead of Fenno's.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 336. (Pa., 1791.)

5924. NEWSPAPERS, Agitation by.—In the first moments of quietude which have succeeded the [Presidential] election, the printers seem to have aroused their lying faculties beyond their ordinary state, to re-agitate the public mind. What appointments to office have they detailed which had never been thought of, merely to found a text for their calumniating commentaries.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 392. FORD ED., viii, 43. (W., March 1801.)

5925. NEWSPAPERS, Attacks by.—I have been for some time used as the property of the newspapers, a fair mark for every man's dirt. Some, too, have indulged themselves in this exercise who would not have done it, had they known me otherwise than through these impure and injurious channels. It is hard treatment, and for a singular kind of offence, that of having obtained by the labors of a life the indulgent opinions of a part of one's fellow citizens. However, these moral evils must be submitted to, like the physical scourges of tempest, fire, &c.—To PEREGRINE FITZHUGH. iv, 216. FORD ED., vii, 208. (Pa., 1798.)

5926. ——. Were I to undertake to answer the calumnies of the newspapers, it would be more than all my own time and that of twenty aids could effect. For while I should be answering one, twenty new ones would be invented. * * * But this is an injury to which duty requires every one to submit whom the public think proper to call into its councils.—To SAMUEL SMITH. iv, 255. FORD ED., vii, 279. (M., 1798.)

5927. ——. [I said to Colonel Burr] that as to the attack excited against him in the newspapers, I had noticed it but as the passing wind; that I had seen complaints that Cheetham, employed in publishing the laws, should be permitted to eat the public bread and abuse its second officer; * * * that these federal printers did not in the least intermit their abuse of me, though receiving emoluments from the government and that I have never thought it proper to interfere for myself, and consequently not in the case of the Vice-President.—THE ANAS. ix, 206. FORD ED., i, 302. (Jan. 1804.)

5928. ——. That tory printers should think it advantageous to identify me with that paper [The National Intelligencer], the Aurora, &c., in order to obtain ground for abusing me, is perhaps fair warfare. But that anyone who knows me should listen one moment to such an insinuation, is what I did not expect. I neither have, nor ever had, any more connection with those papers than our antipodes have; nor know what is to be in them until I see it in them, except proclamations and other documents sent for publication.—TO THOMAS PAINE. iv, 582. FORD ED., viii, 361. (W., June 1805.)

5929. ——. I met the scurrilities of the newswriters without concern, while in pursuit of the great interests with which I was charged. But in my present retirement, no duty forbids my wish for quiet.—TO J. B. COLVIN. v, 544. FORD ED., ix, 282. (M., 1810.)

5930. NEWSPAPERS, Banks and.—Notwithstanding the magnitude of this calamity [bank failures], every newspaper almost is silent on it, Frenau's excepted, in which you will see it mentioned.—TO THOMAS MANN RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 510. (April 1792.)

5931. NEWSPAPERS, Caricatures.—Our newspapers for the most part, present only the caricatures of disaffected minds.—TO M. PICTET. iv, 463. (W., 1803.)

5932. NEWSPAPERS, Classics vs.—I read one or two newspapers a week, but with reluctance give even that time from Tacitus and Horace, and so much other more agreeable reading.—TO DAVID HOWELL. v, 555. (M., 1810.)

5933. ——. I have given up newspapers in exchange for Tacitus, and Thucydides, for Newton and Euclid, and I find myself much the happier.—TO JOHN ADAMS. vi, 37. FORD ED., ix, 334. (M., 1812.)

5934. ——. I read but a single paper, and that hastily. I find Horace and Tacitus so much better writers than the champions of the gazettes, that I lay those down to take up these with great reluctance.—TO JAMES MONROE. vii, 287. FORD ED., x, 250. (M., 1823.)

5935. NEWSPAPERS, Defamation.—Defamation is becoming a necessary of life; inasmuch, that a dish of tea in morning or evening cannot be digested without this stimulant. Even those who do not believe these abominations, still read them with complacency to their auditors, and instead of the abhorrence and indignation which should fill a virtuous mind, betray a secret pleasure in the possibility that some may believe them, though they do not themselves.—TO JOHN NORVELL. v, 93. FORD ED., ix, 74. (W., 1807.) See CALUMNY.

— NEWSPAPERS, Editors of.—See EDITORS.

5936. NEWSPAPERS, English.—The English papers are so incessantly repeating their lies about the tumults, the anarchy, the bankruptcies, and distresses of America, that these ideas prevail very generally in Europe.—TO JAMES MONROE. i, 407. FORD ED., iv, 87. (P., 1785.)

5937. ——. The English papers—those infamous fountains of falsehood.—TO F. HOPKINSON. ii, 204. (P., 1787.)

5938. NEWSPAPERS, Falsehoods.—The press is impotent when it abandons itself to falsehood.—TO THOMAS SEYMOUR. v, 44. FORD ED., ix, 30. (W., 1807.)

5939. ——. Nothing can now be believed which is seen in a newspaper.—TO JOHN NORVELL. v, 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5940. ——. Truth itself becomes suspicious by being put into that polluted vehicle.—TO JOHN NORVELL. v, 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5941. ——. The real extent of the misinformation [in the newspapers] is known only to those who are in situations to confront facts within their knowledge with the lies of the day.—TO JOHN NORVELL. v, 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5942. ——. The man who never looks into a newspaper is better informed than he who reads them; inasmuch as he who knows nothing is nearer to truth than he whose mind is filled with falsehoods and errors. He who reads nothing will still learn the great facts, and the details are all false.—TO JOHN NORVELL. v, 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5943. ——. These texts of truth relieve me from the floating falsehoods of the public papers.—TO PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 160. FORD ED., x, 158. (M., 1820.) See LIES.

5944. NEWSPAPERS, Freedom of.—Considering the great importance to the public liberty of the freedom of the press, and the difficulty of submitting it to very precise rules, the laws have thought it less mischievous to give greater scope to its freedom than to the restraint of it. The President has, therefore, no authority to prevent publications of the nature of those you complain of.—TO THE SPANISH COMMISSIONERS. iv, 21. FORD ED., vi, 350. (Pa., 1793.)

* Attacks on the King of Spain—EDITOR.

5945. ——. No experiment can be more interesting than that we are now trying, and which we trust will end in establishing the fact, that man may be governed by reason and truth. Our first object should therefore be, to leave open to him all the avenues to truth. The most effectual hitherto found, is the freedom of the press. It is, therefore, the first shut up by those who fear the investigation of their actions.—To JUDGE TYLER. iv, 548. (W., 1804.)

5946. ——. The liberty of speaking and writing guards our other liberties.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. viii, 129. (1808.)

5947. ——. Where the press is free, and every man able to read, all is safe.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 517. FORD ED., x, 4. (M., 1816.)

5948. ——. The only security of all is in a free press. The force of public opinion cannot be resisted, when permitted freely to be expressed. The agitation it produces must be submitted to. It is necessary to keep the waters pure.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.) See PRESS, FREEDOM OF.

5949. NEWSPAPERS, Friends of Liberty.—Within the pale of truth, the press is a noble institution, equally the friend of science and of civil liberty.—To THOMAS SEYMOUR. v, 44. FORD ED., ix, 30. (W., 1807.)

5950. NEWSPAPERS, Government and.—The basis of our governments being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 100. FORD ED., iv, 359. (P., 1787.)

5951. NEWSPAPERS, And history.—I really look with commiseration over the great body of my fellow citizens, who, reading newspapers, live and die in the belief, that they have known something of what has been passing in the world in their time; whereas the accounts they have read in newspapers are just as true a history of any other period of the world as of the present, except that the real names of the day are affixed to their fables.—To JOHN NORVELL. v, 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5952. NEWSPAPERS, Indifference to.—A truth now and then projecting into the ocean of newspaper lies, serves like headlands to correct our course. Indeed, my scepticism as to everything I see in a newspaper, makes me indifferent whether I ever see one.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 407. FORD ED., ix, 496. (M., 1815.)

5953. ——. I have almost ceased to read newspapers. Mine remain in our post office a week or ten days, sometimes, unasked for. I find more amusement in studies to which I was always attached, and from which I was dragged by the events of the times in which I have happened to live.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 466. FORD ED., ix, 521. (M., 1815.)

5954. NEWSPAPERS, Licentiousness of.—During this course of administration [first term] and in order to disturb it, the artillery of the press has been levelled against us, charged with whatsoever its licentiousness could devise or dare. These abuses of an institution so important to freedom and science, are deeply to be regretted, inasmuch as they tend to lessen its usefulness, and to sap its safety; they might, indeed, have been corrected by the wholesome punishments reserved and provided by the laws of the several States against falsehood and defamation; but public duties more urgent press on the time of public servants, and the offenders have therefore been left to find their punishment in the public indignation. Nor was it uninteresting to the world, that an experiment should be fairly and fully made, whether freedom of discussion, unaided by power, is not sufficient for the propagation and protection of truth—whether a government, conducting itself in the true spirit of its Constitution, with zeal and purity, and doing no act which it would be unwilling the world should witness, can be written down by falsehood and defamation. The experiment has been tried; you have witnessed the scene; our fellow-citizens looked on, cool and collected; they saw the latent source from which these outrages proceeded; they gathered around their public functionaries, and when the Constitution called them to the decision by suffrage, they pronounced their verdict, honorable to those who had served them, and consolatory to the friend of man, who believes he may be intrusted with his own affairs. No inference is here intended, that the laws, provided by the States against false and defamatory publications, should not be enforced; he who has time, renders a service to public morals and public tranquillity, in reforming these abuses by the salutary coercions of the law; but the experiment is noted, to prove that, since truth and reason have maintained their ground against false opinions in league with false facts, the press, confined to truth, needs no other legal restraint; the public judgment will correct false reasonings and opinions, on a full hearing of all parties; and no other definite line can be drawn between the inestimable liberty of the press and its demoralizing licentiousness. If there be still improprieties which this rule would not restrain, its supplement must be sought in the censorship of public opinion.*—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 43. FORD ED., viii, 346. (1805.)

5955. NEWSPAPERS, And light.—Our citizens may be deceived for awhile, and have been deceived; but as long as the presses can be protected, we may trust to them for light.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. FORD ED., vii, 378. (M., 1789.)

* This was Jefferson's reply to the severe attacks made on his first administration.—EDITOR.

5956. NEWSPAPERS, Mischief-makers.—The federal papers appear desirous of making mischief between us and England, by putting speeches into my mouth which I never uttered.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. v, 54. FORD ED., ix, 37. (W., 1807.)

5957. — — — That first of all human contrivances for generating war.—To MR. MAURY. vi, 469. (M., 1815.)

5958. NEWSPAPERS, Monarchical.—Fenno's [The United States Gazette] is a paper of pure toriyism, disseminating the coctrines of monarchy, aristocracy, and the exclusion of the influence of the people.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 336. (Pa., 1791.)

5959. NEWSPAPERS, Official.—You have seen too much of the conduct of the press in countries where it is free, to consider the gazettes as evidence of the sentiments of any part of the government; you have seen them bestow on the government itself, in all its parts, its full share of inculpation.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 331. FORD ED., v, 436. (Pa., 1792.)

5960. NEWSPAPERS, Political bulldogs.—The malignity with which political enemies torture every sentence from me into meanings imagined by their own wickedness only, justify my expressing a solicitude, that this * * * communication may in nowise be permitted to find its way into the public papers. Not fearing these political bulldogs, I yet avoid putting myself in the way of being baited by them, and do not wish to volunteer away that portion of tranquillity, which a firm execution of my duties will permit me to enjoy.—To JOHN NORVELL. v, 93. FORD ED., ix, 75. (W., 1807.)

5961. NEWSPAPERS, Postoffice and.—The expense of French postage is so enormous, that I have been obliged to desire that my newspapers, from the different States, may be sent to the office for Foreign Affairs at New York; and I have requested of Mr. Jay to have them always packed in a box and sent as merchandise.—To R. IZARD. i, 443. (P., 1785.)

5962. NEWSPAPERS, Power of.—Freneau's paper has saved our Constitution, which was galloping fast into monarchy, and has been checked by no means so powerfully as by that paper. It is well and universally known, that it has been that paper which has checked the career of the Monocrats.—THE ANAS. ix, 145. FORD ED., i, 231. (1793.)

5963. — — — These foreign and false citizens * * * possess our printing presses, a powerful engine in their government of us.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 173. FORD ED., vii, 122. (Pa., 1797.)

5964. — — — This paper [The Aurora] has unquestionably rendered incalculable services to republicanism through all struggles with the federalists, and has been the rallying point for the orthodoxy of the whole Union. It was our comfort in the gloomiest days, and is still performing the office of a watchful sentinel.—To DABNEY CARR. FORD ED., ix, 316. (M., 1811.)

5965. NEWSPAPERS, President and.—The Chief Magistrate cannot enter the arena of the newspapers.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 601. FORD ED., ix, 326. (M., July 1811.)

5966. NEWSPAPERS, Principles of.—A paper which shall be governed by the spirit of Mr. Madison's celebrated report [on the Virginia Resolutions] cannot be false to the rights of all classes.—To H. LEE. vii, 376. FORD ED., x, 318. (M., 1824.)

5967. NEWSPAPERS, Prosecution of.—The federalists having failed in destroying the freedom of the press by their gag-law, seem to have attacked it in an opposite direction; that is by pushing its licentiousness and its lying to such a degree of prostitution as to deprive it of all credit. And the fact is that so abandoned are the tory presses in this particular, that even the least informed of the people have learned that nothing in a newspaper is to be believed. This is a dangerous state of things, and the press ought to be restored to its credibility if possible. The restraints provided by the laws of the States are sufficient for this, if applied. And I have, therefore, long thought that a few prosecutions of the most prominent offenders would have a wholesome effect in restoring the integrity of the presses. Not a general prosecution, for that would look like persecution; but a selected one.—To THOMAS MCKEAN. FORD ED., viii, 218. (W., Feb. 1803.)

5968. NEWSPAPERS, Purifiers.—Newspapers serve to carry off noxious vapors and smoke.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 431. (W., April 1802.)

5969. NEWSPAPERS, Reading of.—Reading the newspapers but little and that little but as the romance of the day, a word of truth now and then comes like the drop of water on the tongue of Dives.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 442. FORD ED., ix, 251. (M., April 1809.)

5970. NEWSPAPERS, Reform by.—This formidable censor of the public functionaries, by arraigning them at the tribunal of public opinion, produces reform peaceably, which must otherwise be done by revolution. It is also the best instrument for enlightening the mind of man, and improving him as a rational, moral, and social being.—To M. CORAY. vii, 324. (M., 1823.)

5971. NEWSPAPERS, Reformation of.—Perhaps an editor might begin a reformation [of his newspaper] in some such way as this: Divide his paper into four chapters, heading the first "Truths"; the second, "Probabilities"; third, "Possibilities"; fourth, "Lies". The first chapter would be very short, as it would contain little more than authentic papers, and information from such sources, as the editor would be willing to risk his own reputation for their truth. The second would contain what, from a mature consideration of all circumstances, his judgment should conclude to be probably true. This, however, should rather contain too little than too much. The third and fourth should be professedly for those readers who would rather have lies for their money than the blank paper they would occupy.—To JOHN NORVELL. v. 92. FORD ED., ix, 74. (W., 1807.)

5972. NEWSPAPERS, Regulation of.—It is so difficult to draw a clear line of separation between the abuse and the wholesome use of the press, that as yet we have found it better to trust the public judgment, than the magistrate, with the discrimination between truth and falsehood.—To M. PICTET. iv, 463. (W., 1803.)

5973. NEWSPAPERS, Reliability of.—General facts may indeed be collected from the newspapers, such as that Europe is now at war, that Bonaparte has been a successful warrior, that he has subjugated a great portion of Europe to his will. &c., but no details can be relied on.—To JOHN NORVELL. v. 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5974. NEWSPAPERS, Responsibility for.—It is not he who prints, but he who pays for printing a slander, who is its real author.—To JOHN NORVELL. v. 93. FORD ED., ix, 74. (W., 1807.)

5975. NEWSPAPERS, Restraint on.—To your request of my opinion of the manner in which a newspaper should be conducted, so as to be most useful, I should answer: "By restraining it to true facts and sound principles only." Yet I fear such a paper would find few subscribers.—To JOHN NORVELL. v. 91. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5976. — — — The papers have lately advanced in boldness and flagitiousness beyond even themselves. Such daring and atrocious lies as fill the third and fourth columns of the third page of the United States Gazette of August 31st were never before. I believe, published with impunity in any country. However, I have from the beginning determined to submit myself as the subject on whom may be proved the impotency of a free press in a country like ours, against those who conduct themselves honestly and enter into no intrigue. I admit at the same time that restraining the press to truth, as the present laws do, is the only way of making it useful. But I have thought necessary first to prove it can never be dangerous.—To WILLIAM SHORT. v. 362. (M., Sep. 1808.)

5977. NEWSPAPERS, Rulers and.—It is the office of the rulers on both sides [United States and England] to rise above these vulgar vehicles of passion.—To MR. MAURY. vi, 469. (M., 1815.)

5978. NEWSPAPERS, Slanders in.—An editor [should] set his face against the demoralizing practice of feeding the public mind habitually on slander, and the depravity of taste which this nauseous aliment induces.—To JOHN NORVELL. v. 93. FORD ED., ix, 74. (W., 1807.) See LIBELS and SLANDER.

5979. NEWSPAPERS, Support of.—Bache's paper and also Carey's totter for want of subscriptions. We should really exert ourselves to procure them, for if these papers fall, republicanism will be entirely browbeaten.*—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 237. FORD ED., vii, 245. (Pa., 1798.) See CALLENDER and DUANE.

5980. — — — The engine is the press. Every man must lay his purse and his pen under contribution.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 281. FORD ED., vii, 344. (Pa., 1799.)

5981. NEWSPAPERS, Suppression of.—It is a melancholy truth, that a suppression of the press could not more completely deprive the nation of its benefits, than is done by its abandoned prostitution to falsehood.—To JOHN NORVELL. v. 92. FORD ED., ix, 73. (W., 1807.)

5982. NEWSPAPERS, Torture by.—I confide them [opinions on government] to your honor, so to use them as to preserve me from the gridiron of the public papers.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 17. FORD ED., x, 44. (M., 1816.)

5983. NEWSPAPERS, Uncertain.—Newspaper information is too uncertain ground for the government to act on.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 81. (M., 1801.)

5984. NEWSPAPERS, Vulgar.—I deplore with you the putrid state into which our newspapers have passed, and the malignity, the vulgarity, and mendacious spirit of those who write for them. * * * These ordures are rapidly depraving the public taste, and lessening its relish for sound food. As vehicles of information, and a curb on our functionaries, they have rendered themselves useless, by forfeiting all title to belief. This has in a great degree been produced by the violence and malignity of party spirit.—To DR. WALTER JONES. vi, 284. FORD ED., ix, 446. (M., Jan. 1814.)
